PEOPLE v. BROWN et al. (No. 20,177.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 10, 1887.)

SUBORNATION OF PERJURY—PROCURING AFFIDAVIT OF INCOMPETENT PERSON—DUTY TO KNOW OF INCAPACITY.

Defendants were indicted for procuring false evidence, in causing a person, whom they were charged with knowing to be incompetent, to make affidavit, to be used on a motion for a new trial. Held, that if defendants did not know or suspect the mental unsoundness of affiant, and she apparently understood, assented to, and swore to the affidavit, they would not be criminally liable, although, upon investigation, they might have discovered her incompetency.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. MURPHY, Judge.

Geo. W. Tyelr, for appellants. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendants were prosecuted for procuring false evidence, to-wit, an affidavit to be used on the motion for a new trial in Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 Pac. Rep. 456, and 8 Pac. Rep. 709, from a person who was to their knowledge incapable of making an affidavit. The controversy at the trial was as to the capacity of the affiant, and whether, if she were incompetent, the defendants knew the fact. The last and most material question depended largely upon the degree of intelligence manifested, and whether, from the very appearance of the affiant, the defendants must have known or suspected her want of capacity.

The instructions plainly imply that a duty rested upon the defendants—one of whom was a notary employed to take the affidavit—to investigate as to the competency of the affiant, independently of any doubt or suspicion actually entertained by them; and, further, if by the use of reasonable diligence they could have discerned her incompetency, such means of knowledge is equivalent to knowledge. This cannot be the rule as to criminal responsibility. If the defendants were employed to procure the affidavit, and did not know or suspect the mental unsoundness of Mrs. Clark, and she apparently understood, assented to, and swore to it, I think they could not be held criminally liable, although, had they investigated the matter, they would have discovered her incompetency. To constitute the crime in question there must be an intent to produce false evidence for a fraudulent and deceitful purpose. Allowing it to be done through carelessness, however gross, without such intent, cannot constitute the offense.

Cal.Rep. 16-19 P.—1

In the course of a long charge, the court instructed the jury as follows: "And I therefore charge you that if you believe from the evidence, beyond all reasonable doubt, that on the eighteenth day of May said Isabella Clark was of unsound mind, and that these defendants, at the time of the taking of the affidavit testified to, knew, and had reason to believe and know, that at that time the said Isabella Clark was of unsound mind, and with said knowledge caused her to subscribe to said affidavit, with the intent to produce said affidavit, or allow it to be produced, in the action of Sharon v. Sharon, on said motion for a new trial, for any fraudulent or deceitful purpose, as genuine and true, then I charge you it was and is, within the purview of the Penal Code, a false affidavit, paper, and instrument in writing, and it is wholly immaterial whether or not the matters set forth in the affidavit were true or false. * * * I therefore charge you, in plain words, that if it is established to your satisfaction, and beyond such reasonable doubt as I have explained to you, that the said Isabella Clark was on the eighteenth day of May, 1885, a person of unsound mind, with mental powers so impaired, and her organs of sense so weakened, as to make her incapable of perception, and rendering her incapable of making known her perceptions to others, and that the defendants knew or had knowledge, or might have known by the exercise of ordinary observation and inquiry, of her mental unsoundness and incapacity, and knowing such to be her condition," etc., "then the defendants, and each of them, are guilty as charged in the information, and it will be your duty to so find by your verdict." And again the jury are told: "In regard to the question of knowledge, did these defendants know, at the time said affidavit was presented to said Isabella Clark for her to subscribe and swear to, that she was of unsound mind? And the question here arises, what is legal knowledge of a fact? There is great misapprehension in the popular mind on this subject. There seems to be a prevalent notion that no one is chargeable with more knowledge than he chooses to have; that he is permitted to close his eyes upon all sources of information, and then excuse his ignorance by saying that he does not see anything. While it is true that a man is not supposed to have known facts of which it appears he was ignorant, yet, if he has the means of ascertaining the true state of facts by the exercise of ordinary diligence, he is bound to do so, and if, instead of so doing, he is grossly negligent or culpable in not using such diligence, then his ignorance is no defense for any criminal act committed by him. In criminal cases, as well as civil affairs, every man is presumed to know everything that he can learn upon fair and reasonable inquiry, when he has facts in his possession which suggest the inquiry; that is, when the surroundings are such as to put him upon inquiry."

If such a rule ever obtains in a criminal case, it certainly can have no application to an offense of this character. The rule is nullus reus nisi mens sit rea. The rule of caveat emptor as to notice cannot apply to criminal responsibility. It is not at all analogous to the rule according to which it is sometimes conclusively presumed that one intended the natural and obvious consequences of his acts, and will not permit him to say he did not know that the consequences would follow. Nor is it like those cases of involuntary manslaughter in which carelessness or recklessness are held to be criminal. Undoubtedly, there are cases in which language similar to that contained in the charge of the learned judge is used; but they are all cases in which a duty is imposed upon the person to inquire, and not to do so is itself a dereliction. Thus, a woman who has been married took a second husband. On being charged with bigamy, she averred that she thought her husband dead. It was held that her belief was no defense. Here, she knew herself disqualified to marry unless the fact of the death of her husband existed. Unless she knew such fact, she ought not to have married. Another case was the sale of impure milk. It was held that defendant could not say he did not know it was impure; he is presumed to know, for he ought to have known. But in this case a special intent was required to make out the offense. It is like the offense of receiving stolen goods, larceny, or an assault with a particular intent. If one, acting in good faith, takes the property of another, believing it to be his own, he is not guilty of larceny, although the mistake is the consequence of gross carelessness. So the receiver of stolen goods must know they are stolen, and it will not do to say that his failure to know through gross negligence is equivalent to knowledge. If a case could arise, however, in which it should appear that he suspected the fact, and abstained from inquiry lest he should know, knowledge might be inferred. One must have some knowledge of the fact before he can close his eyes lest he may know. Of course, I admit the relevancy of proof of opportunity as bearing upon the issue of actual knowledge. But there must be such actual knowledge, and facts which would ordinarily suggest inquiry are not sufficient. The jury must believe that they did in fact suggest the inquiry to the defendant.

For these reasons I think the judgment should be reversed, and new trial ordered. So ordered.

MURPHY v. SUMNER. (No. 11,516.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 12, 1887.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—CONFLICTING TITLES—SURVEYS.

In a suit to recover land, plaintiff claimed title under a survey made by the United States in 1868, and a certificate of purchase from the state describing the land as in section 18. Defendant showed that, the first survey proving incorrect, a new survey was made in 1880, when defendant made a homestead entry upon the land then described as the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ section 17. Held, that as plaintiff had never been in actual possession of the land, nor had it been listed to the state when he purchased, nor prior to the second survey, the title would follow the second survey.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—CERTIFICATE OF REGISTER OF LAND-OFFICE.

In a suit to recover possession of certain land, to prove that it had been listed to the state, the plaintiff introduced the certificate of the register of the United States land-office showing that as a fact. Held that, as there was no such certificate known to the law, it was improperly admitted.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

D. B. Murphy, plaintiff, sued Sandy Sumner, defendant, to recover possession of 77 acres of land. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed. F. Adams, for appellant. Graves, Turner & Graves, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action to recover 77 acres of land, being lots 1, 2, and 3, section 18, township 30 S., range 14 E., Mount Diablo base and meridian. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The land was twice surveyed under the direction of the United States surveyor general for California, and each survey was duly approved by that officer, and the plat placed on file in the United States land-office. The first survey was made and approved in 1868, and it was afterwards found that the lines actually run on the ground did not accord with other surveys, and were incorrect. A second was therefore ordered, which was made and approved in 1880, and the plat thereof duly filed in the United States land-office in lieu of the first erroneous survey. The plaintiff obtained from the state a certificate of purchase as lieu land, dated January 18, 1870, 10 years before the new and correct survey was made. On the trial, plaintiff introduced his certificate of purchase, and proved the first survey, and the approval of it, and that the plat was filed in the United States land-office. He also showed that, according to the lines actually run on the ground, the defendant's house is upon his land. The defendant claims no part of section 18, but does claim the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 17, in the same township, under a homestead entry made after and according to the corrected survey and plat of 1880. On the trial, the defendant proved the second survey and his homestead entry, and that according to that survey he was not in possession of any portion of section 18. The land thus in controversy consists of a strip about 200 yards wide, on which are the defendant's improvements. Many exceptions were taken at the trial which, under the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to notice.

It is not claimed that the defendant has intruded upon the actual possession of the plaintiff, or that plaintiff ever was in actual possession of the land. He relies upon strict title. It may be admitted that upon proof that the land had been surveyed, and a certificate of purchase duly issued to him, he made a prima facie case. The defendant then proved the corrected survey and a homestead entry, and that according to this last survey he is in possession only of the land included within his homestead entry. It is not claimed that the lands had been actually listed to the state when the certificate of purchase was issued. The statute did not require the surveyor general to ascertain that fact before issuing the certificate, and we know that at the time this certificate was issued the practice was to issue such certificate before the lands had been listed over. That no such presumption arises from the fact of the issuance of the certificate seems to be held in Hodapp v. Sharp, 40 Cal. 69, a case upon which respondent relies.

Unless the plaintiff had acquired some rights under the first survey to a specific tract of land, we see no reason why a correct survey could not be made, and substituted for the incorrect survey. Unless, therefore, the land had been listed to the state prior to the second survey, the plaintiff cannot insist upon the first survey as decisive of the controversy; and it would follow that the evidence of the defendant overcame the prima facie case of the plaintiff, if it be conceded that the certificate of purchase did make a prima facie case. To prove that the land described in the certificate of purchase had been listed to the state prior to 1880, the plaintiff offered the certificate of W. R. Wheaton, register of the United States land-office, showing that the lands had been listed to the state of California on March 2, 1875. The offered evidence was objected to on the ground that it is not evidence of any facts, and that there is no such certificate known to the law. The objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted, and in his statement on motion for a new trial specifies the ruling as error. The point was not made in appellant's points, but was at the oral argument. The certificate was as follows:

"I, Wm. R. Wheaton, register, do hereby certify that lots 1, 2, and 3, section 18, T. 30 S., R. 14 E., M. D. M., were approved to the state of California by Hon. secretary of interior on March 2, 1875. Indemnity sections.

"WM. R. WHEATON, Register."

We are not cited to any statute which makes such a certificate evidence. If the secretary did so list the land to the state, the list transmitted to the register was on file in his office, and a copy might have been procured; but to give such a certificate is no part of the official duty of the register. There was no other evidence of this essential fact, and, as the court erred in receiving this, a new trial must be ordered. So ordered.

DURKEE v. COTA et ux. (No. 11,741.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 12, 1887.)

COVENANT—ACTION FOR BREACH—PLEADING—AMBIGUITY.

In an action by plaintiff to compel defendants to furnish more water, in pursuance of a covenant, in a contract for the sale of land, "to sell a full and abundant water-right for all of the above land," the pleading set out the contract in hæc verba, but did not explain for what the water was needed, nor put a definite construction on the contract by any averment. Held, that a demurrer for ambiguity was properly sustained.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; H. M. WILLIS, Judge. Daniel Durkee, plaintiff, sued Leonardo Cota and Ynez Yorba de Cota, defendants, to compel them to furnish more water for certain lands purchased of them, under a covenant in the contract of sale. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appealed.

Byron Waters, for appellant. Rowell & Rowell, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. The complaint sets out a contract in hæc verba for the conveyance of land. This contract contains the following covenant: "We also agree to sell a full and abundant water-right for all of the above land." In pursuance of this contract, the defendants conveyed the land, and also a water-right, which the plaintiff alleges was not sufficient, and which he says he was induced to accept by the fraudulent misrepresentations of defendants. A demurrer was sustained on the ground that the covenant as to the water-right was too uncertain to be enforced, and final judgment was given against plaintiff on demurrer.

Whether or not the contract is so uncertain that it could not be interpreted by the aid of surrounding circumstances,—to be proved by evidence,—need not be determined. It is evident that the covenant is ambiguous. For what purpose was the water-right to be "full and abundant,"—for any particular purpose, or for all purposes which the fancy of the plaintiff might suggest? The pleading does not enlighten us on this point. It simply sets out a copy of the contract, leaving it to speak for itself. It is obvious that the pleading must partake of whatever ambiguity there is in the contract. It is perfectly proper to set out a contract in hæc verba. But in such case, if the contract is uncertain, the pleader must put some definite construction on it by averment. As remarked in Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 253: "The instrument which is thus adopted as a part of the complaint must show upon its face in direct terms, and not by implication, all the facts which the pleader would have to allege under the former mode of pleading by averment." The appellant's counsel urges in his brief that evidence would be admissible in aid of the contract. Possibly it would, and possibly, also, it might remove the uncertainty. But it would not cure the defects in the pleading. The ambiguity was sufficiently pointed out by the demurrer, and we think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

LARSEN v. HANSEN. (No. 12,125.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 13, 1887.)

PARENT AND CHILD—STEP-CHILDREN—SUPPORT—IMPLIED PROMISE TO PAY FOR.

Civil Code Cal. § 209, provides that if a husband receives his wife's children by a former husband into his family, and supports them, it is presumed he does it as a father, and they are not liable to him for support, nor he to them for services. Plaintiff sued defendant, her step-father, on a note for money loaned. She had lived in his family for many years; had had an illegitimate child, who also had been treated as one of defendant's children. Defendant pleaded as a counter-claim the board and lodging of plaintiff's child. Held, that no implied promise to pay for the support arose under these circumstances, and, as there was no express agreement to do so, the counter-claim was properly disallowed.¹

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Anna H. C. Larsen, plaintiff, sued H. F. Hansen, defendant, on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

Wigginton, Creed & Hawes, for appellant, W. D. Tupper, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an action upon a promissory note made by defendant, March 1, 1886, for $1,128, with interest at 1 per cent. per month. Defendant set up as a counter-claim the expenditure of $250 at the instance and request of plaintiff, and a further charge by way of counter-claim of $20 per month for 24 months, board and lodging, care and custody, of the infant child of plaintiff. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Defendant was allowed $107 for money found to have been laid out and expended by him for plaintiff, and that plaintiff was not indebted to defendant in any sum for the board or lodging or care or custody of her infant child. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appealed.

It appears from the statement that defendant married the mother of the plaintiff when the latter was about the age of 12 years, and that from the date of such marriage plaintiff lived in and as one of the family of defendant for many years, and finally gave birth to an illegitimate child, which has always lived with and been treated as one of defendant's children, but was never legally adopted as such; defendant declining to so adopt it. There was no agreement or understanding that defendant should receive compensation for the care and support of the child. Plaintiff, who is now married, lived with defendant in like manner, performing some services in the family, and was subject to no charge for her support. The consideration of the note upon which suit is brought was money received by plaintiff from the estate of her deceased father, and loaned to defendant. A parent is bound to support his own children. "A husband is not bound to maintain his wife's children by a former husband; but if he receives them into his family, and supports them, it is presumed that he does so as a parent; and where such is the case they are not liable to him for their support, nor he to them for their services." Civil Code, § 209.

Ordinarily, one who performs services for another may recover therefor upon the presumption which the law raises of a promise or liability therefor on the part of the person benefited. In these cases the law presumes the fact of the promise from the services rendered, and the benefit arising therefrom. It is a conclusion to which the mind readily comes from a knowledge of the particular case, and from the ordinary motives of men in their dealings with their fellow-men; but when the transaction so far departs from the usual practices of men in dealing with each other as to raise a probability that the service was prompted by love and affection, by benevolence or charity, or by any motive other than gain, the implied promise is not indulged.

As a parent may not recover for the support and maintenance of his child, and is not liable for the services of the latter, so one occupying the position of loco parentis, in the absence of an express contract, is subject to the same rule. A man is not legally bound to maintain his nephews and nieces; yet, if they live with him as members of his family, without any contract or understanding that he shall pay for their services, or receive pay for their maintenance, the law will not imply a promise to pay on either side. Robinson v. Cushman, 2 Denio, 149; Andrus v. Foster, 17 Vt. 556; Fitch v. Peckham, 16 Vt. 150; Williams v. Hutchinson, 3 N. Y. 312; Starkie v. Perry, 12 Pac. Rep. 508.

Under the circumstances detailed in evidence, we are of opinion no implied promise on the part of the plaintiff to pay defendant for the support and maintenance of her child arises, and as no express agreement so to do was proven, the court was warranted in finding in favor of plaintiff on that issue. The finding on this question is not as full and explicit as is desirable, but is deemed sufficient in substance.

The other questions raised are not important to the decision.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SUTRO et al v. PETIT, County Treasurer. (No. 11,665.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 16, 1887.)

1. COUNTIES—BONDS—AUTHORITY TO ISSUE—OVERISSUE.

St. Cal. 1871-72, p. 369, authorized the board of supervisors of a county to issue bonds of the county for the purpose of erecting a court-house, "not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $40,000." The board issued 400 in number for $100 each, and also issued 20 additional bonds, which were purchased for value before maturity, and in the ordinary course of business. They were in form negotiable, and the interest on them was paid for several years. In supposed accordance with St. 1883, p. 305, which provided that the board of supervisors of any county having an outstanding indebtedness, evidenced by bonds, could pay them with the proceeds of the sale of new bonds issued for that purpose, the board issued and sold new bonds, realizing over $42,000, and ordered the whole number to be paid. Held, that as the board had no power to issue bonds without express authority of the legislature, the 20 additional bonds were overissues, and the county treasurer was right in refusing their payment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

J. R. Patten and Jasper N. Turner, for appellant. J. M. Wilcox, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of San Luis Obispo county, rendered on a writ of mandamus, commanding the appellant to pay to the respondents certain bonds alleged to have been issued by said county.

The legislature, by an act passed April 4, 1870, which was amended by an act passed March 14, 1872, authorized the board of supervisors of the county of San Luis Obispo to issue bonds of said county, "not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $40,000," for the purpose of erecting a court-house. St. 1869-70, p. 816; St. 1871-72, p. 369. The act provides what interest the bonds should bear, and when they should be payable, and that they should be "of such denominations, respectively, as the board shall order." It is also provided that the clerk of the board should keep a register of the date and number of each bond issued, and the amount realized from the sale thereof, with the name of the purchaser. Two copies of said register were required to be made by the clerk; one to be kept in the office of the county auditor, and the other in the office of the county treasurer. The bonds were to be issued from time to time as the work on the court-house progressed. The board determined that the bonds should be of the denomination of $100, and accordingly 400 bonds were issued, and numbered consecutively from 1 to 400, which, of course, amounted to $40,000, the whole amount allowed by the act. But 20 additional bonds were issued, numbered from 401 to 420, which were overissues, and entirely unauthorized by the act. These 20 last-named bonds were purchased by respondent for a valuable consideration before maturity, and in the ordinary course of business, and are the subject of this litigation. They were in form negotiable. Interest was paid on them for several years. On the first day of January, 1880, they were outstanding and unpaid.

Subdivision 14 of section 25 of the county government act (St. 1883, p. 305) provides that "the board of supervisors of any county having an outstanding indebtedness on the first day of January, 1880, evidenced by bonds or warrants thereof," may fund or refund the same, or may pay them with the proceeds of the sale of new bonds issued for that purpose. In supposed accordance with this provision, the board of supervisors of San Luis Obispo county, on May 4, 1885, ordered that the whole of said 420 court-house bonds, amounting to $42,000, together with $10,000 of road-repair bonds, be redeemed and paid with the proceeds of the sale of $52,000 worth of new bonds. The new bonds were issued and sold, realizing over $52,000. The appellant (treasurer) paid all of said court-house bonds, numbered from 1 to 400, but refused to pay the said 20 bonds held by respondents, numbered from 401 to 420; and from the judgment of the superior court commanding him to pay them the treasurer appeals.

There is a line of judicial decisions in cases where the validity of municipal bonds depended on the happening of some precedent contingency of fact, and the question was whether the officers executing the bonds were vested with the discretion or power to determine if the contingency had happened. For instance, when municipal officers have been authorized to issue bonds in aid of railroads, after a proposition to issue them shall have been adopted by the people at an election, the question has frequently arisen whether the officers had power to determine that such election had been properly held, and whether a recital of that fact on the face of the bonds was binding on the municipality. And on such questions the decisions of courts have not been uniform. The subject will be found fully discussed, and authorities cited and quoted, in the last few pages of 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. But no such question arises in the case at bar. The validity of the bonds issued under the act of April 4, 1870, did not depend upon any fact—any matter in pais—to be determined by the supervisors. The power to issue the bonds, and the limitation of that power, depend wholly upon the language of the act itself, and not upon any extrinsic contingency. There was nothing left to the discretion of the officers, as in the case of Porter v. Haight, 45 Cal. 631, nor was there any authority to do what "might appear to them advantageous to the county," as in Bank v. Steinmitz, 64 Cal. 301. Neither can the doctrine of estoppel, or of ratification, or of bona fide holding be successfully invoked by respondents. Those doctrines can be invoked against municipal corporations—if at all—only in cases of informality, irregularity, etc., on the part of an authorized agent. Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) §§ 457, 463, 511–553, and cases cited. "Where there is a total want of authority to issue municipal bonds, there can be no bona fide holding of them." East Oakland v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255. It is clear—in this state at least—that the issuance of bonds is not within the scope of the general and ordinary powers of a board of supervisors, and that such bonds can be legally issued only by virtue of express authority of the legislature. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 85, 507, and cases there cited; Lindon v. Case, 46 Cal. 172; Wallace v. Mayor, 29 Cal. 181; El Dorado Co. v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 521; Robinson v. Supervisors of Sacramento, 16 Cal. 208; Foster v. Coleman, 10 Cal. 281; People v. Supervisors of El Dorado Co., 11 Cal. 170. The bonds in question, therefore, were issued without any authority at all, and are wholly void. And the action of the board of May 4, 1885, ordering these bonds to be redeemed, was, of course, of no value. The character of one void act of public officers cannot be changed by a second void act of the same officers, declaring the first act to be valid.

It is quite probable that the respondents paid full par value for these bonds, and that they will lose their money. But "those who contract with a municipal corporation are bound to know the extent of the power of its officers." Wallace v. Mayor, supra. Respondents would have discovered the worthlessness of the bonds upon the slightest inquiry. At all events, hard cases cannot be allowed to make bad law. An overissue of $20,000 would have been no less valid than the overissue of $2,000; and any other rule would put the people of a county in the complete power of careless or unscrupulous public officers.

The judgment of the superior court is reversed, with direction to dismiss the proceeding.

CARR v. QUIGLEY. (No. 9,531.) *

(Supreme Court of California. December 19, 1887.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS DECIDED ON FORMER APPEAL.

The result of a former appeal in a suit involving the title to land claimed through a United States patent to a railroad company, where the judgment was reversed because the court below rejected evidence to the effect that, at the time the grant from congress to the railroad company took effect, the land was within the limits of a Mexican grant, then sub judice, is that if, at the time, the land was within the limits of a Mexican grant then sub judice, the patent was void, and could be attacked collaterally, and, the decision never having been appealed from, is not now subject to review.

2. PUBLIC LANDS—PATENTS—GRANT SUB JUDICE.

The Mexican government granted a certain described tract of land, known as "Las Pocitas," in 1839, which afterwards became a part of the state of California, "containing in all two square leagues." A survey of it was made by the surveyor general, which showed that ten leagues were included within the description. This survey was set aside by the secretary of the interior, on the ground that it contained more land than was called for in the grant, and a new survey was made, and approved by the secretary of the interior in 1871, and a patent for the two leagues issued upon this last survey in 1872. Held, that the grant was sub judice until the final survey was approved by the secretary of the interior, and a title to land contained within the exterior limits of the Mexican grant, claimed through a United States patent to a railroad company in 1862, was void.

3. SAME—CONFLICTING TITLES—OPINION OF COMMISSIONER—EFFECT ON PERSONS NOT PARTIES.

The Mexican government granted a certain described tract of land, which afterwards became a part of the state of California, "containing in all two leagues," and it actually contained ten leagues. The survey of the two leagues was made, and approved by the secretary of the interior in 1871, and a patent issued in 1872. Upon an action in ejectment by a person who claimed title to land within the limits of the grant, through a patent from congress to a railroad company in 1862, held, that the defendant was not affected by opinions of the commissioner and the secretary of the interior, in proceedings in the land-office to which he was not a party, to the effect that a preliminary survey made in 1854, but never approved by the secretary of the interior, established the exterior limits of the Mexican grant.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; A. M. CRANE, Judge.

Shafter, Parker & Waterman, for appellant. Mich. Mullany, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Ejectment. The plaintiff claims through a United States patent issued to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as successor in interest of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, under the act of July 1, 1862, and the amendatory acts. The defendant was in possession at the commencement of the action, claiming that the land was public land, and that he had complied with the pre-emption laws. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. Inasmuch as the plaintiff relies solely upon a paper title, he must recover upon the strength of that title. It is therefore immaterial whether the defendant's pre-emption proceedings were regular or not. The question is as to the validity of the patent.

Upon the former appeal, the judgment was reversed, because the court below rejected evidence to the effect that, at the time the grant from congress to the company took effect, the land was within the limits of a Mexican grant then sub judice. Carr v. Quigley, 57 Cal. 395. The necessary result of this decision (although it is not stated in terms) is that, if at said time the land was within the exterior limits of a Mexican grant then sub judice, the patent was void, and could be attacked collaterally. The case does not appear to have been taken to the supreme court of the United States, and consequently the decision became the law of the case, and is not now subject to review. This is a familiar rule in this state, and, as we understand, it prevails in the federal court. Ex parte Sibbald, 12 Pet. 491; Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. 413.

The record before us recites that, upon the retrial in the court below, the defendant "proved by testimony and established," among other things, that the Mexican government, in 1839, granted to Jose Noriega and Robert Livermore a tract of land known as "Las Pocitas," and described as follows, viz.: "Bounded on the north by the Lomas de las Cuevas; on the east by the Sierra de Buenos Ayres; on the south by the dividing line of the establishment of San Jose, and on the west by the rancho of Don Jose Dolores Pacheco; containing in all two square leagues, a little more or less, provided that quantity be contained within the said boundaries; and, if less than that quantity be found to be contained therein, then that less quantity, and all of said described tract of land." This grant was confirmed by the same description by the board of land commissioners on February 14, 1854, and by the United States district court on February 18, 1859. Among the things which defendant "proved by testimony and established" was that the tract in controversy was "within the boundaries designated and set forth in the said decree of the board of land commissioners and the United States district court." And this was expressly stipulated on the motion for new trial. Was this grant sub judice at the time of the location of the line of the road, viz., on April 16, 1868? The decree of the district court was affirmed by the supreme court in 1861; the mandate being filed in the lower court in October, 1865. In that year a "final" survey was made by one Dyer, a deputy in the office of the surveyor general. By this survey it would seem that nearly 10 leagues were included in the description above given. This survey was approved by the surveyor general in 1867, and by the commissioner of the land-office in 1868, but was set aside by the secretary of the interior on July 30, 1868, on the ground that it included a great deal more land than the two leagues which the grantees were entitled to. A new survey was made in 1869, and approved by the secretary of the interior in 1871, and a patent for the two leagues was issued upon this last survey on August 20, 1872.

We think that the grant must be considered sub judice until the final survey was approved by the secretary of the interior. The underlying idea of the decision on the former appeal, and of the case which it followed, (Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761,) was that congress had not by its grant undertaken to prejudice the validity of claims then pending, but had intended to except the land covered by such claims from the operation of its grant to the company. Now, to say that the congressional grant covered land within the exterior limits of a Mexican grant at a time when it could not be known what portion within those limits the Mexican grant would take, is to say that congress had prejudged the matter. Until a final survey was made, it could not be known what portion within the exterior limits the two leagues would cover; and until such survey was approved by the secretary of the interior it was subject to be set aside by him, as was the case with the Dyer survey, made in 1865.

If, therefore, the case stood as it did at the close of the defendant's evidence, it would, we think, be perfectly clear that the judgment should be affirmed. But, in order to overcome the effect of the defendant's evidence, the plaintiff proved that a "preliminary" survey had been made in 1854 by one Lewis, a deputy in the surveyor general's office. This survey included about four leagues, but did not take in the land in controversy here. It was "approved" by the surveyor general, but the date of such approval does not appear. The plaintiff also put in evidence proceedings in the land-office in contests between other parties, and the opinions therein of the commissioner of the land-office and the secretary of the interior, to the effect that land outside of the Lewis survey was not a part of the ranch; in other words that the Lewis survey established the exterior limits of the Mexican grant. As a matter of course, the defendant here, not having been a party to such proceedings, cannot be affected by them. They were probably offered by counsel to show that, in the view of the authorities of the land-office, the Lewis survey established the exterior boundaries of the rancho, and were doubtless admitted by the court below upon the somewhat loose principle that, inasmuch as there was no jury, they could do no harm.

It is a very serious question whether the appellant is not precluded by his stipulation from maintaining that the Lewis survey established the exterior boundaries of the rancho. He stipulated in the court below that the tract in controversy is outside of the Lewis survey, and his argument here is based upon that fact, which is necessary to his position. Taking that fact as established, it follows that, if the Lewis survey established the exterior boundaries, the tract in controversy must be outside of them. But the appellant further stipulated in the court below that the tract in controversy is within the exterior boundaries. Can he, in the face of this stipulation, be permitted to affirm on appeal that the tract is not within those boundaries? This argument does not cut both ways. It is true that the respondent stipulated that the tract is outside of the Lewis survey; but he has not stipulated, and does not affirm, that the Lewis survey established the exterior boundaries of the rancho. If, however, we assume, in favor of the appellant, that he is not precluded by the stipulation from maintaining that the Lewis survey established the exterior boundaries of the rancho, we must, with submission to the learned commissioner of the land-office and the learned secretary of the interior, be permitted to doubt whether this survey had any such effect. We are unable to see how a "preliminary" survey, made before the decree of the district court, could be final, or how, if it was not final, it could "establish" the exterior boundaries of the rancho. The time to appeal to the district court had not expired, and therefore the case was then pending; and that is equivalent to saying that it was sub judice. To say that a pending case is not sub judice is a contradiction in terms. It is equally a contradiction in terms to say that a "preliminary" survey could effect a final segregation. For this reason it seems to us very clear that this survey did not "establish" anything, and we should dismiss the subject without further consideration were it not for the deference due to the opinion of the learned heads of the land department. Their opinion seems to us to rest upon several unfounded assumptions, which we will examine.

1. It is assumed that the Lewis survey was intended to be of the exterior boundaries of the rancho, as distinct from the tract claimed by the grantees; and that, although the survey did not stand as a delineation of the tract to which the grantees were entitled, it might stand as a delineation of a larger tract within which the tract claimed by the grantees was to be located. We see nothing in the record before us which justifies this assumption. In the instructions of the surveyor general to Lewis, it is stated that the attorneys for one of the claimants had applied for a survey of Las Pocitas, "a tract of land claimed by the latter;" that "the claim" had been confirmed, as per the description above quoted, by the board of land commissioners; and that the survey made was to "conform to the above decree." Lewis, who was called as a witness, testified that what he made out was "the initiatory survey of the Rancho Las Pocitas claimed by Robert Livermore." We see nothing to indicate that the survey was intended to be of a tract from which the claim of Livermore was to be segregated. It purported to be what he claimed. It did not stand for this; and we do not see how it can stand for something else which it did not purport to be.

2. It is assumed that the survey was made in pursuance of a statute of the United States. The opinion of Commissioner Drummond says that the survey was "evidently made pursuant to act of congress approved August 31, 1852." The only act of this date which has any relation to the matter is the general appropriation bill, which contains the following provision: "For surveying private land claims in California which may have been presented in good faith to the board of land commissioners, $22,500: provided, that the authority hereby conferred upon the surveyor general shall apply only to such unconfirmed cases as in the gradual extension of the lines of the public surveys he shall find within the immediate sphere of his operations, and which he is satisfied ought to be respected and actually surveyed in advance of confirmation." 10 St. U. S. 91. This claim was not "unconfirmed" by the land commission; it does not appear to have been "within the immediate sphere of his operations" upon the public surveys; and, what seems absolutely conclusive, it was not a survey made at public expense, and hence could not come within the purview of a provision appropriating public money. The surveyor general, in his instructions to Lewis, expressly says to him: "As this is a preliminary survey, for your compensation you will make arrangements with the claimant. I shall add that under no circumstances will this office be responsible for any surveys connected with the execution of these instructions." The survey, then, was not made under the above-mentioned act of 1852, as supposed by the learned commissioner. He refers for illustration to the act of March 3, 1853; but it is apparent that this act had nothing to do with the Lewis survey. It provides that the surveyor general "shall also cause all private claims to be surveyed after they have been confirmed, so far as may be necessary to complete the surveys of the public lands;" and that "for surveying the base and meridian lines, and private claims, and meandering navigable waters, the deputy surveyor shall be allowed not exceeding $16 per mile." 10 St. U. S. 245. This provision is for a survey to be made at the public expense where necessary "to complete the surveys of the public lands." The Lewis survey does not appear to have been necessary for that purpose, and was made at the expense of private parties.

It may be added, although it is not suggested by the learned commissioner, that it was not made under the act of 1860, and hence is not within the decision of Railroad Co. v. Garcia, 64 Cal. 515, 2 Pac. Rep. 397. The act of 1860, upon which that case was decided, was passed more than five years after the Lewis survey was made. If it be assumed that it could have any relation to the Lewis survey, there is nothing in the record to show that the publication required by the act was had. We see nothing to indicate that the survey had any official character or stamp. It was expressly said to be merely "preliminary," and was made at private expense; the surveyor general instructing his deputy to "run any lines which any contending parties may desire you to run, if they are willing adequately to compensate you for such work;" and "to qualify as if performing public work." The probability is that the claimants knew that no final survey could be had until the matter had passed through the courts, or the time to appeal had expired, but wanted for their own information to get an approximate idea of where their lines would run; hence this "preliminary" survey.

3. The opinion of the learned commissioner seems to assume that this preliminary survey, which had no force of itself, could derive force from the acts in pais of the claimants; for he dwells at some length upon the fact that the survey was made at the instance of the claimants, who assisted therein, and consequently knew all about where the lines were run, but made no sort of protest or objection thereto. Of this it may be remarked that the record here does not show any such condition of affairs; the statements in the opinion of the commissioner not being evidence against the defendant. But, in addition to this, we do not think that the word "claim," as used in the legislation on the subject, was intended to be controlled or defined by the conduct of the parties. That would be too vague and uncertain a test. The "claims" referred to must have been founded upon writings. And where, as here, the writings were presented to and confirmed by the land commission, the description in the decree could not be added to or varied by the acts in pais of the parties. The principal of estoppel can have no application. In the first place, no action was taken by the government, or by anybody else, upon the faith of this survey; and, in the second place, subsequent pre-emp-tions do not in any sense claim through the claimants under the Mexican grant.

We think the Lewis survey does not overcome the effect of the case made by the defendant, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

By THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

In re REINHARDT'S ESTATE. (No. 11,418.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 20, 1887.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE ON CONDITION—INTESTACY AS TO REMAINDER.

Testatrix bequeathed to her husband the use and income of all her property as long as he remained a widower, without power to dispose of or incumber the same, and with the proviso that, should he marry again, her share in the common property should go to her children. Held that, under this will, the husband was entitled to the use and income of the property as long as he remained a widower, and, as to the fee, the decedent died intestate, and one-third should go to the husband, and the remaining two-thirds to the children, in accordance with the provisions of Civil Code Cal. § 1386, regulating the distribution of estates.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

This was an appeal from a decree of distribution of the estate of Caroline Reinhardt, deceased. The appeal is brought by the children of the deceased, namely: Augusta Henrici, Flora Muller, Charlotte Brand, and Louis Reinhardt, and J. C. Bates and G. A. Fudickar as assignees of Augusta Henrici. The respondent is John B. Reinhardt, husband of the deceased.

J. M. Wood and Jos. Rothschild, for appellants. Stanly, Stony & Hayes, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution made and entered by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The case here presented turns on the meaning of the following portion of the will of the deceased above named: "I give and bequeath to my said husband, John B. Reinhardt, the use and income of all my property of which I may die possessed, to his sole use and benefit, as long as he remains my widower; provided, however, and it is hereby made an express condition, that he shall not be authorized to sell, convey, or dispose of, or mortgage, or in any way incumber, any of such property. But, in case he should marry again, then I direct that my share in the common property shall go to my children." The property subject to distribution, and distributed by the decree, was the separate property of the testatrix. No common property is involved herein, for there was none at the time the decree was rendered. J. B. Reinhardt, the husband mentioned in the will, remained unmarried and a widower. Four children survive the testatrix. The court held that J. B. Reinhardt took and held the use and income of the estate under the will as long as he remained the widower of the deceased; that is, that he took a determinable life-estate under the will only; and as to all the estate, except this determinable life-estate, the decedent died intestate. The court, having so held, then proceeded to distribute the estate according to the statute of descent in this state, and ordered its distribution as follows: To J. B. Reinhardt, widower of said deceased above named, the use and income of all the real and personal estate of decedent, and an undivided one-third in fee of said estate; to the children, or those who represented them, the residue.

There can be no doubt that the husband, J. B. Reinhardt, took a determinable life-estate, as the court ruled. That the remaining portion of the fee is undisposed of by the will is equally clear. We say "portion of the fee remaining," for the reason that the particular estate and the remainder, and, here, the life-estate, and that which is left at its termination, constitute one estate,—the fee. They are different and distinct parts of one whole. 2 Bl. Comm. 164. There is in the will no disposition of the residuum. We can perceive nothing in the words, "but, in case he should marry again, then I direct that my share of the common property shall go to my children," adverse to such a conclusion. The fact that there was no common property of the testatrix does not alter the words of the devise of the common property; nor does the ignorance of the testator of the signification of the words used by him in a will affect the meaning which should attach to them.

A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator. Civil Code, § 1317. The intent is to be deduced from the words of the will. The meaning of the words employed in the will evince the intent. These words "must be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected, and that other can be ascertained." Civil Code, § 1324. "Where the words employed are technical, they are to be taken in their technical sense, unless the context clearly indicates a contrary intention." Civil Code, § 1327. There is nothing in the context here which shows that the words "common property" were not used in their technical sense. To give a different sense to the words of a will, because the testator did not know their meaning, would be contrary to every rule adopted for the construction of such instruments, and would in effect do away with the statute which requires them to be in writing. There is nothing inconsistent in devising the use and income of separate property to one for life, leaving the residue of the separate property undisposed of, and the common property to another when the life-estate terminates. If the testator had no power to devise common property, or had none to devise, we cannot see that the meaning of the words of the will would be changed or affected thereby. A devise of common property when there was none would not convey separate property. If a testator thought, as a matter of law, or was so advised by counsel learned in the law, that he could pass a right to it by will, while under the law he could not, it could not be held, unless we disregard the law, that such a provision in a will should be construed to refer to and pass property which he could devise. As well might it be contended that a bequest of a watch, when the testator did not have one to bequeath, would pass some other article of personal property; or that a devise of a city lot, when the testator did not own one, would pass a farm in the country. As to the remainder of the separate property after the life-estate carved out of the fee has come to an end, the will is absolutely silent, unless we can hold that a life-estate of such property is the fee, which would be absurd.

We can find nothing in the will before us which tends to maintain the view that the children of the testator took the whole property distributed when the surviving husband married or died, under a devise arising by implication. As to the portion of the fee remaining on the termination of the life-estate, the will, as we have said above, and we say again, is silent. There is, then, nothing to support the implication. The foundation is wanting on which such implication can arise or stand. The implication must arise from and stand on something expressed in the will. It must be deduced from something said in the will. When the will is silent, and there is nothing from which an implication can be deduced, no implication can be indulged. We can discover in the will before us no devise by implication of the character mentioned. There is nothing in the point just discussed to alter the conclusion of intestacy heretofore announced.

If a larger estate will not be implied where a smaller estate is expressly granted, and we think this is sound law, (see Schouler, Wills, §§ 559, 561,) it cannot be held that a bequest or devise of common property is under any circumstances a bequest of separate property. Nickerson v. Bowly, 8 Metc. 424, supports the result we have reached. The case cited arose upon the will of Thomas Rider, which was in these words: "As to such worldly interests as God hath been pleased to bless me with in this life, I give, bequeath, devise, and dispose of the same in the following manner, viz.: I give and bequeath to my wife, Polly Rider, the use and improvement of all my estate, real and personal and mixed, for her own use and benefit, so long as she may continue my widow. I also constitute and appoint my wife, Polly Rider, to be executor of this, my last will and testament." No other disposition of any part of the testator's estate was made by will. He left no issue. Polly Rider died unmarried, having enjoyed the use and improvement of the estate during her life. She left a will appointing Bowly, the appellee, her executor. On the distribution of Thomas Rider's estate, one-half of it was decreed to the executor of Polly Rider, (In the report of this case there is some confusion in the name of the testator. The name is stated on page 424 to be Thomas Rider. On the succeeding page, in stating the estate to be distributed under the will, it is said to be that of David Rider. The words used are "said David Rider." As there is no David Rider mentioned before, and Thomas Rider is the only one of that name mentioned, the implication is irresistible that the estate distributed was that of Thomas Rider.) The opinion is by SHAW, C. J., (no one dissenting.) After referring to the statute of distributions, under which the widow of an intestate, there being no issue, was entitled to have one-half of the estate distributed to her, he proceeded: "It is a well-established rule of law that the right to a distributive share of personal estate, under the statute of distributions, is a vested interest, vesting, in point of right, at the time of the decease of the intestate, although the persons to take, and the amount to be received, must be ascertained and determined by a decree of the probate court; which, from various causes affecting the settlement of the estate, may not be made till long afterwards. Davers v. Dewes, 3 P. Wms. 49, note; Foster v. Fifield, and Hayward v. Hayward, 20 Pick. 70, 519. It seems to follow as a necessary consequence that Mrs. Rider's vested right to one-half of the personal property, subject to the gift of the use thereof to herself for life, like all other vested rights to personal property, went to her personal representatives. Such was the view which appears to have been taken of the case by the probate court; and we are of opinion that it was correct."

In the case cited, it was urged that it could not be reasonably inferred that it was the intention of the testator, after giving the property to his wife for life, that he intended that the life-tenant should have any part of it absolutely, and, in the absence of all expression of his intentions, it should be construed as a gift to his heirs by implication. As to this, the learned justice said: "A gift by implication must be founded upon some expressions in the will from which such intention can be inferred. It cannot be inferred from an absolute silence on the subject. It may be admitted, in a popular sense, that, when a deceased person has given a part of his property to one object of his bounty, he had no intention that such person should take another portion. But we think the true answer is that the intention of the testator is to govern so far only as he has communicated that intention by his will, either in terms or by implication; but, if he has left undevise property, the disposition of it is not governed by his will, but by another rule, having its origin in another source, in the application of which the intent of the testator is not the governing rule, and can have no influence. It operates in the same manner as if the deceased had left no other property, and made no will. If, therefore, the intent of the testator not to give the remainder to the same person could reasonably be inferred from a gift of personal property to one for life, in terms, it could have no effect in regulating the disposition of intestate property. If, however, it were thought important to inquire into the intent of the deceased, where he has made a will, but left property undisposed of, either in terms or by implication, as every man is presumed to know the law, it may reasonably be inferred as his intention that the residue should be disposed of according to law." The opinion then proceeds to state that the point seems to be well settled, both in England and Massachusetts, and cites Davers v. Dewes, 3 P. Wms. 40; Dicks v. Lambert, 4 Ves. 725. 732; Briggs v. Hosford, 22 Pick. 288; Ex parte Kempton, 23 Pick. 163. See, also, Schouler, Wills, § 568, and cases cited in notes. In the case just above cited the parties setting up the claim to the part distributed to the representative of Polly Rider were collateral heirs, and personal property was also involved. But these facts do not detract from it as authority here. We will add further, in the case cited by counsel for appellant (Robinson v. Greene, 14 R. I. 181) a devise by implication was allowed because the conclusion was irresistible. The court so said; at the same time observing that "the rule in regard to devises and bequests by implication is very strict." Page 101.

The subject of devises raised by implication is much discussed in Parker v. Tootal, 11 H. L. Cas. 143. We think the conclusion here reached is sustained by what is said in that case. We refer particularly to the observations of the lord chancellor (WESTBURY) on page 162, as well as to the judgments of the other law lords therein. Lord WESTBURY, in his argument, lays stress on the rule that the intention must be collected from the language that the testator has used, and that, if the language is satisfied by going to a certain extent, there is no obligation to go further; which last is, in our judgment, but saying that a court cannot go further, consistently with the well-settled rule.

We are of opinion the court ruled correctly that, as to the residue of the fee above defined, the decedent, Caroline Reinhardt, died intestate. The property of persons dying intestate descends, under the statute, to those mentioned in it, of which the surviving husband is one. As to the residue of the property, not passing to the husband, of which the testator died intestate, it descended, under the statute, to her children. The intestate in this case left four children. In such a condition of the family, one-third vested at the time of the death of Caroline in the surviving husband, Reinhardt, and the other two-thirds in her children in right, but not in its enjoyment, until the date at which they were entitled to distribution.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. December 20, 1887.)

1. MECHANIC'S LIEN—MATERIAL MEN—RIGHTS AGAINST OWNER—PAYMENTS MADE BEFORE DUE.

Under the California mechanic's lien law, as it existed prior to the amendment of March 18, 1885, the liens of material-men furnishing materials to a contractor are subject to the original contract. Held, that where, by the terms of the contract, a portion of the price is to be paid as the work progresses, and the balance a month after the work is completed, the owner, if he pays the full price before it becomes due, is liable to the material-man for materials furnished to the extent of the money thus paid before due.

2. SAME—PRIORITIES—HOMESTEAD.

Civil Code Cal. § 1240, provides that a homestead is not exempt from execution or forced sale on debts secured by mechanics', laborers', or vendors' liens upon the premises. Held that, under this section, a homestead cannot be sold under the lien of a material-man, even though the materials were furnished before the homestead was declared, the lien being filed subsequent to the declaration.¹

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

This was an action brought by T. Walsh against J. C. McMenemy, Mary McMenemy, his wife, and George Brittlestone, to enforce a lien for materials furnished to said Brittlestone, as contractor, to be used in the construction of a house for said McMenemy. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

Bicknell & White and H. T. Gage, for appellants. Barclay & Wilson and Wells, Van Dyke & Lee, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien in favor of a material-man, and for labor performed. Plaintiff had judgment; from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants J. C. McMenemy and Mary J. McMenemy, his wife, appeal. The defendant Mary J. McMenemy owned a lot of land in the city of Los Angeles. Her husband, J. C. McMenemy, in 1884, made a contract with the defendant Brittlestone to build a house upon said lot of land. By the terms of the contract, 75 per cent. of the value of the work done was to be paid to the contractor upon the certificate of the architect, as the work progressed, and the balance of the contract price was to be paid within 35 days after the completion and delivery of the house, upon a certificate of the architect that the work had been done. Plaintiff furnished material to the contractor, which was used in the construction of the building, and finally the contractor, having failed to complete the work, performed labor to a small extent thereon, and it was completed within the time provided by the bondsmen of the contractor, without other expense to the owner than the contract price, which was $1,930. The building was completed April 28, 1885, accepted by McMenemy and wife, who went into possession, and have ever since occupied it. In January, 1885, and before the building was completed, defendant J. C. McMenemy paid the contractor in full for the erection of the building; all of which, except $1,100, was paid without any certificate from the architect, and before it fell due, and after plaintiff had notified him of his demand. The court finds that defendant Mary J. McMenomy had knowledge of the contract, and of the erection of the house upon her land, and consented to the same. Plaintiff's lien was filed May 25, 1885. Defendants McMenomy filed a homestead on the property in question, May 2, 1885. This was after the material was furnished by plaintiff, and used in the building, but, as may be seen, before plaintiff's lien was filed. Appellants make two points upon the judgment roll, viz.: (1) "The contract price having been paid before the filing of the lien, plaintiff has no cause of action;" (2) "the fact that a homestead was declared upon the premises prior to the filing of the notice of lien is itself sufficient to defeat this action."

Upon the first proposition, it has been held that under the law as it existed prior to the amendment of March 18, 1885, the liens of material-men furnishing materials to a contractor, and of laborers under such contractor, are subject to the original contract; and if, in accordance with the original contract, such contractor has been paid in full, or if, by reason of abandoning the contract, nothing remains due him, no lien can be enforced by the material-man or subcontractor. Dingley v. Greene, 54 Cal. 333, and cases there cited; McCants v. Bush, 70 Cal. 125, 11 Pac. Rep. 601; Wiggins v. Bridge, 70 Cal. 437, 11 Pac. Rep. 754; Turner v. Strenzel, 70 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. Rep. 389. The subcontractor cannot acquire any rights against the owner in violation of the terms of the original contract, and knowledge of a contract in writing by the owner with the original contractor charges him with notice. Bowen v. Aubrey, 22 Cal. 566. But, if the material-man and subcontractor are bound by the contract between the owner and original contractor, it should follow that when a contract is made by the owner for the construction of a building, by the terms of which a portion of the contract price is not due until after the building is completed, and when, as here, materials have been furnished for and used in the construction, presumably in view of such contract, and when thereafter, and with notice thereof, the owner pays his original contractor before the building is completed, and before the money is due, he must be held liable to the material-man to the extent of the money thus prematurely paid. To hold otherwise would be to enable the owner to practice a fraud; and the contract, instead of a chart for the direction of material-men, subcontractors, and laborers under the original contractor, would become a delusion and a fraud. We think this conclusion is fairly deducible from Renton v. Conley, 49 Cal. 185; Quale v. Moon, 48 Cal. 478, and other adjudicated cases,—in which, although the question is not directly adjudicated, yet the court in holding the owner not to be liable takes care to show his payments to have been made in compliance with the contract.

Does the fact that the homestead was declared upon the premises after the materials were furnished, but before the lien therefor was filed, defeat the lien? Homesteads, prior to March 9, 1887, were subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained—(1) * * *; (2) "on debts secured by mechanics', laborers', or vendors' liens, upon the premises," etc. Civil Code, § 1241. As the section omitted from the liens for which the homestead could be sold that of material-men, this court held in Richards v. Shear, 70 Cal. 187, 11 Pac. Rep. 607, that one who furnished materials for the construction of a building on real property, after it had been impressed with a homestead, could not obtain a lien thereon for the materials furnished.

But in the case at bar the homestead did not exist when the materials were furnished, and the question arises, does this alter the case? We think not. It is true the mechanic's lien law provides that "the liens provided for in this chapter [chapter 2] are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement, or structure was commenced, work done, or materials were commenced to be furnished; also to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance of which the lienholder had no notice, and which was unrecorded at the time," etc. Code Civil Proc. § 1186. So, too, section 1185 of the same Code provides that the land upon which a building is constructed shall be subject to the lien, if, at the commencement of the work, or of the furnishing of materials for the same, the land belonged to the person who caused the building to be constructed, etc. These provisions relate to liens generally, and apply to all property to which liens can attach.

The question still remains, can a lien for materials furnished be taken and enforced against a homestead under the law as it stood prior to March 18, 1885? Section 1240 of the Civil Code, hereinbefore referred to, exempts it from execution or forced sale, except in the cases specified, viz.: In satisfaction of judgments obtained before the declaration was filed for record, which constitute liens on the premises; on debts secured by mechanics', laborers', or vendors' liens; on mortgages executed and acknowledged by husband and wife; and on debts secured by mortgages executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record. A homestead can only be sold under execution or forced sale in these excepted cases, and, as a sale under a lien for materials furnished does not come within any of the exceptions enumerated, it cannot be enforced against the homestead. With the justice or injustice of the rule as fixed by the statute we have nothing to do. Its provisions must be enforced as to cases which arose while it was in existence. The recent change of the law will prevent this apparent injustice, to which the former statute gave rise.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; MCKINSTRY, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment, on the ground that the lien of a material-man cannot be enforced against a homestead. As to the other matters discussed in the opinion of the chief justice I express no opinion.

MACHADO v. FERNANDEZ. (No. 12,056.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 20, 1887.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—RIGHTS OF SURETIES—CONTRIBUTION.

Plaintiff and defendant were accommodation indorsers on a promissory note, payable on demand, with interest. More than one year after its date, the payee demanded payment, and, it not being made, brought suit. Plaintiff paid it without trial. Held, under Civil Code Cal. § 3214, which provides that mere delay in presenting a bill of exchange, payable, with interest, at sight or demand, does not exonerate any party thereto; and section 3248, which provides that the above section applies to promissory notes,—that the delay in presenting the note for more than one year did not exonerate the indorsers from payment, and defendant was liable for contribution.¹

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. A. GIBSON, Judge.

Action for contribution. Plaintiff, Juan Machado, and defendant, Vencente Fernandez, were accommodation indorsers. Plaintiff paid the debt, and sued for contribution. Defendant demurred. Demurrer sustained, and action dismissed. Plaintiff appealed.

¹A surety who voluntarily pays a promissory note is entitled to contribution from his co-sureties, notwithstanding he might have successfully resisted the enforcement of the note. Houck v. Graham, (Ind.) 6 N. E. Rep. 594. See note, Id. 599.

Harris & Allen, for appellant. Rowell & Rowell, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The facts of this case, as they are shown by the complaint, are as follows: The plaintiff and the defendant were accommodation indorsers of a promissory note, which was made and dated February 26, 1885, and was payable on demand, with interest. On the ninth day of July, 1886, the payee of the note demanded payment thereof from the makers, and, his demand not being complied with, gave notice of its dishonor to the indorsers. Subsequently the payee brought suit on the note against the makers and indorsers, and thereupon the plaintiff, without any trial of the case, paid to him the full amount due for principal, interest, and costs. This action was then commenced by the plaintiff to enforce contribution from the defendant of one-half of the amount so paid. A general demurrer was interposed to the complaint and sustained. Judgment was then entered against the plaintiff, and from that judgment he has appealed.

In support of the judgment, it is argued for the respondent that as the note was payable on demand, with interest, its apparent maturity, under section 3135 of the Civil Code, was one year after its date; and as it was not presented for payment till more than four months after that time had elapsed, and no reason for not sooner presenting it was shown, the indorsers were released from all liability, and consequently the payment by plaintiff was voluntary, and no cause of action for contribution was thereby created against the defendant. It is undoubtedly true that a payment, to be the foundation of a claim for contribution, must be compulsory; that is, there must be a fixed and positive obligation to pay. And if one has voluntarily paid money where there was no fixed and positive obligation resting upon him to pay it, he cannot maintain an action for contribution. The question then is, did the mere delay in presenting the note in question for payment for more than four months after its apparent maturity release the indorsers from all obligation to pay it?

The rule upon this subject has not been uniform. For example, it was held in this state, before the Codes were adopted, that a note, payable on demand with interest, must be presented within a reasonable time, in order to hold an indorser, and that, in the absence of any showing why the demand was not sooner made, a delay of two weeks was unreasonable. Keyes v. Fenstermaker, 24 Cal. 329. On the other hand, it has been held in New York that such a note is a continuing security; that an indorser remains liable upon it until demand is actually made; and that the holder is not chargeable with neglect for omitting to make such demand within any particular time. Merritt v. Todd, 23 N. Y. 28; Pardee v. Fish, 60 N. Y. 265. It is claimed for the appellant that the rule announced in Keyes v. Fenstermaker was changed by the provisions of the Civil Code, and that, in effect, the rule prevailing in New York was adopted. The sections of the Code referred to read as follows:

"Sec. 3135. The apparent maturity of a promissory note payable at sight or on demand is, (1) if it bears interest, one year after its date; or, (2) if it does not bear interest, six months after its date."

"Sec. 3248. If a promissory note, payable on demand or at sight, without interest, is not duly presented for payment within six months from its date, the indorsers thereof are exonerated, unless such presentment is excused."

"Sec. 3214. Mere delay in presenting a bill of exchange payable, with interest, at sight or demand, does not exonerate any party thereto."

"Sec. 3247. Chapter 1 of this title, and sections 3181 and 3214 of this Code, apply to promissory notes."

Now, if section 3214 be changed so as to apply to promissory notes, it will then read: "Mere delay in presenting a promissory note, payable with interest, at sight or on demand, does not exonerate any party thereto." What party is referred to by the words, "any party thereto?" It must be the indorser, for the maker, the surety, and the guarantors are never exonerated by any mere delay till the statute of limitations runs in their favor. It would seem, then, as claimed by the appellant, that a distinction is clearly made as to the liability of indorsers, between notes payable on demand without interest, and those payable on demand with interest. In the one case, it is clearly declared that the indorser is released from liability if the note is not duly presented for payment within six months after its date; and, in the other, that he is not released from liability by any mere delay in presenting it. If this be the correct construction of the sections cited, and we are unable to see how any other construction can be given them, it must follow that the indorsers upon the note in question were not released from their obligation to pay it because presentment and demand of payment were not sooner made. It must also follow that, when suit was brought against all the parties to the note, the plaintiff had the right to at once pay the amount due, and to then call upon the defendant to contribute his share of that amount.

In our opinion the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: HAYNE, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

In re ABBOTT. (No. 11,159.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 22, 1877.)

1. INSOLVENCY—PROCEDURE—TRIAL—ISSUE AND FINDINGS.

On petition, under the California insolvent act of 1880, to put a debtor into involuntary insolvency, the court made findings in favor of petitioners, but omitted to state that the indebtedness arose as set forth in the petition. Held, that the findings were intended to and did cover the whole issue, and a new trial will not be granted for the purpose of making the language more exact.

2. SAME—APPEAL—WHEN LIES—SUPPLEMENTAL ORDER.

A supplemental order requiring an insolvent to verify his schedule and inventory is not appealable, under the California insolvent act of 1880, § 67.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

Petition by J. F. Eubanks, William Thatcher, B. F. Broch, Phillips Bros. & Co., and Zederman & Co. to adjudge Alvin B. Abbott an insolvent debtor. A decree granting the prayer of the petition was entered in March, 1885; and from this, and an order to verify a schedule and inventory filed in the court, the insolvent appeals.

Wm. Shipsey and J. R. Patton, for appellant. McD. R. Venable and C. W. Goodchild, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is a proceeding commenced under the insolvent act of 1880 for the purpose of putting Alvin B. Abbott, an alleged insolvent, into involuntary insolvency. The court below adjudged him to be an insolvent debtor, and he has appealed; the case coming here on the judgment roll. Two points only are made by the appellant.

1. The petition was signed by five creditors only; one of them being Zederman & Co. In the petition it is alleged that "the said Alvin B. Abbott is indebted to said firm of Zederman & Co. in the sum of $86.36, on an account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by said firm to said Abbott at his instance and request," etc.; and also that "the said Alvin B. Abbott is further indebted to said firm of Zederman & Co. in the sum of $5, for monies paid on March 11, 1884, by said firm to one ——— Miller, at the written request of said Abbott." The answer denied that appellant "is or ever was indebted to the firm of Zederman & Co. in the sum of $86.36, or in any sum on an account for goods, wares, or merchandise sold or delivered by said firm to him, or for any other cause or thing." And it also denied that "he is indebted to said Zederman & Co. in the sum of $5, or in any sum whatsoever, for money paid by said firm to ——— Miller, or to any other person, at the written request of said Abbott or otherwise." The court found that Abbott was on October 13, 1884, the time when the proceeding was commenced, and still is, indebted to Zederman & Co. "in a certain sum of money, to-wit, $91.36, and that said firm of Zederman & Co. was on October 13, 1884, and still is, a creditor of said Alvin B. Abbott." It is claimed for the appellant that the finding is insufficient, because it does not appear from it that the indebtedness arose in the manner stated in the petition. But we think the finding can be sustained. The real question at issue was as to whether or not Zederman & Co. were creditors of Abbott, and this, as an ultimate fact, is clearly found against him. Besides, the amount of the indebtedness is named, and it exactly agrees with the aggregate of the sums named in the petition. The finding seems to have been intended to cover the whole issue, and we think it substantially does so. And, as said in McKinney v. Smith, 21 Cal. 385: "It is not requisite to order a new trial for the purpose of having the language of the finding made more exact, when it is sufficiently distinct as to the subject-matter of the action."

2. The order adjudging Abbott an insolvent directed "that said Alvin B. Abbott file in this court, within fifteen days from date hereof, a schedule and inventory in accordance with sections 3 and 4 of said act." Abbott filed an unverified schedule and inventory, and then the court made the following supplemental order. "It appearing to the court that the schedule and inventory filed herein by the above-named Alvin B. Abbott, on the thirteenth day of April, 1885, is not verified, now, on motion of counsel for petitioning creditors herein, it is ordered that the said Alvin B. Abbott file in this court, within three days after service upon him of a copy of this order, a schedule and inventory, in accordance with sections 3 and 4 of the insolvent act of 1880, verified by his affidavit." It is claimed that the court erred in requiring Abbott to verify his schedule and inventory; that sections 3 and 4 of the act are silent upon the subject of verification; and that section 5, which does provide for it, applies only to voluntary insolvents. The answer to this objection is that the order is not an appealable one, and we are therefore precluded from expressing any opinion in reference to it. Insolvent act 1880, § 67.

It follows that the order adjudging Abbott an insolvent should be affirmed, and the appeal from the order requiring him to file a verified schedule and inventory should be dismissed.

I concur: FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order adjudging Abbott insolvent is affirmed, and the appeal from the order requiring him to file a verified schedule and inventory is dismissed.

WELCH v. STROTHER, Auditor. (No. 12,282.)
(Supreme Court of California. December 23, 1887.)

1. COUNTIES—LIMIT OF LIABILITY—SALARIES OF OFFICERS FIXED BY LAW.

Act Cal. February 27, 1878, provided that neither the board of supervisors, nor any officer having power to authorize or contract liabilities against the county, shall authorize, contract for, or pay, in any one month, any demand against the treasury, or any of the funds thereof, which shall exceed one-twelfth of the amount allowed by law to be expended in the fiscal year of which the month is a part

Held, that salaries of officers fixed by law do not rest upon the authorization of the board of supervisors, or any officer, nor are they subject to their control, and consequently do not fall within the provisions of the act.

2. SAME.

Act Cal. February 27, 1878, provided that no county officer shall pay in any month demands against the treasury exceeding in amount one-twelfth of the amount allowed to be expended in the year. The board of supervisors of San Francisco county limited the expense of the county clerk's office for deputies and copyists to $72,000 per year. The auditor of the county refused to audit the bills of the county clerk's office for a certain month, because they aggregated $8,000. These bills included salaries fixed by law. On application for mandamus to compel the audit of the claims, the auditor based his answer upon Const. Cal. art. 11, § 18, which provides that no county shall incur any indebtedness exceeding in any one year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the electors. Held, that the amount fixed by the board of supervisors is not the limit of the revenue of the county clerk's office for salaries fixed by law, they being made payable out of the general fund of the county, and, in the absence of any showing that the general fund would be exhausted thereby, payment cannot be excused by the prohibition in the constitution.

In bank. Application for a writ of mandamus.

This was an application by L. W. Welch for a writ of mandamus directed to Fleet W. Strother, auditor of San Francisco county, commanding him to audit a claim for salary presented by the petitioner. The respondent moved to quash the writ, which motion was denied, and the respondent given 10 days to answer. The application now comes on to be heard on the merits.

McAllister & Bergin, for petitioner. George Flournoy, Jr., City and Co. Atty., (Samuel M. Wilson, of counsel,) for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. During the month of July, 1887, the petitioner was a regularly appointed and acting deputy county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, being register clerk of department 4 of the superior court of said city and county. His salary was fixed by law at $175 per month. In August, 1887, he presented his demand for his salary for the preceding month of July to the respondent, who was and is the auditor of said city and county, and he refused to audit the same. Petitioner then commenced this proceeding in mandamus in this court to compel the respondent to audit said demand.

The refusal of the respondent seems to have been based mainly upon these grounds: The board of supervisors passed an order fixing the estimate of expenses for "county clerk's deputies' and copyists' salaries" for the year at $72,000, and providing that such expense should be limited to that amount. And by an act of the legislature, relating to said city and county, passed February 27, 1878,—usually called the "One-Twelfth Act,"—it was enacted that neither the board of supervisors, nor any other officer having the power "to authorize or contract liabilities against the treasury," shall authorize, contract for, pay, etc., in any one month, any demand or demands against the treasury, or any of the funds thereof, which shall exceed one twelfth part of the amount allowed by laws existing at the time of such contract authorized, etc., to be expended within the fiscal year of which said month is a part. Worley's Consolidation Act, 219.

The said demand upon respondent was made on behalf of petitioner by the county clerk of said city and county, who at the same time presented demands of other deputy clerks and copyists in said month of July, which amounted in the aggregate to over $8,000; and respondent refused to audit any of them, because they were in excess of one-twelfth of the $72,000 which the board had declared to be the limit of such expenses for the year, as aforesaid. But this ground of refusal was expressly held by this court to be untenable in Cashin v. Dunn, 58 Cal. 582. That case was mandamus against the auditor, on application of a deputy street superintendent, to compel the former to audit the monthly salary of the latter. The defense set up was that to audit the demand would be to allow in one month more than one-twelfth of the whole amount appropriated for the current fiscal year by the board of supervisors for the payment of salaries of deputies of the office of superintendent of streets. But the court held that the "One-Twelfth Act," (so called) "has no application to the auditing and payment of demands for salaries of officers whose appointment is provided for, and salaries fixed, by law." And we see no good reason for overruling that case, as we are asked to do by counsel for respondent. Salaries are not liabilities against the treasury which rest upon any authorization or contract by the board of supervisors, or any other officer. They are fixed by law, and are not subject to the control of such officers. They are payable out of the general fund, and are not limited to any particular part of that fund which the board may choose to set apart for their payment.

Respondent contends that the writ should not issue on account of that section of the state constitution which provides that "no county * * * shall incur any indebtedness in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors," etc. But we do not see how this point can arise on the facts of this case. Leaving out of view the meaning of the words "indebtedness" and "liability," as used in the section of the constitution just quoted, and assuming, for the sake of the argument, that they include the salary of a public officer fixed by law, it nowhere appears, as we understand it, that there would be any excess of indebtedness over the revenue provided for the year. The averment of the answer is merely that, if all the demands presented by the county clerk for the month of July had been audited, they would have exceeded the one-twelfth of the $72,000 of the general fund to which the board had undertaken to limit the payment of these demands. Assuming, therefore, that the $72,000 was the "income and revenue provided" for the payment of county clerks' salaries, respondent contends that if over $6,000 had been audited for July, and a like amount should be audited for the other months, the excess of the aggregate over $72,000 would be an indebtedness unprovided for. But the $72,000 is not the revenue provided for the payment of salaries; they are paid out of the general fund. Moreover they are preferred claims; and there is no pretense of an averment that the payment of preferred claims would exhaust the revenue provided for the general fund. And, again, it is provided by law that, in case of a deficiency of funds for the payment of such demands, they shall be registered, and paid when there shall be such funds in the order of their registry. Const. arts. 95, 96. The demand of petitioner, therefore, should have been audited by respondent; and, as held in Cashin v. Dunn, supra, the writ of mandate is the proper remedy.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

MILLER v. THAYER. (No. 11,609.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 20, 1887.)

JUDGMENT—OPERATION AND EFFECT—RES ADJUDICATA.

A purchaser of land subject to a mortgage brought an action against the mortgagee to redeem, but failed to pay the sum found in that action to be due. The mortgagee then proceeded to foreclose, making the original owner and the purchaser parties, and offered in evidence the judgment roll in the action for redemption to show the amount due. On his disclaimer the original owner was dismissed from the action, no personal judgment against him being asked. Held that, the parties to the two actions being the same, the judgment roll was admissible.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; T. B. McFARLAND, Judge.

H. C. Firebaugh and L. S. Taylor, (A. L. Rhodes, of counsel,) for appellant. Estee & Nelson, (Beatty & Denson, of counsel,) for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Thayer gave Miller a mortgage as security for a loan. The mortgage consisted of a deed absolute on its face, and a defeasance in a separate instrument, in which Miller agreed, upon the payment of the money, with interest, to reconvey the property to Thayer. This was certainly a proper, perhaps the only, mode of entering upon the record evidence of the satisfaction of such a mortgage. Thayer conveyed the land to Hewlett and assigned to him the contract to reconvey upon payment. Hewlett offered to Miller the money which he, Hewlett, claimed to be due, and then brought suit to compel a conveyance according to the terms of the contract. It was an action for specific performance, but under such circumstances an action to compel a specific performance is nothing else than an action for the redemption of the land, or rather to declare the mortgage satisfied. On the trial a larger sum than Hewlett had offered was found to be due. Hewlett failing to pay that amount to effect a redemption, Miller brought this suit to foreclose. It is evidently the counterpart to the suit brought by Hewlett, and the issues are in all respects the same. Thayer was not a party to that suit, but is made a defendant in this, the complaint alleging that he had, or claims to have, some interest in the premises. He answered, disclaiming any interest. No personal judgment was asked or obtained against him. The real parties to this suit, therefore, are the same as in the suit of Hewlett v. Miller, 63 Cal. 185. We think there was no error in the admission of the judgment roll in that case, and that it constituted an estoppel. Holding these views, it is unnecessary to discuss the other points.

In re LANGAN'S ESTATE. (No. 12,142.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 20, 1887.)

1. WILL—CONTEST—SPECIAL ISSUES AND GENERAL VERDICT—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT.

When, in proceedings to probate a will, special issues were tried by jury, and the findings thereon were insufficient to support a general verdict for the contestants, a judgment entered on such general verdict was properly set aside on motion, and an appeal or motion for a new trial was unnecessary.

2. JUDGMENT—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—TIME TO MAKE.

Ten days after a judgment is entered in the superior court, which has no terms, is a reasonable time within which to move to set such judgment aside.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; CHAS. H. MARKS, Judge.

This was a proceeding to probate the will of Honora Langan. A contest arose, and the following special issues were submitted to a jury: (1) Was the said Honora Langan, deceased, of sound mind at the time of the execution of said alleged will? (2) Was the said alleged will signed by the said Honora Langan? (3) Was the said alleged will declared by said Honora Langan to be her last will, and attested as required by law? (4) If said alleged will was signed by said Honora Langan, or by some one at her request, was she, the said Honora Langan, then under the duress or under influence of, or acting by the menace or fraud of, Thomas F. Langan and Jane Langan, his wife, or either of them? (5) Was the instrument now offered for probate subscribed at the end thereof by the testator, or by some person for her and in her behalf, in her presence and by her direction? (6) Was the name of the said Honora Langan signed to said instrument at the end thereof by another person than herself, but under her direction and in her presence and at her request? If the answer to the last question is in the affirmative, then answer the following: (7) Did such other person who so signed her name to said instrument, thereupon, in her presence, and at her request, write his own name near said signature of said Honora Langan, as a witness to her said signature?

As to special issues 1, 2, and 4, the jury disagreed; to 3 and 7 they answered, "No;" and to 5 and 6, "Yes;" and also found a general verdict for the contestants. Judgment for the contestants was entered on the verdict and special findings of the jury, but was afterwards set aside as unwarranted by such verdict and findings.

Frank H. Farrar, for appellants. J. K. Law and F. M. Ostrander, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from an order vacating and setting aside a judgment. The question grows out of the contest of a will, in which several special issues were framed and tried before a jury. The jurors returned a general verdict in favor of the contestants, and found for them on the issues numbered 3 and 7, and against them on those numbered 5 and 6; and they disagreed and returned no verdict on those numbered 1, 2, and 4. Upon the verdict so returned, a judgment denying probate of the will was entered on the thirtieth day of September, 1886, and within 10 days thereafter the motion to set it aside was made.

It is claimed for the contestants, appellants here, that the respondents' only remedy was a motion for new trial or appeal, and that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order complained of. We think the court had jurisdiction to make the order, and that its action under the circumstances was proper. The general verdict was not authorized, and consequently furnished no support for the judgment. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1312, 1314. The finding upon issue No. 3 was a finding of conclusions of law and not of fact. Paulsen v. Nunan, 64 Cal. 290. And the finding upon issue No. 7 was upon an immaterial and irrelevant matter. Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 509. We have, then, a case where there was simply a mistrial, and where there was no lawful authority to enter any judgment. In this respect the case would have been the same if there had been no pretense of a trial. A judgment entered under such circumstances is void and may be set aside on motion.

As the superior court has no terms, a motion to set aside a judgment should be made within a reasonable time, and we think the motion here was so made. Ex parte Gillmore, 12 Pac. Rep. 800.

The order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

TOLMAN v. SMITH et al., (REED, Intervenor.) (No. 12,177.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 20, 1887.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE — WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE — CONVEYANCES — MORTGAGE — ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

Civil Code Cal. § 1186, provides that the acknowledgment of a married woman to an "instrument" purporting to be executed by her must not be taken unless she is made acquainted by the officer with the contents of the instrument, on an examination, without the hearing of her husband, nor certified unless she thereupon acknowledges that she executed the instrument, and does not wish to retract such execution; and section 1189 provides that a "conveyance" by a married woman must be acknowledged in the same manner. Held, that a mortgage given by a married woman upon her separate estate is an "instrument" and "conveyance" within the meaning of those sections, and is invalid unless acknowledged with the formalities therein prescribed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

H. M. Smith, W. H. Clark, and Victor Montgomery, for appellants. Holloway & Kendrick, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to correct a defective acknowledgment to a mortgage as against Eunice W. Smith, a married woman, and others, and to foreclose the same. William Reed intervened, in order to foreclose two mortgages upon the property included in the instrument sought first to be foreclosed. Plaintiff Tolman pleaded full satisfaction of Reed's mortgages. The court found in favor of the plaintiff on that issue. Judgment was rendered by that tribunal in favor of the plaintiff against Eunice W. Smith as prayed for, and that the mortgages of the intervenor, Reed, be canceled and declared satisfied. Eunice W. Smith and Reed are the only parties who appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The answer of Eunice W. Smith denied that she had acknowledged the mortgage sought to be foreclosed against her, in the manner required by sections 1186 and 1191 of the Civil Code, and alleged that she "was not made acquainted with the contents of said instrument, without the hearing of her said husband, by a notary public or other officer authorized to take such acknowledgments," and further alleges "that she did not acknowledge to such officer that she had executed said instrument, and did not wish to retract such execution, and that defendant, therefore, denies that she executed a mortgage to secure the payment of said note, or at all, as is alleged in said complaint." The defendants objected to the introduction in evidence of the mortgage, but the objection was overruled, and that instrument was admitted in evidence. The defendant Eunice W. Smith also set up in her answer, upon which the court made no finding, that she signed the note, which the alleged mortgage was intended to secure, not for any debt of her own, but for and on account of an antecedent debt of her husband. The court found that as a fact the property included in the mortgage was her separate property, and that the mortgage was never acknowledged by her in the manner and form, or substantially as required by sections 1186 and 1191 of the Civil Code of California; that at the time she signed said mortgage she had full knowledge of its contents, derived, however, solely from her husband, and that she signed the same for the purpose and with the intent of charging the real estate therein mentioned with a mortgage lien to secure the payment of a promissory note which she had signed with her husband, but that she was not at that time, nor at any other time, made acquainted with the contents of the mortgage by the notary public who took her acknowledgment thereto, and that she never acknowledged to said notary public, without the hearing of her husband, that she did not wish to retract the execution of said instrument. As a conclusion of law based upon this state of facts, the court found that "the plaintiff's mortgage was never duly acknowledged by Eunice W. Smith as a married woman, but that in equity the plaintiff is entitled to have his lien declared and enforced according to the intention and purpose of the parties as hereinbefore found."

The plaintiff contends that inasmuch as Mrs. Smith intended to execute the mortgage upon her separate property to secure her note made jointly with her husband, that the court had a right to order the mortgage to be foreclosed, notwithstanding the fact that the instrument in question never was acknowledged as required by the provisions of sections 1186 and 1191 of the Civil Code. As we understand the argument of the plaintiff's counsel upon the point in dispute, it is that these sections do not require a mortgage given by a married woman upon her separate property to be acknowledged and certified, as her deed would have to be, but that it may be done as if she were a feme sole. They affirm that the grants and conveyances only of a married woman must be acknowledged and certified as laid down in those sections of the Civil Code, supra, and that the legislature, in enacting them, did not intend that a mortgage should be included by the terms thereof. They cite various sections of the Civil Code as confirmatory of this view, and particular stress is laid upon the language of section 158 of that Code, viz.: "Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried." We are asked to say that the words "any engagement or transaction with respect to property" includes the power to mortgage a married woman's separate estate,—it may be to secure an antecedent debt of the husband,—without her acknowledging that instrument in any other way than if she was a feme sole. We do not so interpret the several sections of the Civil Code, the construction of which is involved in the matter. Nor do we perceive why any different rule should exist as between the acknowledgment by a married woman of a mortgage or a deed. One of the main objects of the statutes, in giving the power to a married woman of alienating her real property, seems to have been that she should be placed in a situation where she could be independent of her husband's control and influence, as to the disposition of her separate estate. He might influence her just as much to her injury in executing a mortgage to secure his debt, as by inducing her to deed away her land and give him the money. So that there does not seem to be any controlling reason why the legislature should have made a difference so radical in its character between the essentials necessary to make valid a deed of a married woman, rather than a mortgage. In section 1186, supra, it is provided that the acknowledgment of a married woman to an instrument, etc., must not be taken or certified unless under certain conditions. This is a limitation of course upon the powers conferred upon her by section 158, supra. The next section, 1187, refers to the conveyance of a married woman, and annexes a condition to its execution, without a compliance with which the instrument is invalid. A conveyance is an instrument within the meaning of section 1186.

The question then is, was it the legislative intention in carrying out its desire to prevent the husband from improperly influencing the wife to alienate her landed estate by deed, also to place the same protection over her rights by annexing a condition to her mortgaging it? We think that the body did intend to include "mortgage" in the terms "instrument" and "conveyance," as used in the sections of the Civil Code, supra, and that a mortgage signed by a married woman is not executed so as to be valid, unless acknowledged as a deed is required to be. It is true this court has declared that a mortgage is merely a lien upon, and passes no estate or interest in the mortgaged premises, except for taxation. Williams v. Mining Ass'n, 66 Cal. 193, 5 Pac. Rep. 85. But in that case, what was said upon the matter under consideration was intended to define what was the nature of the interest which passed in the mortgaged premises by that instrument. It did not declare what was the legislative intent in using the words "instrument" and "conveyance" in the two sections of the Civil Code, supra, as to the necessary formalities of an acknowledgment of a married woman. Section 1215 of the Civil Code, which is a part of the article treating of the recording of written instruments, declares that mortgages shall be held to be included in the term "conveyance." Hassey v. Wilke, 55 Cal. 528. Therefore it is at least certain that the legislature has upon occasion used the word "conveyance" in a sense which would include the word "mortgage." Section 2922 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "A mortgage can be created, renewed, or extended only by writing, executed with the formalities required in the case of a grant of real property."

A grant of the separate property of a married woman, being real estate, is not valid unless acknowledged by her as required by sections 1186 and 1191 of the Civil Code. Section 1093, Civil Code. It follows that, as a mortgage must be executed with the formalities of a grant, and as a grant by a married woman of her separate property is invalid unless acknowledged by her after an examination separate and apart, etc., from her husband, etc., as provided in section 1186, that a mortgage not thus acknowledged by her is void.

The view which the respondent asks us to take of the matter in hand, is, as it seems to us, very extreme, and opposed, as we think, to views heretofore entertained by this court in Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 55; Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 507; Joseph v. Dougherty, 60 Cal. 360.

There is nothing in this record which indicates that the debt, to secure which the mortgage was given upon the separate property of the wife, was for money advanced to her, or for anything of which she had the benefit; the findings are silent as to the allegation in her answer that the debt was an antecedent one of her husband. Therefore we do not perceive any equity existing in the transaction in favor of the plaintiff, which should be held to work as an estoppel in pais, upon the defendant, Mrs. Smith, a married woman, so as to compel her to be bound by an instrument she never executed, which, so far as this record shows, was of no benefit to her or her estate, especially when there is no proof or finding that the creditor was deceived into allowing a debt to be contracted in the first instance by either her or her husband, upon the faith that she would execute a mortgage to secure that debt.

The certificate of acknowledgment of the mortgage being confessedly defective according to the complaint, and a part of the prayer for relief having been that it might be perfected, we are not called upon, nor do we pass upon the question as to what the rights of the parties might have been, had the certificate been in due form according to the statute. No necessity is perceived for determining any other point made, and the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. STACY et al. (No. 12,137.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 21, 1887.)

1. BONDS—ACTIONS ON OFFICIAL BONDS IN NAME OF STATE.

An action upon an official bond, given by a license tax collector appointed by the board of supervisors of a county, is properly brought in the name of the state of California.

2. SAME—RIGHTS OF SURETIES—FAILURE OF ONE TO SIGN.

In an action upon an official bond it appeared that one surety had not signed it, and another had signed it, but no sum was stated in the body of it for which he was bound. There were no conditions or stipulations by the sureties, requiring other signatures or limiting their liability. Held, that the bond was valid as against the parties signing it.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JAS. A. GIBSON, Judge.

H. C. Rolfe and J. C. Perkins, for appellants. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and Andrew B. Paris, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. It is alleged in the complaint that on the third day of August, 1885, one H. T. Walker was appointed by the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county a license tax collector for the First supervisory district of that county; that to secure the faithful performance of the duties of the office, Walker gave a bond in the penal sum of $3,000, which was accepted and approved by the chairman of the board; and that subsequently one of the sureties on his bond withdrew, and he thereupon gave a supplemental bond, which was also accepted and approved by the chairman of the board. It is further alleged that Walker, while acting as such tax collector, collected the sum of $1,650.50 for licenses, and that he converted the money to his own use, and failed to pay over any part of it to the county. This action was brought against the sureties on his bonds to recover the amount of money alleged to have been so collected and appropriated. In the court below judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and from that judgment the defendants have appealed.

1. It is first claimed for the appellants that the action was improperly brought in the name of the people of the state of California. The answer to this objection is that the board of supervisors had authority to appoint a collector of license taxes, (People v. Ferguson, 65 Cal. 288, 4 Pac. Rep. 4; County of Amador v. Kennedy, 70 Cal. 458, 11 Pac. Rep. 757;) and the bonds given by their appointee for the faithful performance of his duties were official bonds. Hubert v. Mendheim, 64 Cal. 213. The Political Code provides that: "All official bonds must be * * * made payable to the state of California," (section 958); and "every official bond executed by any officer pursuant to law is in force and obligatory upon the principal and sureties therein to and for the state of California, and to and for the use and benefit of all persons who may be injured or aggrieved by the wrongful act or default of such officer in his official capacity." Section 961. The Code of Civil Procedure also provides that: "An executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another, is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section." Section 369. Now, the contracts sued on in this case were made in the name of the state for the benefit of the county, and an action upon them was therefore expressly authorized to be brought in the name of the state. See Shelby Co. v. Simmonds, 33 Iowa, 345.

2. It is further claimed that the original bond was void, because one William Reed was named as a surety, in the sum of $1,000, in the body of the bond, but never signed it; and because one C. P. Hall signed the bond, but no sum was stated in the body of it, for which he was bound. The principal was bound in the sum of $3,000, and each of the sureties in the sum of $1,000; and, so far as appears, there were no conditions or stipulations by the sureties when they signed, requiring other signatures or affixing any limitations to their liability. The sureties became, therefore, jointly and severally liable on the bond when it was accepted and approved. Political Code, § 956. A bond signed under such circumstances is valid as against the parties signing it. It was so held in Los Angeles v. Mellus, 59 Cal. 444, where similar objections were made to the bond involved in that case. See, also, State v. Pepper, 31 Ind. 76.

The objections of appellants cannot, therefore, be maintained; and, as the foregoing are the only points made by them, the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

CALLENDER v. McLEOD. (No. 11,550.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 22, 1887.)

SALE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—PROPERTY NOT SET APART—RIGHTS OF ATTACHING CREDITORS.

Under an agreement between the plaintiff and his tenant, 496 sacks of wheat in a certain pile belonging to the tenant were to be delivered by him to the plaintiff in repayment of a loan. Before the sacks had been separated, the whole pile was seized by the sheriff under an execution against the tenant at the suit of a third party. Held, that the plaintiff had acquired no right to the sacks which he could assert against an attaching creditor.

HAYNE, C., and PATERSON, McFARLAND, and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

This action was brought by C. R. Callender against A. C. McLeod, for damages for an alleged conversion by him, as sheriff of the county of San Luis Obispo, of certain sacks of wheat claimed by the plaintiff. The judgment of the court below was in the plaintiff's favor. The defendant appealed.

McD. R. Venable and C. W. Goodchild, for appellants. R. B. Treat, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of 496 sacks of wheat, taken by defendant as sheriff, under a writ of attachment against one J. H. Armfield. The court found that the plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the wheat when it was taken, and rendered judgment in his favor. The defendant moved for a new trial, and his motion being denied, appealed from the judgment and order.

It is claimed for the appellant that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and in our opinion this claim must be sustained. The facts, as they are shown by the record, are substantially as follows: Some time in the year 1883 the plaintiff leased to Armfield, on shares, a piece of land in San Luis Obispo county, to be cultivated in wheat. Later, in the fall of that year, Armfield told the plaintiff that for want of seed he would have to give up the lease, and thereupon the parties agreed that the plaintiff should furnish 100 sacks of seed, and the defendant should return for it two sacks for one, out of the next season's crop. In 1884 Armfield's crop was light, and he wished to retain the 200 sacks until 1885. Plaintiff told him to keep them "on the same way," and then furnished him 48 sacks more. Just when Armfield had finished heading his crop in 1885, it turned out that there was some misunderstanding between the parties as to how many sacks plaintiff was entitled to receive. He claimed two for one for the 200 sacks and 48 sacks, furnished as aforesaid; and, after some conversation, it was agreed that he was entitled to receive the number claimed. It was then further agreed that Armfield, after threshing and sacking his crop, should haul the 496 sacks, going to plaintiff, to San Luis Obispo, and deliver them to him there. Armfield threshed and sacked his crop, and piled his sacks up in a small corral on the leased ground. Shortly thereafter the defendant, as sheriff of the county, under a writ of attachment duly issued against Armfield, levied upon and took into his possession the whole pile. After the attachment, the plaintiff demanded and received from the defendant the number of sacks which he was entitled to claim as rent, and Armfield demanded and received the number which he was entitled to hold as exempt from execution. The plaintiff then demanded that 496 sacks more be given up to him, and, his demand being refused commenced this action.

The plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, testified: "All the grain was piled up together,—Armfield's, the seed, and the rent part in one pile. I got all my rent grain. * * * When I said that I knew and owned the 496 sacks of wheat, I meant that 496 out of the pile of sacks of wheat were mine.

There were no marks to distinguish the 496 sacks from the other sacks in the pile. I never handled it myself. The only thing I ever did to take possession was to tell Armfield to pile it together with his grain, and haul it into town. He was to haul and deliver to me, in San Luis Obispo, 496 sacks out of the general crop. I do not know what he was going to do with his part of it. The 496 sacks claimed in this action were never in any way separated from Armfield's grain. It was kept together in a general pile. It was never marked in any manner, and I never knew which sacks out of the general pile were mine. Any 496 sacks out of the general pile would have answered the purpose. There was no segregation between the several sacks. They were the same-sized sacks. All that was ever done with this grain as to hauling and handling was done by Armfield and his men. I never had anything to do with it except through Armfield."

Armfield was a witness for plaintiff, and testified in reference to the 496 sacks as follows. "Callender became the owner in this way: He furnished me seed, and I was to pay him back. * * * After the grain was threshed I hauled it and piled it all in the small corral, but I had straw laid between Callender's grain and mine, and could distinguish between them. * * * It was in my care in accordance with directions. Mine was piled back next to the straw pile, and his in front, because I intended to haul his first. There were no marks on the sacks, for I usually marked it as I hauled it. I afterwards took out of the same pile 118 sacks allowed me as exempt. The keeper gave me part of them from the front side of the pile and part from the other. Callender had nothing to do with the grain. I told him there were so many sacks, and he told me to pile it up and take care of it."

Upon these facts it seems clear to us that the plaintiff was not the owner and in possession of the 496 sacks of wheat in controversy when they were attached and taken into his possession by the defendant. Whether, by reason of the fact that Armfield was farming on shares, plaintiff owned, as a tenant in common with him, that part of the crop which he was to receive as rent, it is not necessary to inquire. The 496 sacks were not rent, but were to be returned to plaintiff for the loan made by him in 1883 and 1884, and as to them he must be treated as a purchaser, and not as a tenant in common of a growing crop. Civil Code, §§ 1727, 1806. Now, treating the plaintiff as a purchaser of the wheat, it is evident that he had acquired no right to it which he could successfully assert as against an attaching creditor of Armfield. Civil Code, § 3440.

It follows that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HAYNE, C., (dissenting.) The case is, perhaps, a close one; but I do not think the case is one of exchange, as supposed by my associates. There was nothing in existence to exchange for the seed wheat. It was expressly agreed that the plaintiff was to take two sacks for one out of the crop, and that if no crop was produced he was to get nothing. If that contingency happened,—that is to say, if no crop was produced,—how could there be an exchange? By the first agreement the parties were tenants in common of the crop. Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 542; Knox v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 617. This was conceded on all hands; and on this theory the share of plaintiff under his first agreement was delivered up to him. Now, the second agreement was simply to increase this share. I cannot see anything in the circumstances to indicate that the share coming to plaintiff in return for the seed wheat was to be of a different status from the share coming to him for the use of his land. It seems to me that the judgment was right and should be affirmed.

We concur in the dissenting opinion of HAYNE, C.: PATERSON, J.; MO FARLAND, J.; THORNTON, J.

HAWN v. SEVENTY-SIX LAND & WATER CO. (No. 12,159.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 23, 1887.)

1. PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—RELEASE BY PARTNER OF PARTNERSHIP CLAIM.

Civil Code Cal. § 2461, provides that "a partner authorized to act in liquidation may collect, compromise, or release any debts due the partnership," etc. In an action by one member of a dissolved copartnership to recover for work and labor, defendant sought relief from liability under a release given by the other partner. The jury were instructed that, after dissolution, one partner could not compromise or release a claim due the firm, so as to bind his copartner, if the other party had knowledge of the dissolution. Held error, and not cured by an instruction substantially in the words of the statute above cited.

2. SAME—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Where, in an action by one member of a copartnership for work and labor, the complaint contains averments tending to show that there had been an unauthorized settlement with the other member of the firm, and plaintiff introduces in evidence a release executed by the other member to defendant, plaintiff cannot object that the release has not been pleaded by defendant, who by virtue thereof seeks relief from liability.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Wiggington, Creed & Hawes, for appellant. S. J. Hinds, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. Action to recover for work and labor alleged to have been performed for defendant by plaintiff and one Chidester. Defense, that plaintiff and Chidester were partners, and that Chidester, for valuable consideration, gave to the defendant a release of all demands of the firm. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The release was not pleaded by defendant; but the complaint contains averments which, though somewhat vague, seem to point to the release; and the plaintiff himself proved the partnership, and introduced the release in evidence. Under these circumstances, he should not be allowed to object that it was not pleaded by the defendant. The plaintiff and Chidester were clearly partners. And assuming, in favor of plaintiff, that the evidence tends to show bad faith upon the part of Chidester and the defendant in the matter of the release, we think the case must be reversed for error in the instructions. The court instructed the jury (see first instruction requested by plaintiff)¹ that, after dissolution, one partner could not compromise and release a claim due to the firm, if the other party had notice of the dissolution. This was a palpable error. The plaintiff and Chidester were general partners in the particular enterprise. Civil Code, §§ 2424, 2477, et seq. There was no shadow of evidence of the acts necessary to constitute a special partnership. And since the liquidation of the affairs was not committed to one partner by consent, either had authority to act in liquidation. Civil Code, §§ 2459, 2460. "A partner authorized to act in liquidation may collect, compromise, or release any debts due to the partnership, pay or compromise any claims against it, and dispose of the partnership property." Civil Code, § 2461. This power of liquidation existing, it made no difference, for the purpose of this question, whether defendant had notice of the dissolution or not. It does not aid plaintiff's case that, in its second instruction, the court read to the jury the section above quoted. That simply made the instructions hopelessly conflicting. For aught that we can see, the jury may have based their verdict upon the proposition that Chidester could not give a valid release after the dissolution of the partnership, if defendant had notice of the dissolution. There are other objections to the instructions, but it is not necessary to consider them. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of California. December 23, 1887.)

1. JUDGMENT—OPERATION AND EFFECT—JURISDICTION—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION.

In an action in which no personal service has been made, and where the judgment roll fails to show that any affidavit stating the grounds for an order for service by publication has ever been filed, or that any such order was ever made by the court as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 412, and where the publisher's affidavit of publication contains no reference to the printed copy of the alias summons thereto attached, the judgment rendered therein is absolutely void.

2. SAME—ACTION TO SET ASIDE—LIMITATION.

Code Civil Proc. § 473, limiting the time within which a defendant not personally served may answer to the merits of an action in which judgment has been rendered to one year after the rendition thereof, has no application to a case in which a void judgment has been rendered. Such judgment may be set aside at any time.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; D. L. HATCH, Judge.

C. A. Storke, S. W. Bouton, and Orestes J. Orena, (Sawyer & Burnett, of counsel,) for appellants. S. S. Price, Dist. Atty., and Joseph D. Redding, (Crittenden Thornton, of counsel,) for respondents.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an action to foreclose the interest of defendants, obtained by virtue of a certificate of purchase for the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 28, township 9 N., range 32 W., San Bernardino meridian, county of Santa Barbara. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. The appeal is from an order made August 17, 1886, refusing to set aside the judgment.

The complaint in the cause is entitled People of the State of California vs. W. E. Greene, John Doe, Richard Roe, et al. It proceeds to aver that the defendant (without naming him) located the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 28, township 9 N., range 32 W., San Bernardino meridian, county of Santa Barbara, on the fifteenth day of October, 1868; that on the sixteenth day of November, 1868, the said defendant purchased said lands and received a certificate of purchase therefor, known and numbered as certificate No. 1,191. The complaint further shows that on the first day of January, 1872, there was due plaintiff, as interest on said certificate of purchase, the sum of \$96, and avers a publication of the delinquent list, with notice, etc., as provided by statute. There is no averment of ownership of this certificate except as above stated, and no allegation that the owner is unknown. A summons issued to "W. E. Greene et al., defendants," dated September 27, 1872, which recited that this action was brought to obtain decree foreclosing the interest of defendants "in certificate of purchase No. 1,291." The summons was returned on the same day (September 27, 1872) by the sheriff, who certified that "the same has not been served on the defendants for the reason that the defendants named in said summons do not reside in this county, and their place of residence is not known to me." On the same day an alias summons issued, which is a copy of the former summons, except that instead of being entitled People, etc., v. W. E. Green et al., Defendants, it is entitled People, etc., v. W. E. Greene and all Unknown Owners; and with the further difference that it recites that the action is brought to obtain a decree foreclosing the interest of defendants in certificates Nos. 1,290, 1,291, 1,395, and 1,396, etc. The action was brought in the district court, and the summons notified and required the defendants to answer within 10 days of service within the county, (Santa Barbara;) within 20 days of service without the county and within the district; otherwise within 40 days.

The record fails to show any affidavit for publication of summons, or order of the judge or court directing such publication. There is an affidavit of E. B. Boust as follows:

"State of California, County of Santa Barbara—ss.: E. B. Boust, being duly sworn, says he is publisher of the Santa Barbara Times, a newspaper published weekly in the town and county of Santa Barbara, state of California; that a summons, a true copy of which was duly published in said newspaper for four consecutive weeks, to-wit, from the second day of October, A. D. 1872, to the second day of November, A. D. 1872.

"E. B. BOUST."

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this thirteenth day of November, A. D. 1872.

"[Seal.] A. S. COOPER, Notary Public.

"Filed November 16, A. D. 1872.

"F. A. THOMPSON, Clerk.

"By F. N. GUTERREZ, Deputy."

To this affidavit a printed copy of the alias summons is attached; but the affidavit does not, as may be seen, make any reference thereto.

Judgment by default was taken against defendants November 21, 1872; that is to say, in less than 40 days after service of summons, if due service thereof is shown. In June, 1883, F. A. Hyde moved, on petition showing him to be the owner of certificate No. 1,291 by assignment, to have the judgment set aside, and for leave to answer. His motion was granted August 18, 1883, and an answer was filed by Hyde on the same day, setting up a defense to the action. On the twenty-second day of September, 1883, the court annulled the order of August 18, 1883, setting aside the judgment. This order, so far as appears, was without notice to Hyde or his attorney, and no action was taken in reference to the answer on file. Defendant Hyde again, in August, 1886, upon petition duly verified, (and setting out most of the facts herein stated,) showing that in 1872 he was a resident of the county of Alameda, etc., moved to set aside the judgment, and the motion being denied, brings this appeal.

1. It is apparent from the foregoing statement that the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction by the court of the person of defendants, or of any of them. People v. Mullan, 65 Cal. 396, 4 Pac. Rep. 348.

2. A motion to set aside a judgment is a direct, and not a collateral, attack on such judgment. Hence errors which might be the subject of review on appeal therefrom may be considered. People v. Mullan, supra.

3. The important question, however, is this: Can the superior court, after the lapse of a period of, say 12 years, from the entry of a judgment, set it aside even if void?

In Bell v. Thompson, 19 Cal. 707, it was said: "We think it must be considered as settled in this state that no motion can be entertained by a district court to set aside a judgment on any ground, including that of want of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant in the action in which the judgment was entered, after the expiration of the term at which it was entered, unless its jurisdiction is saved by some motion or proceeding at the time, except in the case provided for by section 68 of the practice act." The case referred to in the practice act is provided for by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under the former system of practice in this state, the decisions were numerous and quite uniform to the effect that, upon the expiration of the term of court, all power to alter, change, modify, or annul judgments entered during the term, or prior thereto, was lost, unless saved by some motion or action of the court during the term, except as otherwise provided by statute. Under our present system of jurisprudence, terms of court are abolished; and as the rule cannot apply literally, it is provided by the 473d section, Code Civil Proc., above referred to, that the relief which formerly could be had during the term may be sought within a reasonable time, which is defined to be six months, except in cases where personal service of summons had not been had, in which cases the court may grant relief within one year.

In Hastings v. Cunningham, 35 Cal. 550, it was held that the rule indicated had no application except to final judgments, and did not apply while the proceedings remained in fieri. So, too, it has been held that a judgment may be amended after the expiration of the term, where the record furnished the data for such amendment. Hegeler v. Henckell, 27 Cal. 495; Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 502.

In Loan Soc. v. Thorne, 67 Cal. 53, 7 Pac. Rep. 36, a case in which the cause was tried by the court, and written findings were not filed or waived, this court, on appeal, upheld an order setting aside the judgment upon an application made more than six months after its entry, upon the ground that the case was not within the purview of section 473, supra.

In Wharton v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 422, 9 Pac. Rep. 727, it was held that the court may, after the expiration of six months, set aside a judgment by default, entered by the clerk, when it appears upon the face of the judgment roll that the clerk had no power to enter it. In such a case it was said section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application.

It is conceded by all of the authorities that a court will interpose to stay the execution of a void judgment. A judgment which is void upon its face, and which requires only an inspection of the judgment roll to demonstrate its want of vitality, is a dead limb upon the judicial tree, which should be lopped off if the power so to do exists. It can bear no fruit to the plaintiff, but is a constant menace to the defendant. It is said a court whose process is abused by an attempt to enforce a void judgment will interfere for its own dignity, and for the protection of its officers, to arrest further action. Mills v. Dickson, 6 Rich. Law, 486. The most effectual method of doing this is by extirpating the judgment itself; by removing a form which is without substance. In New York, with a statute similar to section 473 of our Code, the courts have held that the power to vacate a judgment is inherent and is not limited by their Code, which only has reference to ordinary defaults, (Dinsmore v. Adams, 48 How. Pr. 274,) and that the limitation does not apply to an unauthorized judgment, nor to a judgment entered without service of process, (Simonson v. Blake, 20 How. Pr. 484.) See cases cited in Wharton v. Harlan, supra. In this last case MCKINSTRY, J., in commenting upon the rule enunciated in Bell v. Thompson, supra, said: "This technical rule as to action during the same term, never applied to a pretended judgment, in fact void, and could never have applied to statutory judgments entered by the clerk, which may be entered in vacation."

Section 473, Code Civil Proc., is intended to apply to cases where judgment has been taken against a party by mistake, accident, surprise, or excusable neglect; to cases in which the moving party must move upon evidence de hors the record; to cases in which the relief to be granted is largely in the sound discretion of the court, and has no application to a pretended judgment which is shown by the judgment roll to be void for want of jurisdiction, either of the person of the defendant, or of the subject-matter. In this instance, it is true, the applicant moved upon a petition duly verified, setting out the facts; but the notice of motion specified that it would be based "upon the ground that the papers on file in said action failed to show that any affidavit was filed therein stating grounds for the making of an order by said court for the publication of the summons in said action; or that any order by said court for the publication of said summons was ever made as required by law;" and it was further stated that the "motion would be made on the * * * papers on file," etc. The judgment roll is set out in the transcript, and the certificate of the judge, as well as the stipulation of the attorneys, show that it was used at the hearing. By this roll it appears, as before stated, that there was no personal service on the defendants, or any of them; and as there is no sufficient affidavit that the summons was ever in fact published, the judgment is void, and should have been set aside, and a trial had upon the complaint and answer of Hyde on file, which answer was never stricken out or disposed of.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the court below directed to set aside the judgment in the cause rendered November 27, 1872.

PEOPLE v. LEYBA. (No. 20,340.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 23, 1887.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—INSTRUCTION.

The information alleged that an assault was made "feloniously," and the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you find * * * that the defendant made an assault, as laid down in the information, but not with a deadly weapon, you should find him guilty of an assault only. If you find that the assault was made * * * with a weapon likely to produce death or great bodily injury, it will be your duty to find him guilty as charged in the information." Held, that the instruction was proper, and that it did not "ignore the felonious intent" in the assault.

2. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where the information charges that an assault was made with a deadly weapon, and the evidence relating thereto is conflicting, it is proper for the court to let the jury decide whether or not the weapon used was deadly.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

Information for an assault with a deadly weapon. The jury rendered a verdict of guilty, and the defendant appealed to this court.

J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, for respondent.

McKINSTRY, J. The information charged an assault with a deadly weapon, "to-wit, a large knife." The prosecuting witness swore the defendant assaulted him, and cut his clothing in several places with a knife five or six inches long. The defendant testified he had no knife when they met, and that he made no assault, but that the prosecutor struck and wounded him with the handle of a whip. The court charged the jury that a deadly weapon was one likely to produce death or great bodily injury; that there are cases where the character of the weapon, whether deadly or otherwise, depends on the manner in which it is used; and, in effect, that it was for the jury to decide whether a weapon was used, and, after considering the evidence as to the manner of its use, whether it was a deadly weapon. And the court further charged, among other things: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant made an assault as laid down in the information, but not with a deadly weapon, you should find him guilty of an assault only. If you find from the evidence that the assault was made by the defendant at the time and place mentioned in the information, and that said assault was made upon the prosecuting witness with a weapon likely to produce death or great bodily injury, it will be your duty to find him guilty as charged in the information."

The defendant contends the court erred in leaving it to the jury whether the weapon was deadly, and erred in the charge above quoted in that it "ignored the felonious intent." The charge as to deadly weapon we think correct, in view of the conflicting testimony; but, if not strictly correct, was favorable to the defendant. If no weapon was used, defendant was not injured by the charge. If the weapon described by the prosecutor was used, the defendant certainly was not injured by the failure of the court to instruct that a knife "five or six inches long" was, as a matter of law, a deadly weapon. Nothing is decided in People v. Fuqua, 58 Cal. 246, which conflicts with this view. There, a defendant on trial claimed that the deceased had advanced upon him with a pick-handle, and the court, although specially requested by the jury, refused to instruct them as to what "is termed by law a deadly weapon." As to the portion of the instruction above quoted, the information charges the assault to have been made unlawfully and feloniously; and, fairly read, the jury were told they should find the defendant guilty of the greater offense if he made the assault with a deadly weapon, "as laid down in the information." Each legal proposition in the instructions need not include all the exceptions and limitations derivable from the whole of the instructions. The attempt so to charge would often confuse, instead of enlightening, the jury. It can no more be said that the particular sentences objected to ignore the intent than that they ignore the law of self-defense. The matter of the credibility of the opposing witnesses was fairly submitted to the jury, and the doctrine of reasonable doubt fully explained. Moreover, when an assault is made with a deadly weapon, felonious intent is implied.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CHING HING CHANG et al. (No. 20,340.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 23, 1887.)

1. ROBBERY—EVIDENCE.

On the trial of an indictment for robbery, the prosecuting witness testified that he received the money of which he was afterwards robbed from a relative. On cross-examination he was asked whether his relative got the money from a safe or a trunk. Held, that the question was immaterial and irrelevant, and was properly excluded.

2. WITNESS—ATTENDANCE AND TESTIMONY—OBTAINING INFORMATION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The court refused to instruct a witness to ascertain a certain fact during recess. Held, that the refusal was proper, because a witness cannot be compelled to obtain information to answer a question. For the court to direct or request a witness to ascertain some fact during a recess is a matter of discretion, not reviewable in the appellate court.

3. SAME—CREDIBILITY—IMPEACHMENT.

To impeach a witness under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 2052, on the ground that his previous statements conflict with his present testimony, such previous statements must be shown to the witness, if in writing, before any question can be put concerning it.

4. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction to the jury to "determine the amount of credibility to which the evidence is entitled,—if convincing and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act upon it; if not, you have a right to reject it,"—is proper, being no more than an instruction to believe what is true, and to be uninfluenced by what is false.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. TOOHY, Judge.

Davis Louderback, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, for respondents.

THORNTON, J. Information accusing defendants of robbery. The newly-discovered evidence is of a character that might have been discovered by reasonable diligence in time to have produced it at the trial. It need not, therefore, be further considered. In the progress of the trial several exceptions were reserved to the rulings of the court, which it will be necessary to pass on.

1. Chin Len, the complainant, was called as a witness, and testified that he had collected the money of which he testified he was robbed, from a relative of his named Kee, on Pacific street, where Kee kept a wash-house; and that at the time of the trial this relative had gone to China. The money was collected of Kee on the day of the robbery, with whom he (the witness) had deposited it. In the course of the cross-examination, the defendant's counsel (Mr. Smith) asked the witness where his relative procured the money to pay him, when there occurred what follows: "The Court. That is proper, if you know where. Mr. Smith. Do you know where your relative procured the money to pay you? Mr. Coffey. I object to the question as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. Witness. I think he went to his safe or trunk. Mr. Smith. Did he,—safe or trunk? The Court. It is immaterial. Mr. Smith. The object is to show the improbability of his leaving the money there on deposit, unless there was some safe place in the wash-house for it,—that is the object of the testimony." The prosecuting officer (Coffey) objected as before, and the court sustained the objection.

So far as relates to the issue of robbery which took place, according to the testimony, at 836 Washington street, it was entirely immaterial whether the money was taken by Kee when he paid it to witness from a safe or trunk. If counsel desired to show that a trunk or safe was not a safe place of deposit, the inquiry for that purpose would naturally turn on the character of the safe or trunk,—what kind of safe or what kind of trunk it was of which he spoke, —and what were the means of fastening the safe or trunk referred to, so as to keep outsiders from getting into it. But no question of this kind was asked. The only question as indicated by the curt language used was whether the money was taken from a safe or trunk when handed by Kee to the witness. This had no reference to the fact whether the safe or trunk was a safe place of deposit. If the object of counsel was to show such a fact, he should have asked a question appropriate to the purpose. The court might well have concluded from the statement of counsel that if his object was to show that the safe or trunk was not a safe place to deposit money, that the answer to the question put had no tendency to show it. It is clear that if the witness had answered that the money was taken from a safe, and not from a trunk, this would have shown nothing as to its being a place where money could have been safely deposited. The same would be true if he had answered that the money was taken from a trunk, and not from a safe. An apposite question might have been put for the object declared by counsel, and, as none was put, we cannot see that the court erred in its ruling. The court ruled correctly that the question put related to a matter immaterial to any definite issue in the cause.

2. The defendant's counsel, on cross-examination, asked this question: "Did you testify in the lower court about holding a conversation with these defendants, or either or any of them, upon Washington street, or any other place, prior to meeting them in your room? Mr. Coffey. If there is testimony, I think it ought to be read, and I object to it. The Court. It would not be material whether he did or not. If you want to test his credibility, ask him what he did testify, and read it to him. Mr. Smith. I submit the question." The court sustained the objection, and defendant excepted.

The object of the question was most clearly to impeach the witness. While a witness may be impeached by evidence that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his testimony, still the law requires, if such statements are in writing, that they shall be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them. Code Civil Proc. § 2052. The language of the section is "must be shown." When the remarks of the court and the prosecuting counsel were made in relation to reading the testimony to the witness, defendant's counsel did not state that the testimony was not in writing. And, as in most cases the testimony before the examining court or magistrate (in this case the police judge) is taken down in writing, (Pen. Code, § 869,) and defendant's counsel did not, when the remarks above referred to were made by the court and counsel, state that they were not in writing, we are of opinion that, under such circumstances, we must presume that the testimony referred to in the question was in writing. The witness then had a right, before being called on to answer the question put, to see the writing. Code Civil Proc. § 2052. The object of requiring the writing to be shown him was that he might have an opportunity of inspecting and examining it, and, if he chose, of reading it.

The witness on the stand was a Chinaman, and was unable to read the testimony. He was at the time testifying through an interpreter. The written testimony was in English, a language unknown to him. The object of showing it to him was that he might make himself acquainted with its contents. To do this, one acquainted with the language in which it was written must read it to him. If this could not be done, then the object of the law requiring the writing to be shown to him would be defeated. Here the court required counsel putting the question to read the testimony to the witness. Counsel, without giving any reason why he declined to read as required, did not read, preferring, as it seems, to stand on the question without reading anything to the witness. The provision of the statute (section 2052, Code Civil Proc.) above referred to was made for the protection of the witness. The court did no more than to enforce such protection. In doing so, he did nothing prejudicial to any substantial right of the defendants. It will be observed that the language of the section above referred to is that if the statements are in writing, they must be shown to the witness "before any question is put to him concerning them." The writing must be shown to the witness that he may have an opportunity for inspection and examination, and acquainting himself with its contents, and he is allowed time for that purpose. Morrison v. Myers, 11 Iowa, 538; Gaffney v. People, 50 N. Y. 423. We think it follows from the above that where the witness cannot read, or where the writing is in a language to him unknown, he is entitled to have it read to him that he may be able to say whether the writing is his evidence or not. According to the views above stated, we are of the opinion the court committed no error in its ruling on the point before us.

3. The same witness was asked this question by counsel for defendants on cross-examination: "Did you suspect they had any intention of robbing you?" In this the pronoun "they" referred to defendants and the two other persons with them. The witness had testified that he met the defendants and two other persons on Washington street, near the entrance to the building on that street in which his room was. One of them asked him where he was going. The witness answered that he was going to collect some money on Pacific street. After saying this he started to go upstairs to his room, and four persons followed him upstairs, when he (witness) lay down on a bunk. Pretty soon, after coming up into the room, they said to the witness if he collected some money they would like to borrow a few tens, not saying exactly how much. The witness said to them that he had no money to lend. They then said they wanted the money, and if he would not lend it to them they would take it from him. They insisted that the witness should let them have some money, and finally one of them seized him and they proceeded to rob him. On the cross-examination the witness stated: "They followed immediately after my going to my room; I did not invite them." Just following this, the question above quoted was put to the witness. While the question should have been allowed, yet in view of the evidence of the policeman, Glennon, and O'Sullivan, who came very soon after to the room mentioned in the testimony of the complaining witness, which tended strongly to corroborate the statements of the witness, we cannot say that the error was prejudicial to the defendants. The conduct of the witness tends strongly to show that he entertained no such suspicion until he was seized by one of the defendants in order to effect the robbery, for he entered the room and lay down on his bunk. If he entertained any such suspicion, he certainly would not have assumed a recumbent position and would not have omitted to fasten the door to his room. In this view we do not think the refusal of the court to allow the question was of such a character as to call for a reversal of the order or judgment.

4. There was no error in the refusal of the court to instruct the witness to find out during a recess which occurred in the progress of the trial the number of the wash-house occupied by the Chinaman Kee, of whom he had testified he had collected the money of which he was robbed. We are not aware that it is the duty of the court to give any such instruction. While it is usual for the court to direct or request a witness to ascertain some fact during a recess, and we never knew a request of this character refused, still it is in the discretion of the court so to do, and such a refusal is not reviewable here. It is the duty of a court to compel a witness to answer a proper question. But we are not acquainted with any law which makes it the duty of the court to compel a witness to procure the information necessary to answer it. The counsel might himself have asked the witness to ascertain the number of the house during the recess, and, if he failed to do so, might have shown such failure. Further, we are of opinion that, by employing reasonable diligence, the counsel, during the recess, might have ascertained the number of the house referred to, or have found out that there was no such wash-house on Pacific street at the date spoken of by the witness, and during the same time might have procured witnesses to establish whatever he had discovered to be the fact.

5. Portions of the charge to the jury are assailed as erroneous. The court told the jury: "You should carefully determine the amount of credibility to which their evidence is entitled. If convincing, and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act upon it; if not, you have a right to reject it." This is said to be error. We cannot regard it as such. The first clause is undoubtedly correct. The jury in it were told that it was their duty to carefully determine the credibility to which the evidence referred to is entitled. The last clause amounts to this: If, upon examination of the evidence in all its bearings, and in relation to and in connection with the other evidence in the cause, you find it to be unworthy of credit, and false and untrue, you have a right to reject it from your consideration altogether. It is said by counsel for defendants in relation to this direction: "The fact that it is not convincing and carrying with it a belief in its truth does not authorize its rejection. It is still to be considered under all the circumstances for all it is worth; perhaps it might be sufficient under all the evidence to create a reasonable doubt." When evidence is examined, and the conclusion is arrived at that it is not convincing and carrying with it a belief in its truth, such conclusion is that it is false and untrue. How evidence that is false and untrue can create a reasonable doubt we cannot perceive.

As to the other portions of the charge to which our attention is called, we think it only necessary to say that, taking the charge as a whole, we find nothing in it calling for a reversal by this court. The law bearing on the case was fairly stated to the jury in a way which could not have misled it.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment and order must be affirmed. So ordered.

BAIRD v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF TULARE CO. (No. 11,725.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 29, 1887.)

PUBLIC LANDS—SWAMP LANDS—WARRANTS—POWERS OF SUPERVISORS.

The board of supervisors have no authority to issue warrants on registers' certificates, exchanged for purchase certificates for swamp and overflowed lands sold, but not owned, by the state, as Act Cal. 1872, § 3, has been superseded by Pol. Code Cal. §§ 3571, 3572; the last section of which, as amended in 1878, provides that, upon surrender of the register's certificate, the auditor shall draw his warrant on the county treasurer for the amount named in such certificate.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Petition by Alfred Baird for a writ of mandate commanding the board of supervisors of Tulare county to issue a warrant for a certain amount. Trial by the court, without the intervention of a jury, and judgment for petitioner, from which the supervisors appeal.

W. B. Wallace, for appellants. Sayle & Harris, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. Alfred Baird, the respondent here, made application to the court below for a writ of mandate, commanding the board of supervisors of Tulare county to issue to him a warrant for $105, payable out of the swamp-land fund of that county. In the petition it is alleged that prior to March 27, 1872, respondent purchased of the state of California 105 acres of swamp land situate in Tulare county, and paid therefor to the treasurer of that county $105; that the land proved not to have been the property of the state; and thereafter, on the first day of February, 1873, the register of the state land-office issued to respondent his certificate showing the foregoing facts, and that respondent's claim for the repayment of the money was duly and regularly presented to the board of supervisors in June, 1885, and was by the board rejected. In answer to the petition, the board alleged that it was not authorized to draw any warrant on the treasurer of Tulare county to be paid out of the swamp-land fund of the county. After trial, the court rendered judgment in favor of the petitioner, finding, as a conclusion of law, "that it was the duty of defendant, after being requested by the plaintiff, to have ordered a warrant drawn on the county treasurer of Tulare county for the sum of $105, payable to plaintiff out of the swamp-land fund of said county."

No brief has been filed on behalf of respondent, but we infer that he rested his claim for relief on the supposed authority of section 3 of the "Act for the relief of purchasers of state lands," approved March 27, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 587.) That section reads as follows: "Whenever the state has issued a certificate of purchase for any land sold as swamp and overflowed, and the United States has sold and issued a patent for the same land, and the title of the United States is held and owned by the purchaser from the state or his assigns, or where the land so purchased from the state shall prove not to have been his property, the amount paid to the state for such land shall be refunded to such purchaser or his assigns, and the board of supervisors of the county in which the land is situated shall draw a warrant on the treasurer of the county for such amount, and the said treasurer shall pay the same out of moneys in the swamp-land fund of the county credited to such purchaser." But that section was superseded by the provision of the Political Code. Section 3571 of that Code reads: "If any land sold is not the property of the state, the holder of the certificate of purchase or patent may receive in exchange therefor from the register a certificate showing the amount paid, and the class of land upon which the payment was made." And section 3572, as amended in 1878, reads: "If the land sold was swamp and overflowed, the county auditor of the county in which the land is situated must, upon the surrender to him of the certificate mentioned in section 3571, draw his warrant, in favor of the person surrendering such certificate, for the amount therein specified, upon the treasurer of the county, who must pay the same out of the swamp and overflowed land fund of the district in which the land is situated." If the respondent had presented his register's certificate to the board of supervisors, and asked for the warrant which he now seeks to obtain, while section 3 of the act of 1872 remained in force, he would have been entitled, upon the facts shown, to have had his claim allowed and the warrant issued to him. But when he presented the certificate in 1885, the law had been changed, and the board had ceased to have any authority in the matter. He should therefore then have presented it to the county auditor, whose duty it had become to draw the warrant without any action of the board.

The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to dismiss the petition.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT: For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to dismiss the petition.

In re MAXWELL'S ESTATE. (No. 11,055.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 23, 1887.)

WILLS—CONTEST—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—EFFECT OF PROBATE.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1333, limits the time for contesting a will to one year after its probate. Held, that after that time it is conclusive as against an application to declare a devise void for fraud practiced upon the testator.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN FINN, Judge.

Mrs. Elizabeth C. Tybout, on petition for the distribution of the estate of her deceased brother, Richard T. Maxwell, filed exceptions thereto, and made application to set aside a devise to Miss E. Donnelly, otherwise called Mrs. Maxwell, as procured by fraud upon the testator. A demurrer to her petition having been sustained, and decree of distribution made, Mrs. Tybout appeals.

Joseph R. Brandon, for appellant. McAllister & Bergin, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Maxwell died June 29, 1883, leaving a will bearing date July 23, 1882. Letters testamentary were issued July 17, 1883. Afterwards, but when does not appear, the executors filed a petition for the distribution of the estate. November 13, 1884, Elizabeth C. Tybout filed her exceptions to the petition. In her exceptions she states that she is the sister and sole heir at law of the testator; that a devise contained in the will in favor of Miss E. Donnelly was obtained through fraud, and by false and fraudulent representations made by the beneficiary to the effect that she was an unmarried woman, capable of entering into a valid contract of marriage, while she was in fact a married woman, to-wit, the wife of one Charles H. Kane; that the testator was ignorant of this fact, and fully believed the false statements of the beneficiary, who well knew that her representations were false; that on June 27, 1883, the testator, induced by these false representations, married the beneficiary, under the name of Miss E. Donnelly; that afterwards she continued to represent herself to Maxwell as his wife up to the time of his death, and he fully believed the representations; that the pretended contract of marriage, and the belief in the capacity of the beneficiary to perform it, was the sole motive and inducement for making the devise, and afterwards for allowing it to remain unrevoked. Petitioner also shows that she did not discover the fraud in time to contest the will under the statute. Wherefore she prays that, in consequence of the fraud, the devise in the will to Miss E. Donnelly may be regarded and decreed as void, and of no effect, and that the property given or devised to Miss E. Donnelly be distributed to the petitioner as heir at law. This petition, containing the exceptions, was demurred to, and the court held that it stated no ground for relief.

We think the ruling of the court below was correct. The probate of a will and the administration of the estates, of deceased persons, are proceedings in rem, binding upon all the world. When the court has obtained jurisdiction by the petition and notices provided by the statute, public policy requires that all persons interested shall be deemed to have knowledge so far as necessary to the validity of the proceedings. No doubt this rule will often work hardship to absent heirs, who may be in fact ignorant of the death of their ancestor. To obviate this to some extent, provision is made in the statutes of most, if not all, the states, for a period after the will has been admitted to probate within which any person interested may appear and contest its validity. In our state, the limitation is one year, and it is enacted (section 1333, Code Civil Proc.) that, if no such contest be made, the probate of the will is conclusive, saving to infants and persons of unsound mind a like period of one year after the disability has been removed. State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233; Broderick Will Case, 21 Wall. 503. No doubt, these objections might have been raised upon the application to probate the will. Not having been so raised, that document is conclusive evidence as to the intent of the testator.

Whether any relief could be afforded by a court of equity it is not necessary now to decide. It may be admitted that the superior courts, while acting as probate courts, have all equity power necessary to the complete administration of estates, and that, under our system, it would not be necessary to invoke the powers of a court of chancery for any purpose within the administration. But if this can be regarded as an effort to fasten upon the beneficiary a trust in favor of the heir, because she has obtained the property by fraudulently inducing the testator to make a will in her favor, it certainly is not within the scope of those proceedings, and there is no warrant in the statute for such an intervention. The judgment is affirmed.

BANK OF TEHAMA CO. v. CRUMLEY. (No. 11,397.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 30, 1887.)

TRIAL—ISSUES AND FINDINGS.

On the trial of an action for the recovery of money alleged to have been borrowed by defendant's wife as his agent, the court found that she contracted the debt on her own credit, and for her separate use. Held, that that finding precluded the truth of her alleged agency, and rendered a finding to that effect unnecessary.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; CHARLES P. BRAYNARD, Judge.

Action brought by the Bank of Tehama County to recover of W. D. Crumley $400, alleged to have been loaned defendant's wife as his agent. A jury having been waived, the court found, upon the issues joined, in favor of defendant, and, judgment having been rendered accordingly, plaintiff appeals.

John F. Ellison, for appellant. J. Chadbourne, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover several sums of money, aggregating about $400, from the defendant; it being alleged that the same was borrowed by the defendant's wife as his agent. The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint, and, to each of the several causes of action stated in the complaint, set up, by way of further defense, the following facts: "* * * That during all the times mentioned in said * * * cause of action, during which the said Sarah E. Crumley is alleged to have been the wife and authorized agent of the defendant, to manage his business and borrow money, she had a large amount of property in her possession and control and management, belonging to her, and her daughter by a former husband, in which property the defendant had no interest; and that the said sum, * * * alleged to have been borrowed for and on account of the defendant, was in fact borrowed by the said Sarah E. Crumley for her own separate use and benefit, in the support and education of her said daughter, and in the management of her said separate property."

The plaintiff claims that the court should have found upon all the material allegations of the complaint, since the answer contained a general denial of them. The special defense set up in the defendant's answer, if true, necessarily precluded the truth of the allegations of the complaint that Mrs. Crumley contracted the debt as her husband's agent. She could not contract the same debt as agent for her husband, and also for her own separate use and benefit. She must necessarily have contracted, either as her husband's agent, or in her separate capacity as a married woman having a separate estate, and contracting as such to charge it. As the court has found, following the allegations of her answer, that she contracted the debt for her own separate use and benefit, it must be presumed to have also found that she did not contract the debt as agent for her husband; since facts evinced by necessary inference from facts found, will be treated as found. There are no facts alleged in the complaint which, if they had been found by the court to exist, could have changed the decision and judgment, except the allegation that Mrs. Crumley borrowed the money sued for as agent for her husband; this allegation having been found, as we have seen, not to be true, findings upon any other allegation of the complaint would have been immaterial.

We do not agree with the appellant's further contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the decision.

Perceiving no error in the record, we are of opinion that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

I concur: HAYNE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

SEPULVEDA v. BAUGH et al. (No. 12,316.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 31, 1887.)

MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—DECREE—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

In a decree of foreclosure of a real-estate mortgage, the description of the land to be sold thereunder was of a tract described by metes and bounds, excepting certain parts, which were described only by reference to certain specified records of certain deeds. Held, that the necessity for such reference to ascertain the description did not render the decree void and open to collateral attack.

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

Action to quiet title, by Rafaela Verdugo de Sepulveda, appellant, against George Baugh, Ernest W. Moore, George Eley, Sarah D. Eley, William Lacy, Giacomo Tononi, Valentine Mand, Maria Le Maire, Addie Murray, Dan McFarland, W. B. Stewart, George H. Utley, John Cavalleras, F. P. Holland, Alice C. Skinner, J. S. Skinner, M. W. Burt, Thomas R. Curtis, Amanda S. Pollock, Maggie Scott, R. H. Pollock, Kate Shepardson Black, James T. Morgan, Martha F. Morgan, Jesse Hunter, John Murray, Walter Scott, Alexander Marshall, Richard Doe, Honorina Pelanconi, Lorenzo Pelanconi, William Young, Isabel R. de Tononi, and Petra Pelanconi, respondents. Plaintiff mortgaged to Andres Briswalter two tracts of land, one containing 909.40 acres, the other 212.03 acres; the description of both tracts in the mortgage being by metes and bounds, excepting that of certain parts, which were described only by reference to certain recorded deeds, the book and page of the record of each deed being specified in the mortgage. The first mortgage was foreclosed by suit, and both tracts were sold under the decree of foreclosure, in which the description of the land was the same as in the mortgage. Defendants claimed title under the foreclosure decree and sale. Plaintiff claimed that defendants acquired no title, because the description of the land in the decree was uncertain; and, being defeated below, took this appeal.

Henry M. Smith and W. H. Clark, for appellants. Graves & O'Melveny, Chapman & Hendrick, and Bicknell & White, for respondents. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson and Glassell, Smith & Patton, amici curiæ.

TEMPLE, J. This case seems very plainly to be within the rule laid down in Crosby v. Dowd, 61 Cal. 557. A tract of 909 acres is described by metes and bounds, "excepting, however, those portions of the above-described tract which are described in those certain conveyances executed by the party of the first part hereto, which are recorded, respectively, in book 22 of Deeds, p. 477; book 32 of Deeds, p. 113; book 36 of Deeds, p. 446; and book 48 of Deeds, p. 466, —Records of Los Angeles county; to which deeds and the records thereof reference is hereby made for further description; the remainder of the tract which is hereby conveyed containing about seven hundred and nineteen acres." This description is in the mortgage, complaint on foreclosure, the decree, sheriff's certificate and deed; and nowhere except by the above reference is there any description given of any of the excepted tracts. The record of the foreclosure, therefore, contains no description from which it can be ascertained, without such reference, no matter how familiar one might be with all the descriptive calls given as to any specific portion of the described land, whether or not it was conveyed by the mortgage deed, or whether the decree is operative upon it; nor could he tell whether any portion of the metes and bounds of the 900-acre tract remain as any portion of the metes and bounds of the 700-acre tract.

This case is attempted to be differentiated from Crosby v. Dowd in this: In Crosby v. Dowd the only description of the property in the complaint or decree was a reference to three deeds in the recorder's office. Here the mortgage, complaint, decree, certificate of sale, and sheriff's deed alike described a large tract of land by metes and bounds, excepting therefrom certain sold portions as above stated. That is, in the former case reference is made to the record for a description of the land mortgaged, while in the case at bar reference is made to the records for a description of certain portions of the described tract which are excepted from the effect of the mortgage and decree. A mere statement of this contention would seem to go a long way towards answering it. There is evidently the same indeterminateness in regard to this description as in the other, and the sheriff would be no better able to find the land or to determine what lands he should put a purchaser in possession of. And there is the same possibility that when the deeds were examined, they would be required to be construed by a court to determine what lands were included. Nor can it be construed as to the intent of the mortgagor in the larger tract better than in Crosby v. Dowd, which was described as a portion of the Santa Rita rancho. By express statement, she did not mortgage her interest in the entire tract; and the judgment does not profess to operate upon her interest in the entire tract. The judgment record, therefore, is not complete, but other documents not in the record must be referred to to ascertain what is the subject-matter upon which the decree operates.

But I am of the opinion that Crosby v. Dowd ought not to be allowed to stand. I think I have examined all the cases cited in support of the decision by counsel or by the court, and I fail to find any authority for holding the judgment void upon a collateral attack. It may be admitted that such a decree is erroneous, and will be corrected if the attention of the court is called to the defect by demurrer or proper motion, or by appeal. Such an amendment would be in the interests of justice and for the interest of both parties,—for the mortgagor, that the property sold with a good description may bring a better price and his debt be paid; for the mortgagee, similarly, that he may collect his money. For these reasons, as well as that the writ may contain specific directions to the officer, who is required at his peril to execute it, the record of the foreclosure should contain a perfect description of the property. If, when a writ is issued, it is found that it fails to describe any property, the sheriff may refuse to execute it, or the court, upon application, may quash it, and restore the party, if he has been dispossessed.

But for what reason is the judgment void? Certainly not for lack of jurisdiction, either as to the subject-matter or the person. What nullity, known and recognized by established rules of law, is found in this judgment? If any, it must be because it is a proceeding to establish a lien, and there is no description of the thing to which the lien attaches. But by established rules of evidence, such a reference is not meaningless, and does furnish a description of the thing. It is admitted that it is sufficient, and does amply describe the thing in the mortgage. But it is said that a deed is evidentiary and may be helped out by other evidence, while a decree is final and determinative. The distinction is illusory; but, admitting the difference, it has no bearing upon this question. The judgment is held void simply because it is meaningless. This distinction admits that it is not meaningless, but declares that it is not sufficiently explicit for the convenience of the court or its officer. Plainly, the judgment is not void for the want of a description which identified the subject upon which the judgment is to operate. But the rule is unsafe, and the distinction illusory.

Here it may be well to call attention to the fact that very few of the cases cited as authority are cases like this, where the objection was that the description contains an express reference to another document, which must be examined to help out the description. Most of them were cases where on its face the description was indefinite or defective, and were actions for the recovery of specific property. The trouble is said to be that the sheriff may not know with certainty what land he is to place the purchaser in possession of. The same uncertainty may, and generally will, exist where metes and bounds are given. The court says, assuming that the records can be found, the descriptive calls may be found indefinite, so as to render it impossible to locate them. So, too, any landmarks called for may, for aught the court can ordinarily know, be impossible of location. The call for a pile of rocks on the bank of a creek may be very uncertain, while the reference to the deed may be definite and clear. But in a very large class of cases where metes and bounds are given it still becomes necessary to refer to deeds and to records to locate the boundaries. What is the practical difference between the case at bar and one in which a description giving metes and bounds describes the boundary as beginning at a stake at the north-east corner of the land conveyed to Smith by Brown, by deed executed so and so, or a line running north to the southern boundary of Brown's land? Or, what is the difference between this and a description as lot 2 in section 2, etc., according to the United States land surveys? The lot could not be found without referring to the plat in the land-office. The same is true of a description of a quarter section of land according to the system of United States land surveys. We take judicial notice of the system, but not of the actual surveys; and we know that in many places there are wide departures from the general system. The plat must be referred to to find the particular quartersection. Then land is often described by reference to town plats, sometimes where the plat has not become a public record, and the streets and lots only exist on paper. The plat must be found to locate the land. Farms are sold by reference to subdivision maps of large ranches. Now, is this court to hold that all judgments which describe the land by reference to these things are void? Yet in every one of these cases the descriptions show on their face that some other document is referred to and must be examined to make out the description.

I cannot see how a judgment can be pronounced a nullity for uncertainty of description, unless the court can see that nothing is described. But here the description is not even uncertain or doubtful. It simply does not come up to some ideal standard laid down by the courts as more convenient for them and their officers. The true rule would seem to be that the judgment is not void; that the purchaser must, however, rely upon the description, and, if it be found so defective, when tested by rules of evidence ordinarily applied to the subject, that nothing can be found, he will fail; otherwise he should recover.

I admit that the case of Crosby v. Dowd was very maturely considered, and that it should not be overruled unless plainly wrong. However, it is one of those decisions under which no rights can have grown up, and I think the rule mistakenly laid down exceedingly mischievous. A sense of justice will, I think, if the case be not overruled, impose upon this court the labor of differentiating case after case from that.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

WALDRIP v. BLACK et al. (No. 12,231.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 29, 1887.)

1. MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—RIGHT TO FORECLOSE—SURETY WHO HAS PAID THE DEBT. Where one has signed a note as surety, and has received from the makers a mortgage to secure him, and pays the note upon their failure so to do, he becomes an equitable assignee of the note, and can enforce its payment, and foreclose the mortgage, to recover the money paid by him, with legal interest.¹
2. SAME—PLEADING—WAIVER OF DEFECTS. In an action to foreclose a mortgage alleged to have been given as security to a surety, the judgment should not be reversed for insufficient allegations of suretyship when no demurrer has been filed pointing out special defects in the complaint.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JAMES A. GIBSON, Judge.

James Waldrip, plaintiff, sued Samuel N. Black and Julia A. Black, defendants, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and Julia A. Black appealed.

Paris, Goodcell & Fox, for appellants. Hight & Damron, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action which was instituted for the purpose of foreclosing a mortgage against S. N. Black and Julia A. Black. The court below gave judgment by default against S. N. Black, and the cause having been tried upon its merits, rendered judgment as prayed for in the complaint, against Julia A. Black. She alone has appealed from the judgment, and an order denying her a new trial. It appears from the record that the mortgage was executed by the Blacks in favor of Waldrip, to secure him harmless against having to pay a joint note for $300, which the two Blacks and Waldrip had signed as joint makers in favor of one Logsdon or order, due three months after its date, and bearing interest at 1 per cent. per month until paid. The complaint alleges, although Waldrip was an apparent maker, that he was in fact a mere surety for the Blacks; and after the note became due, the Blacks having suffered it to remain unpaid, except the sum of $9, that Waldrip paid to Logsdon, the payee, the full amount due upon the note, and had it indorsed to himself; and that the mortgage was given to secure him in the reimbursement for such a payment, if he should be obliged to make it. That pleading also contained a copy of the note and mortgage upon which the suit was brought, but the answer of Julia A. Black thereto was not verified; hence the genuineness and due execution of those instruments were admitted. Section 447, Code Civil Proc. The language of the mortgage, as set out in the complaint, although not as definite as might be desired, is sufficient to show, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, that the note was signed by Waldrip as a surety merely; and, no demurrer having been filed pointing out any special defects of the complaint, the judgment should not be reversed for the want of a sufficient allegation of the plaintiff's suretyship. Chase v. McEvoy, 58 Cal. 349.

The genuineness of the mortgage is not controverted, and its recitals are to be held as true. Section 1963, subd. 2, Code Civil Proc. It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff signed the note as surety only, and that the mortgage was executed to save him harmless, and to reimburse him for any payment for and on account of the note he might be compelled to make. The indorsement upon the note to the effect that it was indorsed by the payee, Logsdon, to Waldrip, for value received, together with its possession by Waldrip, and all the other circumstances surrounding the transaction, at least entitled the court to presume, there being no evidence to the contrary, that Waldrip, the surety, had paid the apparent value of the note to Logsdon, and was the owner of it. This being so, the Blacks, for whom he had become surety, were bound to reimburse Waldrip for what he had been obliged to pay on account of their failure to pay the note as they promised to do. Having never been, in reality, as to the Blacks, a maker of the note, but a mere surety, upon his being compelled to make payment to Logsdon of what was due upon it, he became the equitable assignee of the note, it being the principal undertaking, and entitled to enforce its payment according to its tenor and effect, as the holder thereof, as well as to foreclose the mortgage, which was the collateral security. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 419, note 1; Cottrel's Appeal, 23 Pa. St. 294; Lidderdale v. Robinson, 2 Brock. 159. Chief Justice MARSHALL, in the case last mentioned, tersely, yet most forcibly, says: "When a person has paid money for which others were responsible, the equitable claim which such payment gives him on those who were so responsible shall be clothed with the legal garb with which the contract he has discharged was invested, and he shall be substituted, to every equitable extent and purpose, in the place of the creditor whose claim he has discharged." See, also, Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 93, middle of page, and numerous cases there cited. We are of opinion that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed was not void for uncertainty.

But it does not necessarily follow, from the proposition of law just cited as authority, that the person who has paid his money, for which others are responsible, should in this case, although "clothed with the legal garb with which the contract he has discharged was invested," be allowed to be reimbursed to any greater extent than the amount, principal and interest, he has been obliged to pay out, together with legal interest upon the gross sum so paid out from the time of its payment. In other words, it does not follow, in this case, that because the surety can recover, according to the terms of the note, the principal and interest he actually paid out, that he can also recover, from and after the time of his payment of that sum, 1 per cent. per month interest as provided in the note; he is simply entitled to recover the legal rate of interest upon the whole sum of money he has paid out from the date of that payment.

It would appear, therefore, that the judgment should be so modified as that it be reduced by the sum of $17.13, which is the excess of interest allowed by the court over and above what was legally due on the thirty-first day of December, 1886, the date of the rendition of that judgment. In all other respects the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, let the judgment be modified as above indicated, and, as modified, the judgment and order are affirmed.

JOHNSON v. MALLOY. (No. 12,439.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 27, 1887.)

TAXATION—ASSESSMENT AND LEVY—CORRECTION—POWER AFTER ASSESSOR HAS GONE OUT OF OFFICE.

After the duties of an assessor have ceased, no judgment of a court can clothe him with authority to amend, alter, or modify his assessment of property.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

This cause was presented to the court upon an agreed statement of facts by John Johnson, plaintiff, and Thomas Malloy, defendant, asking the court to pass upon the legality of the assessment for taxation of certain lands in said county. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The remaining facts appear in the opinion.

S. P. Hall, for appellant. John B. Mhoon, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This cause was presented to the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that plaintiff owns a tract of land which defendant, the assessor of Alameda county, on the seventh day of March, 1887, assessed for the purpose of taxation at the sum of $15,150, the full cash value thereof, and refused to deduct therefrom a mortgage of $13,000 due the "regents of the University of California," upon the ground that the sum secured by said mortgage was, as property of the regents aforesaid, exempt from taxation and not assessable. This action was commenced on or about November 16, 1887, and on the twenty-second day of November judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant, without costs. It was further adjudged and decreed that the value of the mortgage can be deducted from the assessment; that the assessment made by defendant, without deducting the value of the mortgage thereon, is not a valid and legal assessment, etc. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

The question presented to the court below, upon the agreed statement, was not one that could be properly determined in the form which it was made to assume. The duties of the assessor in the premises had ceased, and no judgment of the court could clothe him with authority to amend, alter, or modify his assessment of the property in question. No agreement of parties can be invoked to call for the decision of what to them, or either of them, is merely a moot question, and courts should not render judgments which cannot be enforced by any process known to the law.

The judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the action.

(Supreme Court of California. December 27, 1887.)

1. GUARDIAN AND WARD—APPOINTMENT—JURISDICTION.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1747, providing for the appointment of guardians, three years' residence in a county by a minor will give the superior court of such county jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for the minor.

2. SAME—ORDER OF REMOVAL—REVERSAL ON APPEAL.

Unless a guardian appears to have been removed on one of the grounds specified in Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1801, the order of removal will be reversed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

B. W. Owens was appointed guardian of Harry O. Raynor by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Owens afterwards removed to Alameda county, where he died three years later, and one E. H. Clarke was appointed guardian in his place by the Alameda superior court. William M. Raynor then filed a petition in the Alameda superior court for the revocation of Clarke's appointment. At the hearing of the petition, the court decided that the superior court of San Francisco had exclusive jurisdiction in the matter, and revoked its former order appointing Clarke, on the ground that it had acted without jurisdiction. From this order Clarke appeals.

Lloyd & Wood, for appellant. Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is from an order of the superior court of Alameda county revoking the appointment of E. H. Clarke as guardian of said minor. The record shows that on March 6, 1880, the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco duly appointed one B. W. Owens guardian of the person and estate of said minor, and said Owens remained such guardian until February, 1883, when he was removed therefrom by an order of said court; but he continued to exercise the functions of guardian of said minor until October, 1884, when he (said Owens) died. Prior to his death, to-wit, on the first of April, 1883, said Owens removed from the city and county of San Francisco to the town of Alameda, in the county of Alameda, where he fixed and established his residence, and continued to reside until he died. Said minor went with Owens from San Francisco to Alameda, and resided in the family of said Owens, at Alameda, so long as said Owens lived. After the death of Owens, said minor lived in the family of appellant in the house occupied by Owens before and at the time of his death. Immediately after the death of Owens, appellant applied for and obtained from the superior court of Alameda county letters of guardianship of said minor. Afterwards, on the twenty-fourth of November, 1884, William M. Raynor filed a petition in the superior court of Alameda county praying to have the order appointing said Clarke guardian, as aforesaid, revoked, on three grounds: (1) That said Clarke is not a relation of said minor, and is an unsuitable person to be appointed as such guardian, in that said Clarke has not the personal integrity and moral character to fit him for such guardian; (2) that ever since the death of the father of said minor, and at the time of the appointment of said Clarke, said minor was under the jurisdiction, care, and control of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco; (3) that the petitioner had applied to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to be appointed guardian of said minor.

To that petition Clarke filed an answer, in which, among other things, he denied the allegation of his want of personal integrity and moral character to qualify him for the guardianship of said minor. The petitioner offered evidence tending to show that Clarke was not a suitable person for such guardianship, and rested. Thereupon Clarke introduced evidence showing that the minor was being carefully and properly cared for, educated and reared, and tending to show that Clarke was a suitable person to be guardian of said minor, and rested. The petitioner then called witnesses in rebuttal, and was proceeding to examine them, when the judge announced that he would hold and decide that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, having once acquired jurisdiction of the matter of the guardianship of the person of said minor, never lost it, and that the superior court of Alameda county never acquired jurisdiction of the matter; and made an order revoking the letters before issued to said Clarke, on the ground that the court, in granting said letters, acted without jurisdiction.

Appellant insists that it was clearly within the jurisdiction of the court to grant said letters, and that the order revoking them is erroneous. The superior court of the county of which the minor was an inhabitant or resident had jurisdiction to appoint a guardian. Code Civil Proc. § 1747. It appears by the record that said minor had been for more than three years an inhabitant of Alameda county, and had not during that period had any other home, or been absent or away from said county. That, in our opinion, constituted him an inhabitant or resident of Alameda county, within the meaning of the provision of the Code above cited. We think the order cannot be upheld upon that ground.

But, while that is the only ground upon which the court based its order, it is not the only ground upon which the removal of Clarke was prayed. In addition to that of the invalidity of his appointment, it is alleged in the petition for his removal that he is an unsuitable person for the guardianship of said minor, which was put in issue by the denial of Clarke, and upon that issue evidence was introduced on both sides, none of which is incorporated in the bill of exceptions. We infer, however, that it was conflicting, and, if it appeared that the court had found that it preponderated on either side, we might not have disturbed the finding. But it plainly appears that the evidence upon that issue was not considered by the court, and we have no means of ascertaining on which side it preponderated, or on which side the court thought it preponderated. The rule which has been applied to orders granting new trials, that if, for any cause, the verdict and judgment ought to have been set aside and a new trial granted, the order should be allowed to stand, whether the reason assigned for it was right or wrong, is not applicable in this case. Here, no cause for removal of Clarke appears in the record, and the court cannot assume that he was removed for a cause not appearing in it. The Code specifies the causes for which guardians may be removed. Code Civil Proc. § 1801. The removal in this case was not made for any of the specified causes, but for a cause not specified, and in our opinion wholly insufficient. Therefore the order must be reversed.

BENNETT et al. v. GREEN. (No. 12,314.

(Supreme Court of California. December 27, 1887.)

1. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY—DEED—CERTIFIED COPY—IDENTIFICATION OF GRANTOR.

The plaintiff, in an action to quiet title, introduced in evidence a certified copy of a deed, purporting to be signed by P. D. Green, the defendant, and conveying land then owned by him. In the body of the deed the grantor was described as D. P. Green. The subscribing witness' affidavit was that he saw D. P. Green, the person described in the deed, sign the same. No objection was made to the copy because the original was unaccounted for. Held, that enough had been shown to make the copy admissible, and throw on the defendant the burden of proving that he did not execute the deed.

2. QUIETING TITLE—DENIAL BY GRANTOR OF EXECUTION OF DEED—BAR BY LAPSE OF TIME.

In an action to quiet title to land, the plaintiffs proved possession for 30 years before suit brought, in themselves and their predecessors, under a deed purporting to be executed by defendant. Held, that the statute of limitations barred defendant's claim that the deed was not executed by him.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. M. HUTTON, Judge.

Clara E. Bennett and others brought an action against P. D. Green to quiet the title to certain real estate owned by them. It appeared on the trial that the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claimed, had been in possession for about 30 years, under a deed purporting to have been executed by the defendant, who was then the owner of the land in question. The case was tried by the court, and judgment given for the plaintiffs. The defendant appeals.

G. Gordon Adams, for appellant. R. M. Widney, for appellee.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to quiet the plaintiffs' title to certain subdivisions of a lot of land in the city of Los Angeles, known as lot 8, in block 22, of Hancock's survey of 35-acre City Donation Lots. The plaintiffs claim title in fee to the disputed parcels of land, deraigned through sundry mesne conveyances from the defendant, and under the statute of limitations. In the court below the findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiffs. The defendant moved for a new trial, and has appealed from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion.

To establish their title, the plaintiffs introduced in evidence a deed from the city of Los Angeles, dated November 2, 1855, conveying to the defendant, P. D. Green, lot 8, and stating that the original certificate of possession was issued to William Foreman on the first of August, 1855, and was by him transferred to Adam Bland, and was by Bland transferred to defendant. They also introduced in evidence a patent from the United States, dated August 9, 1866, granting to the city of Los Angeles pueblo lands, and it was admitted that lot 8 was within the boundaries of the land so granted. The plaintiffs then offered in evidence the copy of a deed which was taken from the records of Los Angeles county, and was properly certified by the county recorder. It purported to be the copy of a deed dated February 6, 1869, signed by P. D. Green, and conveying lot 8 to one Edward McVickar. In the body of the deed the grantor was named D. P. Green, and proof of its execution was made by a subscribing witness. In his affidavit the witness said "that he was present and saw D. P. Green, known to him to be the same person described in, and who executed, the annexed instrument as a party thereto, sign, seal, and deliver the same. And that he, the deponent, thereupon signed his name as a subscribing witness thereto." The defendant objected to the copy being received in evidence, on the ground that it was "incompetent evidence to prove the contents of the deed, or the execution of it, or to show title, because it did not purport to have been acknowledged by the party who signed it, and showed on its face that it had not been acknowledged by the party who it is claimed signed it, and the witness who acknowledged it states that he saw D. P. Green sign, seal, and deliver it, and that it is not a copy of an instrument which has been properly acknowledged." The court reserved its ruling until the testimony was all in, and then overruled the objection, and admitted the copy in evidence, the defendant reserving an exception.

The plaintiffs further proved that McVickar conveyed the lot to John Doland on the sixteenth of April, 1869, and Doland conveyed it to Samuel Dana on the nineteenth of February, 1870; that Dana died in 1870, and thereafter the lot was known as the "Dana Tract;" that the lot was fenced as early as 1872 or 1873, and remained inclosed until about 1883; that shortly after it was inclosed the land was rented, by an agent representing the Dana estate, to Chinamen, and was used by them for the purpose of raising vegetables for about 10 years; that on the nineteenth of June, 1883, the lot was conveyed by H. C. Hyde, guardian of the minor heirs of Dana, to William P. Gardiner, the grantor of plaintiffs; and that, from the years 1875-76 to 1883-84, the property was assessed to the estate of S. Dana or the Dana minors, and the taxes were paid. The plaintiffs also read in evidence the deposition of Adam Bland, in which the witness stated, in effect, that he sold the land in controversy to the defendant about 30 years before, and that during the years 1885 and 1886 he had frequent conversations with defendant about the land so sold, and in one or more of those conversations heard defendant say that, if he had kept the land till then, it would have made him rich. The defendant moved to strike out the deposition, "because it only contained an attempt to show what defendant stated about disposing of the land, without laying any foundation for such testimony by making some proof of the loss and execution of the deed purporting to be signed by P. D. Green." The court overruled the objection, and the defendant reserved an exception. The only testimony introduced by defendant was that of three witnesses, one of whom had known him since 1868, one for about 14 years, and one for a time not stated. Each of these witnesses testified that he had done business with defendant, and had received and seen letters written by him, and that, so far as he knew, defendant had always written his surname "Greene."

1. With these facts before the court, it is insisted for appellant that it was error to admit the copy of the deed of February 6, 1869, in evidence, and also to deny the motion to strike out the deposition of Bland. We think the rulings were proper. A deed may be recorded when its execution has been acknowledged by the party executing it, or proved by a subscribing witness, (section 1161, Civil Code,) and a certified copy of the record of a deed, thus acknowledged or proved, may be read in evidence, with the like effect as the original, on proof by affidavit or otherwise that the original is not in the possession or under the control of the party producing the certified copy, (section 1951, Code Civil Proc.) No objection was taken that sufficient proof had not been made that the original was not in the possession or under the control of the plaintiffs, and that objection cannot now be considered. The only objection taken rests upon the transposition of the grantor's initials in the body of the deed and in the certificate of proof. But the deed appears to have been signed by the defendant, and to convey land which he then owned, and the certificate identifies him as the party described in it. We think this was sufficient to make the copy admissible, and to throw upon the defendant the burden of showing that he did not in fact execute the deed. As he failed to offer any such proof, we assume that he did execute and deliver it, and that the title to the property described passed by it to the grantee therein named.

2. But, however this may be, we think there was evidence sufficient to justify the finding that plaintiffs had title under the statute of limitations.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re GARBER'S ESTATE. (No. 11,430.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 17, 1887.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ADMINISTRATOR WITH WILL ANNEXED—APPOINTMENT.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1350, provides that where an executor fails to qualify, letters shall be granted with will annexed, as in cases of intestacy. Section 1365 provides to whom administration shall be granted in the case of an intestate estate. An executor of one dying testate in Virginia renounced his right as executor in California, and, the testate having no wife, an administrator was appointed at his request. Held, that as he would not have been eligible, under section 1365, if deceased had been intestate, he could not be appointed on the executor's renunciation.

2. SAME—QUALIFICATIONS—SURVIVING PARTNER.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1365, the last clause providing that if the decedent was the member of a partnership at the time of his decease the surviving partner must in no case be appointed administrator of his estate, one who had formerly been a partner, and between whom and the deceased there were unsettled partnership matters, is ineligible.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; N. HAMILTON, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Michael C. Garber, deceased, Anson Barstow was appointed administrator with the will annexed, and Louis Gottshall, public administrator, appealed from the order.

E. C. Robinson, for appellant. Rhodes & Barstow, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. On the thirteenth day of June, 1885, Michael C. Garber died testate in the state of Virginia, leaving an estate in the county of Alameda, in this state, where he formerly resided and did business in partnership with Anson Barstow, respondent herein. The will of the testator was admitted to probate in the state of Virginia, and letters testamentary duly granted and issued to Arista Hoge, the executor named in the will. On the second of September, 1885, said will and the probate thereof, duly authenticated, were filed in the superior court of Alameda county, together with a renunciation by said Hoge of his right to qualify as executor of said will in said county of Alameda, and a request that said Anson Barstow should be appointed administrator with the will annexed. And said Barstow at the same time filed his petition to be appointed administrator of said estate with the will annexed. Appellant, who was at that time public administrator, filed a petition for letters of administration of said estate, and also objections to the appointment of said Barstow, on the ground that appellant was entitled as public administrator to letters of administration in preference to Barstow. The matter was heard by the court, and the application of said Barstow was granted, and letters of administration with the will annexed were ordered to be issued to him. From that order this appeal is prosecuted by the public administrator, who contends that, upon the renunciation of the executor, letters of administration with the will annexed should have been issued as designated and provided for the grant of letters in cases of intestacy. Code Civil Proc. § 1350. "Administration of the estate of a person dying intestate must be granted to some one or more of the persons hereinafter mentioned, * * * and they are, respectively, entitled thereto in the following order: (1) The surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed; (2) the children; (3) the father or mother; (4) the brothers; (5) the sisters; (6) the grandchildren; (7) the next of kin entitled to share in the distribution of the estate; (8) the public administrator; (9) the creditors; (10) any person legally competent."

It does not appear that decedent left a wife. Therefore there was no one who had a right to request the appointment of Barstow. Code Civil Proc. § 1365. If decedent had died intestate, we think it would be conceded that the order appealed from is erroneous. And after the renunciation of the executor, letters of administration with the will annexed should have been issued as designated and provided for the grant of letters in cases of intestacy. That is the language of the Code, and we cannot, without disregarding it, hold that a person who could not have been appointed administrator if decedent had died intestate, can be appointed administrator with the will annexed when, as in this case, the executor renounces his right to apply for letters.

It appears by the record that Barstow, to whom letters were granted, and decedent were at one time partners, and that there were unsettled matters growing out of the relation at the time of the death of the decedent. That, we think, rendered Barstow ineligible under the last clause of section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Order reversed.

INDECENT EXPOSURE—INDICTMENT—DESCRIPTION OF OFFENSE.

A complaint under Pen. Code, Cal. § 311, which declares it an offense to "willfully and lewdly procure, counsel, or assist" any one to make an indecent exposure of the person, charged that defendant "willfully, unlawfully, and lewdly solicited" an indecent exposure. Held, that a conviction on such complaint will be sustained, on an application for discharge on habeas corpus.¹

In bank. Application for writ of habeas corpus.

This is a proceeding against one Ollie Hutchings for a misdemeanor. The complaint was drawn under Pen. Code Cal. § 311, declaring that "any person who willfully and lewdly procures, counsels, or assists any person to expose himself" indecently shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and charges that the defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, and lewdly solicit * * * a female to expose herself * * * in such a manner as is offensive to decency." The defendant was convicted of the offense charged in the complaint, and she applies to this court for discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus.

(Supreme Court of California. December 28, 1887.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—MATERIAL-MEN—FILING NOTICE BEFORE COMPLETION OF BUILDING.
Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §1187, requiring material-men to file their notice within a certain time after the completion of the building, a lien filed before the building was completed is void, unless it appears that the original purpose was to build only in part, or that the original purpose to finish was abandoned.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

Action by Louis Schwartz and William L. Beebee, partners as Schwartz & Beebee, against William Knight and Sarah, his wife, to enforce a mechanic's lien on certain real estate for materials furnished to buildings erected thereon. There was a judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed.

F. Adams and V. A. Gregg, for appellants. J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondents.

McKINSTRY, J. The appeal is from the judgment by the defendants, who insist it should be reversed because it appears from the findings that plaintiffs did not file their notice of lien until 100 days after they had furnished materials for the house. But the plaintiffs were not "original" contractors within the meaning of section 1187, Code Civil Proc. Sparks v. Butte Co., etc., 55 Cal. 392. As they were not original contractors the law required them to file their lien within 30 days after the completion of the buildings, (Code Civil Proc. § 1187,) and the filing of a lien prior to its completion was premature. Perry v. Brinard, 8 Pac. Rep. 882; Roylance v. San Luis Hotel Co., 15 Pac. Rep. 777.

The Code does not mean that the building, if, as in this case, it was intended to be a dwelling-house, must be completed in all respects as contemplated by the plans and specifications, or even that it shall have become habitable as a dwelling. Ordinarily the lien cannot be filed until a building is so completed. But when it is made to appear that it was the original purpose of the owner to erect and build it in part only, or that the owner having proceeded to erect the house in part abandoned his design of finishing it, the building should be held to be completed, within the meaning of section 1187, from the time it was so built in part. The purpose of the owner may be inferred from his acts or omissions, but the ultimate fact to be determined is his original or substituted purpose to leave the building unfinished. The owner of property on which a building has been commenced cannot deprive the material-man or laborer of his lien by refusing or omitting to finish the building. In Harmon v. Ashmead, 68 Cal. 322, 9 Pac. Rep. 183, the complaint alleged that at the date of the commencement of the action the building had not been completed; that the defendant did not intend to complete it; and that he had notified the plaintiffs to that effect. The lien was decreed. The question is but incidentally referred to, but was included in the judgment recognizing and enforcing the lien of a material-men, in Germania, etc., v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349. In that case the building was not completed, "but work thereon ceased July 16, 1881, and has never been resumed."

But to uphold a lien filed before the actual completion of a building it should distinctly appear that the original purpose was to build it in part, or that the original purpose to finish it was abandoned. The present action was commenced June 20, 1884. The appeal is on the findings alone, and the court below found that the work of the carpenters employed in the construction of the building was completed in the month of January, 1884, but that the said building "was not then and is not now completed." There is no direct finding that between the last of January and the twentieth June no work was done on the house by masons, plasterers, plumbers, painters, or others than carpenters; nor any finding that work of some kind was not actually progressing when this suit was brought. The finding should be at least of facts from which it might be clearly inferred that it never was the intention of the defendant to complete the house, or that she had abandoned such intention. After finding that the carpenters completed their work in January, and the dwelling-house was not completed at the commencement of the action, the court found "that neither of the plaintiffs at the time of furnishing the materials knew that it was not the intention of the defendant Sarah to complete said building and leave it in an unfinished state." This is not a finding that such was her intention or that the completion was abandoned by her.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

O'CONNOR v. IRVINE et al. (No. 9,704.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 28, 1887.)

1. TRUSTS—RESULTING TRUSTS—PURCHASE BY AGENT WITH MONEY OF PRINCIPAL.

The owner of a mining claim sold for taxes requested another to buy it in, and furnished money therefor. The agent purchased in his own name. Held, that these transactions created a resulting trust in the owner's favor, although the agent made no express promise to act as such.¹

2. SAME—RES ADJUDICATA.

When land is purchased at a tax sale by the owner's agent, ejectment by the owner against such agent to establish the validity of the tax title will not bar a suit between the same parties to declare a resulting trust in favor of such owner.

3. PARTIES—DEFECT OF PARTIES IN INTEREST.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 389, provides that when a complete determination of the cause cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must order them to be brought in. In an action to declare a resulting trust as to stock in a corporation it appeared that one not a party to the action had an interest in the stock. Held, that it was the duty of the court on its motion to order such party to be brought in, and a failure so to do was error.

4. SAME—REAL PARTY IN INTEREST—HOLDER OF LEGAL TITLE.

Where the plaintiff in an action holds the legal title to the demand, he is a real party in interest under the California Code.

5. EQUITY—ACCOUNTING—WHEN ORDERED.

The plaintiff in an action to declare a resulting trust in stock in a corporation asked for an account of the profits, assessments, etc., but the evidence failed to show that there was anything due to defendant on the stock. Held, that the account was unnecessary.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Jas. G. Fair and one Selover owned a certain interest in a mining claim. The claim was sold for taxes, and Fair employed Wm. Irvine, the defendant, to buy in the property, and furnished him with the money necessary therefor. The purchase was made accordingly, and afterwards Fair brought ejectment against Irvine, and suffered a judgment against himself to establish the validity of the tax title. Irvine and others formed the Morgan Mining Company, to which Irvine transferred the interest in the mining claim held by him in consideration of 10,000 shares (one-half) of the capital stock of said company. Fair then sold his interest in the mining claim to Cornelius O'Connor, the

A decree was entered ordering the 10,000 shares of stock to be transferred to the plaintiff, as prayed for in his complaint. From this decree the defendants appeal.

Geo. W. Towle, for appellants. McAllister & Bergin, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. 1. The evidence shows that the defendant acted as the agent of Fair and Selover in purchasing the property, and in holding it, and that he so considered himself up to a certain period, when, having had some misunderstanding with Fair, he resolved to assume the right of ownership in the property. Fair furnished the money with which the purchase was made. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to show the defendant agreed in formal or express language that he would make the purchase for Fair and others and hold it for their benefit. It is sufficient if it was mutually understood between the parties that he was so acting in their behalf. What was said and done by the parties, so far as the evidence shows, is capable of only one interpretation, and establishes a perfect understanding between the parties as above stated. Under such circumstances, although the language used may not of itself show an express promise, it is the duty of the party whose services are sought, if he does not mean to act in accordance with the evident expectation of the parties with whom he is dealing, to expressly declare that he will not, otherwise his silent acquiescence is a fraud. O'Hara Will Case, 95 N. Y. 403; Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 119; Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 486. It is true, as claimed by appellant, the party alleging the trust must show that the money was paid at or before the execution of the conveyance, or that an absolute obligation to pay has been incurred by him as a part of the original transaction of purchase. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 1037; Case v. Coddington, 38 Cal. 193. But we do not see how this principle can aid appellant in this case. On December 28, 1869, the sheriff sold the property to defendant Irvine, who paid him $115.19 therefor, and received the sheriff's certificate of sale. This money was paid to defendant by Sinton, acting as the agent of Fair and others, in February, 1870. There was no conveyance, within the meaning of the authorities cited, until the time of redemption had expired, and the sheriff delivered to him the deed to the property. The evidence shows that defendant rendered an account for the money advanced, and received the amount thereof prior to the execution and delivery of the sheriff's deed. It would appear, therefore, that he ought not now to be heard to say that it was not a loan, and if it was a loan, the facts created a resulting trust. See authorities above cited; also Page v. Page, 8 N. H. 187; Siemon v. Schurck, 29 N. Y. 598; Foote v. Bryant, 47 N. Y. 544; Soggins v. Heard, 31 Miss. 426; Morey v. Herrick, 18 Pa. St. 129. The fact that a patent was issued to defendant Irvine, in March, 1874, upon his application, filed in 1873, cannot in any way affect the equitable right of plaintiff. If there be a trust in favor of another party at the time of the issuance of the patent, a court of equity will control the operation of the legal title for the benefit of the cestui que trust. Bludworth v. Lake, 33 Cal. 263.

2. The plaintiff is a real party in interest. It is not denied that all of Fair's right in the property, together with his cause of action, were duly assigned to plaintiff. It is sufficient under the Code if he holds the legal title to the demand.

3. The court below found that on the first day of October, 1872, the defendant first repudiated the title of Fair, and claimed to hold adversely to him. This finding is attacked by appellant, who claims that it is not supported by the evidence, which shows acts of hostility and repudiation as early as March, 1871. Inasmuch as the judgment must be reversed, we deem it unnecessary to examine the evidence before us upon this point.

4. No necessity is shown for an accounting unless the prayer of the complaint that an accounting of the profits, assessments, expenses, etc., be had, shows such necessity. The evidence fails to show that there was anything due the defendant.

5. The judgment in the ejectment suit of Fair v. Irvine is relied upon by defendant to defeat the claim of plaintiff in this action. Courts will not entertain fictitious actions when their true characters are made to appear; and a judgment rendered in such a case, when its true character is shown, determines nothing. Lord v. Veazie, 8 How. 255; Cleveland v. Chamberlain, 1 Black, 425. Assuming, however, that the judgment in that action must be treated collaterally as valid, although the action was simulated,—not a real controversy,—what did it determine? Plaintiff is not estopped from invoking his equities in this case. An action of ejectment, and an action to declare a trust are essentially different. To prevail in the former the plaintiff must, as against the defendant, be the holder of the legal title, whether such legal title be evidenced by a deraignment from the paramount source of title, or simply by prior possession; but in the latter the whole case depends upon the theory that the legal title is in the defendant. The rule is expressed in the Code. Section 1908, subd. 2, Code Civil Proc., is to the effect that a judgment is conclusive between the parties in respect to the matter directly adjudged; and section 1911 provides that, “that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto.” Equitable rights are not necessarily included in an action of ejectment, and their determination, when not pleaded, is not necessary to a determination of the issues in such action.

6. The evidence shows that Irvine is a trustee for both Fair and Selover. Although Fair furnished the money Irvine was the agent of both. This, we think, is clearly shown by the evidence. Defendant moved for a nonsuit on the grounds, among others, that there was a fatal variance between the allegations and the proof; that Selover’s interest has never been assigned; that the quantity of interest of Fair and Selover has not been shown, and Irvine should not be required to convey the whole interest to plaintiff, who is assignee of only Fair’s interest. The court, in a written opinion referring to this matter, says: “The defendant asked leave to amend his answer at the close of the trial, so as to set up the objection as to non-joinder of Selover; but the court refused to allow such amendment, it appearing that the defendant was fully informed, or should have been, of this matter by reason of the evidence given on the trial of the case of Dunham v. Irvine, tried some years ago in the United States circuit court in this city. To have allowed such amendment under the circumstances would have been unjust to the plaintiff, as it would have necessitated a continuance of the cause after an expensive trial.”

The general rule is that an objection on the ground of defect or misjoinder of the parties plaintiff must be taken advantage of by demurrer, if it appear on the face of the complaint, and if it does not so appear, then by answer, or the objection will be waived; but there are exceptions. The Code provides that, “of the parties to the action those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants; but, if the consent of any one who should have been joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint,” (section 382, Code Civil Proc.) and “the court may determine any controversy between parties before it when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in,” (section 389, Code Civil Proc.) The decree in this case declares Irvine to be a trustee for plaintiff of the whole 10,000 shares of the capital stock of the Morgan Mining Company, and directs that he assign and transfer the same to plaintiff, and restrains perpetually the company defendant from making any transfer on its books of said stock, or any part or portion thereof, to any one but plaintiff herein, and directs the company to allow plaintiff all rights and privileges "by law incident to the full legal and equitable ownership of said 10,000 shares of stock."

In the absence of Selover as a party, a complete determination of the controversy, we think, cannot be had without prejudice to his, Selover's rights. The decree, if enforced, might result in a sale to innocent purchasers of Selover's interest, and, as was said in Reyes v. Sanford, 5 Cal. 116, "would have no other effect than to renew litigation by producing more suits in order to settle and determine finally the rights of all parties." A court of equity will not permit litigation by piecemeal. The whole subject-matter and all the parties should be before it, and their respective claims determined once and forever. Generally, in suits between cestuis que trust and trustees, all the parties interested should be before the court. Barb. Parties, 439, 442, 444. If the necessary parties to a full determination are not before the court it is the duty of the court on its own motion to order them brought in; and this, although the defendants in the action have omitted to raise an objection of defect of parties by demurrer or answer. The failure of the court so to do is fatal to the judgment. Osterhoudt v. Board Sup'rs, 98 N. Y. 239; Settembre v. Putnam, 30 Cal. 498; Gates v. Lane, 44 Cal. 396; Barb. Parties, 319.

Selover is a party primarily interested in the stock disposed of by the judgment before us. The amount of his interest therein is not shown. Necessarily, therefore, he would be prejudiced by the execution of this judgment, and must be made a party in order that a complete determination of the controversy may be had. We see no way to avoid a new trial in order to determine the controversy finally and without prejudice to the rights of Selover.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed, and for a new trial.

EDWARDS v. COUNTY OF FRESNO. (No. 11,826.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 31, 1887.)

DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS—FEES.

Acts Cal. 1869-70, p. 170, provide for a salary for the district attorney of Fresno county, and for a fee of $15 for all district attorneys for each conviction in cases of misdemeanor; to be a county charge in Fresno county if the defendant therein is unable to pay it. Pol. Code, §§ 4256-4258, prescribe the duties of district attorneys, and that, when not engaged, they shall attend before magistrates when required in cases of arrest. The attorney for Fresno county sued for fees for convictions in cases that he did not prosecute, nor attempt to collect the fees from the defendants therein, by execution or otherwise. Held, that the county was not liable. THORNTON and TEMPLE, JJ., dissenting; PATERSON, J., expressing no opinion.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; R. E. ORRICK, Judge.

E. D. Edwards, district attorney of Fresno county, plaintiff, sued the county of Fresno for fees. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

D. S. Terry, for appellant. E. D. Edwards, in propria persona, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff as district attorney for the county of Fresno presented for allowance to the board of supervisors of that county a bill for fees alleged to be due him by the county. The bill was disallowed, and the plaintiff instituted the present action to recover the sum claimed. He obtained judgment as prayed for, and from that the county has appealed.

tices' courts of the county, and that where he claimed fees for convictions in the bill he presented and the complaint he filed herein, he did not appear and prosecute said cases in person or by deputy, and did not attempt to collect said fees out of said persons so alleged to have been convicted, and did not cause to have issued any execution against any of said persons so convicted for said fees. Notwithstanding these facts, the district attorney claims that by law the county is indebted to him in the sum of $15 for each of the convictions so had in the magistrates' courts.

The statutes which have any bearing upon the subject are to be found in the acts of 1869-70 and the Political Code, and so much of them as are pertinent read as follows: "The district attorney shall receive for his services, to be paid quarterly in the * * * counties of Fresno, * * * the sum of $1,000. * * * In addition to the salary herein provided, the district attorneys for each of the counties of this state shall be entitled to charge and receive * * * for each conviction in cases of misdemeanor $15. In all convictions the fees herein allowed shall be assessed against the defendant, and shall not become a county charge; provided, that in the counties of * * * Fresno * * * the fees herein allowed shall become a county charge in case of the inability of the defendant to pay the same." St. 1869-70, p. 170. "The district attorney is the public prosecutor, and must * * * institute proceedings before magistrates for the arrest of persons charged with or reasonably suspected of public offenses, when he has information that any such offenses have been committed; and for that purpose, when not engaged in criminal proceedings in the district and county courts, must attend upon the magistrates in cases of arrest when required by them," etc. Section 4256, Pol. Code. Other duties of the district attorney are further prescribed in that section, and in 4257 and 4258, Pol. Code.

It will be perceived that the district attorney for Fresno county was by law to be paid for his services a salary, and in certain cases fees for convictions. We can discover nothing in our laws relating to the district attorney, his duties or fees, which permits us to think that the legislature intended the plaintiff here should be entitled to charge and receive the sum of $15, or any other sum, from the county of Fresno for convictions where he never instituted any proceedings at all, never appeared before the magistrates where the convictions were had, or rendered any service whatever either by himself or deputy. The pervading idea that runs through the whole law pertaining to the compensation allowed district attorneys, is for services rendered as such. Where the law allows him a fee for each conviction, it would seem as if a conviction was meant in which the district attorney or his deputy took some part, either by the institution of the proceedings, by being present or aiding at the trial, or in some other way performing some service as district attorney. In the present instance the record shows no connection by the district attorney with the convictions for which fees are claimed, except the presentation of his bill to the board of supervisors, and the action brought to recover his alleged fees.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and judgment rendered for the defendant on the agreed facts set out in the record.

I concur: BELCHER, C. C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to render judgment for the defendant on the agreed facts set out in the record.

THORNTON, J., and TEMPLE, J., dissenting; PATERSON, J., expressing no opinion.

PHELAN et al. v. POYORENO et al. (No. 11,373.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 29, 1887.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANT—VALIDITY—PATENT.

Where, before the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, whereby the public domain of California was ceded to the United States, a perfect conveyance was made of land by the Mexican government, it cannot be defeated by the subsequent action of the board of commissioners organized under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, for the purpose of determining the validity of claims to land in California, or by the subsequent patent from the United States.

2. SAME—CHAIN OF TITLE.

A record containing the petition, with a diseno, an order of reference, an informe by the proper officer, a decree of concession, a titulo, the approval of the departmental assembly, the order for survey and juridical possession, with the report of the proper officer that such survey was made and possession given, presents every link essential to a chain of title under the Mexican law.

3. SAME—NAME OF GRANTEE.

In the petition for the land the petitioner, Juan Crispin Perez, is twice called "Juan Perez," but in the decree of the governor, in the titulo or patent, and subsequent proceedings, he is called "Juan Crispin Perez," with such reference to the petition and preceding document that there can be no doubt as to his identity. Held that, as the identity of the petitioner sufficiently appears, the variance is immaterial.

4. SAME—DESCRIPTION.

A grant in which the property is described as "the lands known as 'Paso de Bartolo Viejo'" is sufficient, if the land is known and can be identified by the name given.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

On rehearing. Action to quiet title, by Thomas Phelan and others, respondents here, against Eduardo Poyoreno and others, appellants here. The remaining facts are stated in the former opinion in this case, 13 Pac. Rep. 681.

Gardiner & Stephenson, for appellants. Bicknell & White, (Chase Gitchell, of counsel,) for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This cause was decided April 25, 1887, (13 Pac. Rep. 681.) A rehearing was subsequently ordered, and we have again reviewed the case. Upon such review we find no sufficient cause to alter or modify the conclusion reached in the former decision.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, for the reasons given in the former opinion on file, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BOTILLER et al. v. DOMINGUEZ. (No. 11,336.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 29, 1887.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANTS—PERFECTING TITLE—ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

The fact that, in proceedings had prior to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to obtain title to land under the Mexican law, the order for juridical possession preceded the approval of the grant by the departmental assembly, does not render the proceedings fatally defective.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

On rehearing. Action of ejectment by Dominga Dominguez, respondent here, against Brigido Botiller and others, appellants here, for land claimed by plaintiff under a Mexican grant prior to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Appellant, who had been defeated on the previous hearing, claimed that respondent's title was invalid because of an alleged failure of her predecessor in title to take the requisite steps to perfect his title under the Mexican law, in that the predecessor obtained his order for juridical possession before the approval of the departmental assembly. The remaining facts are stated in Botiller v. Dominguez, 13 Pac. Rep. 685, and in Phelan v. Poyoreno, Id. 681.

v.16p.no.4—16
Cal.Rep. 16-19 P.—5

H. K. S. O'Melveny and Chase Gitchell, for appellants. Howard & Roberts and A. L. Rhodes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The judgment and order appealed from in this cause are affirmed, upon the doctrine enunciated and for the reasons given in Phelan v. Poyoreno, 13 Pac. Rep. 681.

We do not regard the fact that juridical possession was given before the approval of the grant by the departmental assembly sufficient to change the status of the case, or differentiate it from the case above mentioned.

GASSEN et al. v. HENDRICK et al. (No. 12,305.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 29, 1887.)

1. VENDOR AND VENDEE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—VALUABLE CONSIDERATION—PRE-EXISTING INDEBTEDNESS.

A deed in consideration of a pre-existing indebtedness is a conveyance for a valuable consideration, under Civil Code Cal. § 1214, which provides that every conveyance of real estate other than a lease for a term not exceeding a year is void as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded.

2. SAME—NOTICE—PROOF—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where a question of notice of a prior deed had arisen between two purchasers, held that, even conceding that a party claiming under the later deed must prove the negative—that he had no notice—yet where some evidence appears to show this, and none appeared showing that he had notice, the finding of the court that he had no notice should be sustained on appeal.

3. DEPOSITION—FAILURE TO ANSWER INTERROGATORIES—OBJECTIONS.

An objection to the introduction of a deposition, on the ground that the witness had refused to answer cross-interrogatories concerning material matters, and that the deposition is not full or complete, is too general, and is not ground for a new trial if overruled, when it appears that full answers were given to all interrogatories but one. The particular interrogatory must be pointed out which it is claimed a witness has not answered.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN D. WORKS, Judge.

Action brought by A. G. Gassen and J. H. Marshall against E. W. Hendrick as administrator of the estate of Cecelia Carr, deceased, George Carr, Charles Carr, William B. Black, A. Lorette, E. Gregory, James Meagher, and P. P. Carnes, to establish their title in, and obtain partition of, certain real property. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

J. R. Jones, Jones & Van Dyke, and Levi Chase, for appellants. N. H. Conklin and Hendrick & Younkin, for respondents. John R. Jones, for defendant E. Gregory. M. A. Luce, for defendant Geo. B. Hensley.

MCKINSTRY, J. On the third day of June, 1871, Clarence L. Carr made a deed to Thomas H. Bush of one undivided half of a certain 20-acre tract of land. The deed was not recorded until the eighth day of July, 1885. On the tenth day of August, 1878, the said Clarence L. Carr signed a deed of the whole tract, with other lands, to Elizabeth R. Carr, his mother, for the recited consideration of $800. This last deed was acknowledged, and was duly recorded August 15, 1878. It is contended by appellants: First, that, as the deed to Elizabeth R. Carr was in consideration of a pre-existing indebtedness, she was not a purchaser for a valuable consideration. Second, that it was not made to appear by those claiming under Elizabeth R. Carr that she was a purchaser "in good faith." Third, that the deed from Clarence L. to Elizabeth was not proved to have been delivered.

1. A conveyance in consideration of the cancellation of pre-existing indebtedness is a conveyance for a valuable consideration, within the meaning of section 1214 of the Civil Code. Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335; Schluter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158, 3 Pac. Rep. 659.

2. Even if it be conceded (for the purpose of this decision) that the burden of proving prima facie the negative—that she or they had no notice of the prior deed to Bush—was on those claiming under Elizabeth R. Carr, still there was evidence of facts tending to establish that she had no notice, which, in the absence of direct evidence of notice, was sufficient to justify the finding of the court that she was a purchaser in good faith.

3. The court below found that the deed from Clarence L. to Elizabeth R. Carr was executed on the day it bears date. The statement on motion for a new trial contains no specification that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the execution or delivery of the deed.

The plaintiffs (appellants) objected generally to the reading in evidence of the deposition of Alice E. Carr on the ground “that the witness has refused to answer the interrogatories put on behalf of the plaintiffs herein, and concerning material matter affecting the rights of the parties to this suit, and that the deposition is not full or complete or responsive to the question put to the witness by plaintiffs in the commission upon which the evidence was taken.” And upon like grounds the plaintiffs subsequently moved to strike out the deposition.

It is insisted that the deposition should have been stricken out and not considered by the court. The objection was to the whole deposition on the ground that the witness had refused to answer the interrogatories put to her on behalf of the plaintiffs. The deposition shows that all the interrogatories of plaintiffs were directly and fully answered by the witness, unless the answer to cross-interrogatory No. 27 is an exception. The objection to the deposition was too general. In Valton v. Assurance Co., 20 N. Y. 34, the court of appeals said: “The objection of the defendants’ counsel to the introduction of the deposition was properly overruled. The ground of objection was that the first and ninth cross-interrogatories were answered only in part. These interrogatories each embraced a large number of questions, and there was an answer given to each of the interrogatories, although some questions contained in each were not answered. The objection was too general. The counsel should, under such circumstances, call the attention of the judge to the particular question unanswered, and make his exception equally specific. It is not the duty of a judge upon the trial of an issue to examine an interrogatory containing a great number of questions for the purpose of learning every question embraced in it, and then to examine the answer to the interrogatory to ascertain whether each question is fully answered. As well might a general objection be taken to a deposition upon the ground that all the interrogatories were not answered, without specifying any one.”

In the case before us the objection extended to the interrogatories of plaintiffs, and concerning material matter, etc. It was the right of the judge below to have his attention called to the particular interrogatory which the witness had “refused to answer,” or her answer to which was evasive or not fully responsive. Judgment and order affirmed.

SCHROEDER v. SCHMIDT. (No. 9,812.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 30, 1887.)

1. NONSUIT—OBJECTION TO ORDER GRANTING REVIEW ON APPEAL.

An error in granting a nonsuit is one of law, and must be so specified and excepted to or it will not be reviewed. It cannot be reviewed on an objection that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision.

2. SALE—BILL OF SALE—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—PAROL EVIDENCE.

Parol evidence as to what property was covered by a certain bill of sale, the bill itself being introduced and the property being therein described, is inadmissible.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

An action to recover the value of a building and the value of the use and occupation thereof, which plaintiff alleged had been assigned by him to defendant by inducement of the latter, and without consideration, while plaintiff was deranged in his mind. The sale was made by a bill in writing, and plaintiff offered to prove orally that a bill of sale introduced in evidence did not cover certain property, the sale of which it was claimed said bill affirmed. Plaintiff was nonsuited, and appealed.

John F. Burris, for appellant. Edw. W. Blaney, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. The plaintiff was nonsuited at the trial. He took no exception to the ruling, and the statement does not specify it as error. An error in granting a nonsuit is an error in law, and should be excepted to and specified as such. Donahue v. Gallavan, 43 Cal. 576; Cravens v. Dewey, 13 Cal. 42. It cannot be reviewed on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision. This is a ground for the review of questions of fact, not of law.

There was no error in the ruling on the plaintiff's offer to prove what was intended by the bill of sale, or what was included in it. Such evidence was not admissible to contradict or add to the writing. And if it be said that the object was to show the situation of the property so as to explain the writing, the answer is that the offer was too vague, and the ruling was proper on that ground alone. Smith v. East Branch Co., 54 Cal. 164.

We therefore advise that the order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

McFARLAND, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment because no error appears which would warrant us in disturbing the judgment of the court below. But I am not prepared to say that, on an appeal from an order denying a new trial, a final judgment, though following an order granting a nonsuit, may not be reviewed on a bill of exceptions containing the evidence and the rulings at the trial, even if there was no formal exception to the order granting the nonsuit.

PEOPLE v. THORNTON et al. (No. 20,346.)

(Supreme Court of California, January 3, 1888.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—SEPARATION.

After retiring for deliberation, the jury in a criminal case went to a restaurant. While there, three jurors went to the bar, about 25 feet from where the others sat, for drinks. Held that, under Pen. Code Cal. § 1181, subd. 3, regulating new trials, such separation is ground for a new trial.

2. SAME—RECEIVING EVIDENCE OUT OF COURT.

In the trial of an indictment for libel, after retiring to deliberate on their verdict, the jury found and read portions of a pamphlet containing the alleged libel. The pamphlet had been admitted in evidence, and partly read to the jury. Held, that the jury had "received evidence out of court," and under Pen. Code Cal. § 1181, subd. 2, a new trial should be granted.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER—CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS—HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

In the trial of an indictment for libel, a witness testified to having heard the printer of the alleged libel say that the defendant "had given him only twenty minutes to do the job in." Held, that such declaration was hearsay, and inadmissible.

McKINSTRY, McFARLAND, and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM A. CHENEY, Judge.

Information for libel against A. M. Thornton and B. A. Stephens. The jury having found a verdict of guilty, the defendants moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and thereupon they appealed to this court.

G. Gordon Adams, C. C. Stephens, and W. R. Finlayson, for appellants.
Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The defendants were tried on an information for libel. They were convicted; moved for a new trial, which was denied; and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, have appealed. One of the grounds on which they moved for a new trial is that "the jury separated, without leave of the court, after retiring to deliberate upon their verdict."

1. The record shows that the jury retired to their room about 10 P. M. to deliberate upon their verdict; and after remaining there two hours or more, and before agreeing upon a verdict, they left their room, accompanied by the officer having them in charge, and went across the street from the court-house to a restaurant, and ordered supper. While that was being prepared, three of the jurors went to a bar not more than 25 feet distant from the officer and the other jurors, and ordered some drinks, which were given to them. After that they rejoined the officer and the other jurors. They then partook of the supper prepared for them, and returned to the court-house, but, instead of going into the jury-room, went into the court-room, and there continued their deliberations until they agreed upon a verdict of guilty.

Did that constitute separation, within the meaning of subdivision 3, § 1181, Pen. Code? This question is not a new one in this court. In People v. Brannigan, 21 Cal. 337, the court, FIELD, C. J., delivering the opinion, said: "The statute regulating proceedings in criminal cases provides that when the jury do not agree, after a case has been submitted to them, without retiring for deliberation, one or more officers shall be sworn 'to keep them together in some private and convenient place, and not to permit any person to speak to them, nor to speak to them themselves, unless it be to ask them whether they have agreed upon a verdict, and to return them into court when they have so agreed.' And it empowers the court to grant a new trial 'when the jury have separated, without leave of the court, after retiring to deliberate upon their verdict, or been guilty of any misconduct tending to prevent a fair and due consideration of the case.' The object of the first provision is to remove the jury from all improper influences in their deliberations; and the object of the second provision is to permit a remedy where the jury have been subjected to such influences, or been themselves guilty of misconduct tending to affect the purity of their verdict." In that case it appeared that while the jury had the case under consideration, and before they had agreed upon a verdict, they were taken by the officer who had them in charge to a hotel opposite the room in which they were deliberating, to get their dinner, and while there the proprietor of the hotel spoke to some of the jurors, and told them to convict the defendant. This the court says was a mere passing remark of the proprietor of the hotel, which, however improper, did not constitute misconduct of the jury. As we construe the opinion of the court, the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, on the sole ground of a separation of the jury, without leave of the court, after retiring to deliberate upon their verdict. There has been no change of the law relating to this subject since the decision of People v. Brannigan was rendered. The statute upon which that decision was based has since been incorporated into and become a part of the Penal Code. In a much earlier case, People v. Backus, 5 Cal. 275, it appeared that one of the jurors absented himself from the jury-room for the period of two hours, without leave of the court. The court held the correct rule to be that, if the separation was such that the juror might have been improperly influenced by others, the verdict should be set aside, and that the affidavit of the juror could not be admitted to purge his conduct from the imputation of corruption or impropriety. The facts which were held in People v. Brannigan, supra, to constitute a separation of the jury, are strikingly similar to those in the case now before us. We do not feel inclined to disturb the rule of that case, which, if applied here, is decisive of the question before us. A new trial on this ground should have been granted, and the order denying it must be reversed.

2. While deliberating in the court-room, one of the jurors picked up a pamphlet entitled "Life of Horace Bell," and read portions of it to the other jurors. Appellants insist that by doing so the jury received evidence out of court. It appears by the record that the pamphlet was admitted in evidence, and, by consent, considered read in evidence, that it might be referred to in the arguments of counsel. It does not appear that it was read to the jury before they retired. The Code provides that, upon retiring for deliberation, the jury may take with them all papers (except depositions) which have been received as evidence in the cause. Pen. Code, § 1181, subd. 2. A defendant is entitled to a new trial "when the jury has received any evidence out of court other than that resulting from a view of the premises." Id. subd. 3. The charge of libel is based upon a single paragraph, embracing two or three lines only of the pamphlet, which consists of many pages of libelous matter. It is stated in one of the affidavits used on the motion for a new trial that one of defendants' counsel, in his argument to the jury, read some portions of the pamphlet. How much or what portions is not stated. The pamphlet was received in evidence as a whole, while parts of it only were read in the presence of the jury before they retired. If the portions read in the presence of the jury after they had retired were not read in their presence before they retired, we think they may have received evidence out of court, as the paragraph upon which the charge of libel is based is one of the mildest of an innumerable number of libels contained in the pamphlet. No part of it could be read without reading a libel of a very damaging character. The propriety of permitting the jury, on retiring for deliberation, to take with them said pamphlet was not considered by the court or counsel. The jury did not take it with them; they found it after they had retired. By listening to the reading of it, we think they must have received evidence out of court which on retiring for deliberation they did not take with them. That, in our opinion, entitles the defendants to a new trial.

The questions thus far considered illustrate quite forcibly the danger of any departure by juries or officers in charge of them from the course of conduct prescribed by the Code.

The motion of defendants' counsel to have the statement of the witness Sumner, that "the boy said that Stephens had given him only twenty minutes to do the job in," stricken out, should have been granted. It was hearsay evidence, and inadmissible.

The record presents no other material error, but for those above specified the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial must be reversed. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.

PATERSON, J., (concurring.) I concur, on the ground that the jury received evidence out of court. "Upon retiring for deliberation, the jury may take with them all papers (except depositions,)" etc. There is significance in the words "upon retiring for deliberation," and a substantial observance of the provision will subserve a wise and just purpose. The court and the attorneys should know what papers are taken by the jury. The defendant certainly has the right to know what documents the jury desire to take with them,—or which they call for during their deliberation,—in order that he may submit to them for their consideration any other papers which may tend to explain the contents of the papers asked for. The value of this right, and the importance of its enforcement, is apparent in cases like the one at bar, where only portions of the documentary evidence are read to the jury, and commented on. Counsel, of course, assume that only those portions are actually before the jury; and they conduct the defense, and conclude the trial, accordingly.

McKINSTRY, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. The statement of the witness which the court refused to strike out was made while he was at work, in the printing-office of one of the defendants, upon the pamphlet containing the alleged libelous matter. The declaration was part of the res gestæ. But, even if error, it could not have injured the defendants.

The "Life of Horace Bell" was admitted in evidence, and was, by consent, considered as read. The reading of portions of the pamphlet by one of the jurors to the others was not, in my opinion, the reception of evidence out of court, within the meaning of section 1181, Pen. Code. The evidence had been received in court. Nor can I perceive that it was misconduct in the jurors—such as prevented a fair and due consideration of the case—for them to read portions of a pamphlet which was in evidence "and considered read." If there were other documents in evidence which explained the pamphlet, or changed its effect, that fact should have been shown by the defendants, who moved for a new trial.

Did the jury "separate?" Pen. Code, § 1181. I do not think the affidavits on motion for new trial show a separation. In People v. Kelly, 46 Cal. 357, it was held that the facts that the jury, after they retired for deliberation, were conducted by the officer having them in charge to the dining-room of a hotel, where they remained together for three-quarters of an hour; that one of the doors of the room was open, and accessible to strangers; and that the officer in charge was absent from the room for a few minutes during the period named,—were insufficient to constitute misconduct on the part of the jury; there being affidavits that no person in fact conversed with the jurors. But even if it should be conceded that the affidavits show a "separation," in that it appears therefrom that three of the jury went apart from the others a distance of 20 or 25 feet, the rule is firmly established that the separation of the jury is but prima facie ground for new trial. Its effect is always subject to be rebutted by proof that no improper influence reached the jurors. The rule is so laid down in People v. Brannigan, 21 Cal. 337, cited in the prevailing opinion herein. And it seems to have been so ruled in Arkansas, Connecticut, Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Illinois, Indiana, New York, Mississippi, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Wisconsin.

As a general rule, a verdict cannot be impeached by the affidavit of a jurymen, but such affidavit is admissible in support of the verdict. In the case at bar the motion was based on the affidavit of the defendant. Three of the jurymen, including two of the three said to have separated from the others, testified that the three were continuously in the presence and sight of the other jurors, and of the officer in charge, and not more than 20 or 25 feet distant from them. Further, that they did not converse with any person, and did not speak to any person, except to ask the barkeeper for the "drinks" they desired, or, in the language of one of the affidavits, "to nominate their beverages." It does not affirmatively appear that any of them drank of that which could intoxicate, and one of the three paid for what they drank. The evidence was amply sufficient to overcome any inference that the jurymen might have been approached or improperly influenced.

Moreover, it has been held that, when the evidence with respect to the misconduct of a jurymen is substantially conflicting, the action of the trial court in refusing a new trial will not be disturbed. People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 399.

HALEY v. HALEY. (No. 11,778.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 5, 1888.)

DIVORCE—GROUNDS—CRUELTY—FILING FALSE AND MALICIOUS AFFIDAVIT.

In an action for divorce by the wife on the ground of cruelty, the cruelty alleged consisted in the filing by the husband, in another action between the same parties, of a "false and malicious" affidavit charging the wife with unchastity. The petition did not aver that the action wherein the affidavit was filed had been terminated in favor of the wife, or had been terminated at all. Held, that a demurrer to the petition should have been sustained.¹ MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

Action for divorce by Presentacion Ballestero de Haley against her husband, Salisbury Haley, on the ground of extreme cruelty. The plaintiff was granted a divorce as prayed for, and the defendant appeals to this court.

S. Haley, in pro. per., and David Lyons, for appellant. Hupp & Glowner, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. The court below should have sustained the demurrer to the complaint. The action is for divorce. The complaint avers the defendant was guilty of extreme cruelty, in that, in another action brought by her against him, he filed an affidavit containing statements of want of chastity on her part prior to their marriage; and in that, in an action brought by him against her, he filed a complaint charging that, prior to the marriage of these parties, she was pregnant by another man. The complaint herein avers that the statements of defendant in the affidavit and complaint referred to were wholly false and malicious. The complaint herein does not directly state the character of the two actions mentioned, or of the issues made by the pleadings in either. It may, however, be inferred from the allegations as a whole that both were actions for divorce,—the one brought by the plaintiff; the other by the defendant herein. The complaint does not show what was the particular motion, application, or proceeding in which the affidavit was filed, nor does it appear therefrom but the statements in the affidavit were relevant and material to the issue presented on the motion, application, or proceeding. There is no averment that either the action brought by the plaintiff in which the affidavit was filed, or the particular proceeding in such action in which the affidavit was filed, has terminated adversely to the present defendant, or terminated at all. And there is no averment that the action brought by the defendant herein against the present plaintiff has come to an end in any way.

1. While the action brought by the wife for a divorce was pending, and the proceeding in such action, in which the affidavit of the husband was filed, was undetermined, could the wife bring the present action, charging as an act of extreme cruelty the making by her husband of the statements contained in the affidavit?

2. While the action for divorce brought by the husband (defendant herein) against his wife (plaintiff herein) was still pending and undetermined, could the latter commence the present action, and rely, as ground for divorce, upon statements, contained in the complaint of the husband, showing fraud by the present plaintiff in the contracting of the marriage? The averments of the complaint in the action brought by the present defendant against the plaintiff herein were proper in themselves, and, if true, may be the basis of a decree for divorce. Whether true or not true may be the issue in that action. The present plaintiff cannot, by alleging that the averments of the defendant to the other suit are false and malicious, transfer to the present action the trial of the issue of their falsity. In the action brought by the defendant, it may be adjudicated that the averments of his complaint are true. The orderly administration of the law demands of us to hold that this action was, at least, commenced prematurely. This appears on the face of the complaint, and the objection could properly be taken by general demurrer. Suppose a divorce should be sought by a wife on the ground of desertion, and the husband should file a "cross-complaint," charging her with adultery; would it be contended that, while the suit was pending, she could commence and maintain another action for divorce upon the ground that the counter-charge was "false and malicious?" To permit the trial by anticipation, in a new action, of an issue in an action already pending, would lead to confusion, and, perhaps, to contradictory adjudications, since the evidence might not be the same at both trials. True, in the present action, the allegation is that the averments of the complaint in the action brought by the husband were not only false, but malicious. In the action brought by the husband, the truth of the averments made by him could alone be in issue; if true, his malice in making them would be an immaterial circumstance. But the averment, in the present complaint, includes the question of the falsity of the husband's allegations. However much malice may have entered into the action of the defendant, the plaintiff could not recover in this action unless she proved his averments in the suit brought by him to be false. The objection to the present complaint as to the averments of the defendant in the action brought by him, applies, also, to the allegations of the present complaint with respect to the relevant and pertinent statements of the defendant's affidavit, filed in the action first commenced by her.

It may not be improper to remark that it is at least doubtful whether the Codes provide for a cross-complaint in actions for divorce. "Recrimination is a showing by the defendant of any cause of divorce against the plaintiff, in bar of the plaintiff's cause of divorce." Civil Code, § 122. An action for divorce is not brought on the "contract" of marriage, but upon certain violations of duties or obligations annexed to the status of matrimony, which are enumerated in section 92, Civil Code, as causes for which a divorce may be granted. Recriminatory facts should be pleaded, but it would seem they are pleaded and proved as a defense simply, and in bar of the plaintiff's cause. When in bar of an action for divorce, the defendant pleads the commission by the plaintiff of any of the wrongs mentioned in section 92, Civil Code, and prays for a divorce, does he seek affirmative relief "relating to or depending upon the transaction upon which the action is brought?" If not, section 442, Code Civil Proc., does not apply to actions for divorce. Nor is there any general principle, independent of the Code, which authorizes a cross-complaint in actions for divorce "to prevent multiplicity of suits." The statutes regulate the matter in other cases; and the law does not so especially favor actions for divorce as to make them exceptions to a rule otherwise uniform.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with direction to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

I concur in the judgment: THORNTON, J.

McFARLAND, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. In my opinion a false and malicious charge, of the character stated in the complaint, made by a husband against a wife, cannot be evaded on the ground that it was made in the shape of an affidavit in an action. I think, too, that it fairly appears that the litigation in which the affidavit occurred is ended.

(Supreme Court of California. December 30, 1887.)

HIGHWAYS—RESTRAINING OBSTRUCTION—PLEADING—ALLEGATION OF SPECIAL INJURY.

In an action to restrain the obstruction of a public road, the allegations of the petition showed that plaintiff was damaged in the same manner, though possibly somewhat more, than the general public, but there were no allegations of special injury. Held, that a demurrer thereto was properly sustained.¹

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Geo. M. Holton and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson and Richard Dunnigan, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to abate an alleged nuisance, to obtain a perpetual injunction for certain purposes, and for $1,000 damages. The amended complaint was demurred to as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and an answer filed at the same time. A motion was made to dissolve a preliminary injunction which had been granted, and affidavits were filed upon both sides. That motion was submitted to the court upon the amended complaint, answer, and demurrer; afterwards, that tribunal made an order sustaining the demurrer, and dissolving the injunction, and the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered that the action be dismissed, and that the defendants recover their costs. From the judgment and order the plaintiff has appealed.

The facts stated in the complaint upon which the plaintiff based its contention, are that the defendants have obstructed a public highway in such a manner as to prevent the plaintiff having ingress or egress to and from a tract of land which it owns situated at a point in a canyon above the place where the obstruction is placed, and which prevents it from making any use of its land which it desires. There is no special injury averred as accruing to the property of the plaintiff, beyond the statement of such facts as go to show that it perhaps will suffer more inconvenience from the alleged nuisance than the general public, and the injury thus alleged, although it results from the necessity the plaintiff is under, perhaps, to travel the road oftener than that of the general public, is of the same nature as would fall to the lot of any other person who might be obliged to make use of the road. It is held that a private individual may bring an action of the kind here instituted and maintain it, when he is able to show some special damage to him in addition to that received by the public. Aram v. Schallenberger, 41 Cal. 450.

Judge SHAW in Canal v. Newcomb, 7 Mete. 276, says: "Where one suffers in common with all the public, although, from his proximity to the obstructed way, or otherwise from his more frequent occasion to use it, he may suffer in a greater degree than others, still he cannot have an action, because it would cause such a multiplicity of suits as to be itself an intolerable evil." A similar principle was announced in Seelly v. Bishop, 19 Conn. 128. O'Brien v. Railroad, 17 Conn. 372, was a case where a private person undertook to enjoin the defendant from constructing its railroad over an arm of the sea alleged to be navigable, and used by the plaintiff, as well as others, when they chose, for the purpose of passage up and down the cove connected by it with the River Thames, a navigable river, and where it was also alleged that, by means of the construction of the road, the navigation of that cove would be greatly obstructed and rendered almost wholly useless. The relief prayed for was not allowed, for the alleged reason that the injury was the same which might be occasioned to any one who desired to pass up and down the cove.

What other peculiar injury is caused to the plaintiff than would result to any other person whose only mode of ingress or egress to or from his land was by that road, we are not able to perceive. The amount of injury might be largely greater in one case than the other, but the kind of injury would still be the same. The case of Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156, cited to us in favor of the appellant's view, that it suffers a peculiar injury, is not in point, because the facts were different from those alleged here. There the obstruction was erected so near, and in such a relative situation to, the plaintiff's lot, located on the water-front of the city of San Francisco, that boats and vessels were prevented from approaching it, and the injury which thereby resulted to the plaintiff, and his particular lot, was not in common with the public. The case of Schulte v. Transportation Co., 50 Cal. 592, was one where the proof showed that the defendant maintained a bulkhead or wall, on the west line of East street, across the entire front of the plaintiff's lot, which wholly precluded all access to the lot from the street. That was held to be a special damage not common to that suffered by the public.

We do not understand from the facts alleged here that where the public road ran over, through, or along the plaintiff's land, it was wholly prevented from getting into that road. But it was the obstruction put into the road at a point not upon or adjoining its land, but between its land and places to and from which it wished to travel on the road, which prevented it using the road or, as it claims, using its land. Therefore, it would appear that the plaintiff would suffer no different injury in not being able to have ingress and egress by the public road, than would any one else who may have owned land, wood, and water rights in the canyon or pocket. Bigley v. Nunan, 53 Cal. 404, was not a case where the plaintiff was wholly prevented from getting into the street at his lot by an obstruction, but was a case where he was impeded in passing along the street, as others were, which was an injury that any one else using the street would have encountered. Shirley v. Bishop, 67 Cal. 543, 8 Pac. Rep. 82, was a case very similar to that of Blanc v. Klumpke, supra, where the plaintiff's ferry-rights peculiar to him would have been injuriously obstructed, and we do not think that what is said in the opinion there delivered, or in that of any other case decided by this court, is in conflict with the principles laid down in Aram v. Schallenberger, supra.

The injury alleged to be suffered by the plaintiff is that it is entirely prevented from passing over the road, for its objects and purposes, which it claims renders its land useless to it. So any one else desiring to travel that road would be entirely prevented from passing over it and obtaining the object he had in view. The objects sought to be attained may be different, but the manner in which their accomplishment is prevented, the way in which injury is inflicted, is the same; all parties are restrained from traveling towards different points, perhaps, and for different purposes, by the same barrier; but that barrier is not so erected as that all other persons can get into the public road at their land and the plaintiff cannot.

For these reasons the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

OAKS v. SCHEIFFERLY. (No. 11,453.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 31, 1887.)

1. BONDS—INDEMNITY—WHEN CAUSE OF ACTION ACCRUES.

A cause of action on an indemnity bond given to a sheriff which recites that it is given to indemnify and save him harmless from all damages, expenses, costs, and charges, does not accrue until the sheriff has been compelled to pay such damages, costs, etc.

2. SAME—DEFENSE TO ACTION.

In an action on a bond given to indemnify a sheriff, who has levied upon property under writ of execution, a plea was entered that the party for whom the property was taken, and who furnished the bond and sureties, was not the proper party to whom the sheriff should have paid the funds secured by the levy. Held, that such plea was not good, as the object of the bond was to secure to such party the funds arising from the levy.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

An action by J. W. Oaks upon an indemnity bond given by J. J. Scheifferly and George M. Payne to indemnify him for all damages, etc., suffered by holding certain property levied upon by him under a writ of execution. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

F. Adams and V. A. Gregg, for appellant. J. M. Wilcoxson and McD. R. Venable, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Preston recovered a judgment against Jones, and caused an execution to issue thereon. The writ was placed in the hands of the respondent herein, who was at that time sheriff of San Luis Obispo county. He levied on wheat and barley, which one Meherin claimed and demanded as his property. Thereupon Preston, as principal, and Scheifferly and Payne, as sureties, executed a bond in the sum of $700, which, after reciting the above facts, and that Preston, notwithstanding the claim and demand of Meherin to have the property delivered to him, insisted on the retention of the property by the sheriff under said levy, concludes as follows: "Now, therefore, the condition of this obligation is such that if the said R. M. Preston, J. J. Scheifferly, and George M. Payne, their heirs, executors, and administrators, shall well, and truly indemnify and save harmless the said sheriff, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, of and from all damages, expenses, costs, and charges, and against all loss and liability which he, the said sheriff, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, shall sustain or in any way be put to, for or by reason of the levy, taking, sale, or retention by the said sheriff, in his custody under said execution, of the said property claimed as aforesaid, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue." The respondent then proceeded under the execution and levy, and sold the property as the law directs, and paid the proceeds of the sale to Preston. Meherin sued respondent for the value of the property, and on the eighteenth day of December, 1880, recovered judgment therefor. Respondent appealed from that judgment to this court, which, on the twenty-fifth of May, 1885, affirmed the judgment. The respondent paid the judgment, and on the fourth of September, 1885, commenced this action. These facts appearing upon the face of the complaint, appellants demurred thereto, on the grounds that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that plaintiff's action was commenced more than four years after his cause of action accrued, and his cause of action is barred in virtue of the statute of limitations, by provisions of sections 312, 337, Code Civil Proc. Cal. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant Scheifferly answered, and pleaded, among other things, the bar of the statute of limitations.

Appellant insists that the court erred in overruling his demurrer, because it plainly appears on the face of the complaint that the cause of action accrued more than four years before the action was commenced. He contends that the cause of action accrued on the eighteenth day of December, 1880, when Meherin recovered his judgment against respondent. This action was commenced September 4, 1885, within a few months after the judgment in *Meherin v. Oaks*¹ had been affirmed and paid. A cause of action accrued on a breach of any of the covenants of the bond, and not before the breach of some of them. This action is clearly founded on the breach of the covenant to "indemnify and save harmless the said sheriff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, of and from all damages, expenses, costs, and charges * * * which he, the said sheriff, his heirs, * * * shall sustain or in anywise be put to for or by reason of the levy, taking, sale, or retention by the said sheriff in his custody under execution of the said property claimed as aforesaid," i. e., by Meherin. There is a further covenant to indemnify and save the said sheriff, etc., harmless "against all loss and liability" by reason of the levy. But this action, as we construe the complaint, is not based upon an alleged breach of that clause, although it states facts which show a breach of that as well as of the other. It states facts which show a breach of the covenant to indemnify and save harmless from all damages, expenses, costs, and charges, and it is well settled that a cause of action would not accrue for a breach of that covenant until the obligee had been compelled to pay, and had paid, damages. Lott v. Mitchell, 32 Cal. 24. McBeth v. McIntyre, 57 Cal. 49, holds that a cause of action for a breach of the covenant to indemnify, etc., against liability would accrue as soon as a judgment was recovered against the officer for the property levied on, because the indemnity given was not only against actual damage, etc., but also against "all liability therefor." In that case a judgment had been recovered against the obligee of the bond, which he had not paid before the bringing of his action, and the defendants insisted that the action could not be maintained until the judgment was paid. But there is not even an intimation in the opinion, that a cause of action on the indemnity against damages would not arise for the first time when the judgment was paid. This action is for the recovery of actual damages, and could not be maintained if nothing had been paid. As the complaint shows the payment was made within four years before the commencement of the action, it is not barred by the statute of limitations, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

In addition to his plea of the statute of limitations, the defendant pleaded that Meherin had no interest in the property levied on except by chattel mortgage, which the court found to be true. The proceeds of the sale were paid by respondent to Preston. Appellant insists that the proceeds should have been paid to the mortgagee, and that respondent misappropriated the fund arising from the sale. We think the sole object of giving a bond of indemnity was to have the claim of Meherin wholly disregarded. Of that Meherin was the only person who could complain, and he seems to have taken good care of his interests in the premises. The point that respondent, by appealing from the judgment recovered against him and executing a stay-bond, granted an extension to Preston, principal obligee, of the indemnity bond, does not impress us favorably.

The record discloses no material error. Judgment affirmed.

GRAY v. DIXON. (No. 12,211.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 21, 1888.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—CONFLICTING TITLES—POSSESSORY ACTION—STATUTES—REPEAL.

Pol. Code Cal. tit. 8, c. 1, relates wholly to lands belonging to the state, but does not attempt to regulate the rights of parties in possession of public lands of the United States; hence Act Cal. April 20, 1852, entitled "An act to provide the mode of maintaining and defending possessory actions on public lands in this state," is not within the provisions of Pol. Code Cal. § 18, which provides that "no statute, law, or rule is continued in force because it is consistent with the provisions of this Code on the same subject, but, in all cases provided for by this Code, all statutes, laws, and rules heretofore in force in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed and abrogated."

2. SAME—DEFENSE OF OUTSTANDING TITLES IN UNITED STATES.

It is no defense to an action of ejectment brought by a settler on public land under the possessory act of California of 1852, that the title to the land is in the United States; public policy having called for the establishment in California of the rule that, the owner of the true title not objecting or consenting to the possession of either of the parties, the court regards the better right, as between the parties, to be vested in the first possessor.

3. SAME—ERECTION OF IMPROVEMENTS—EVIDENCE.

In an ejectment suit brought by plaintiff, a settler under the possessory act of California of 1852, plaintiff offered to show that he built a house upon the land, and the cost thereof. Held, that such evidence was improperly excluded, as plaintiff was required to show a compliance with the act, which required improvements on the land to the value of $300 within 90 days after the record of entry, and the evidence would have tended to show that the act had been complied with.

4. SAME—EVIDENCE OF OUSTER.

It was also error to exclude evidence showing that defendant had torn down a part of plaintiff's house, as the erection and occupation of the house by plaintiff was an important element in determining the character of his possession, and any interference therewith was important in determining the question of ouster.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; HENRY M. WILIS, Judge.

Charles R. Gray, the plaintiff, on the fourth day of December, 1885, settled upon and took possession of a tract of land belonging to the public land of the United States, under the possessory act of California, entitled "An act to provide the mode of maintaining and defending possessory actions on public lands in this state," approved April 20, 1852. In September, 1886, John C. Dixon, the defendant, moved upon the same tract under color of a previous claim. Gray brought suit in ejectment. Judgment for defendant, Dixon, and plaintiff appeals.

Hargrave & Gray, for appellant. Curtis, Otis & Conner, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. From the evidence offered by the plaintiff, it appears that on December 4, 1885, plaintiff built a house upon, and took possession of, the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, and N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, of section 8, township 2 S., range 4 W., S. B. B. and M. On December 24, 1885, he filed in the office of the county recorder an affidavit setting forth the facts required by the act of April 20, 1852, known as the "Possessory Act." Thereafter he caused the lands to be surveyed, and posts to be put in the ground at several points in the exterior boundaries, upon which were nailed sheet-iron strips with the words painted thereon "Charles R. Gray's land." These posts remain where they were placed, but the land has never been fenced. When plaintiff settled on the land it was wholly unoccupied and unimproved surveyed public land of the United States. In the winter of 1885-86, plaintiff plowed, harrowed, and sowed ten acres in one portion of the tract, one acre in another portion, and ten acres in still another portion; from all of which crops were taken in the summer following. He also planted fruit trees and grape-vines upon the land, and dug a well thereon. In the following winter, for the purpose of raising another crop, he plowed a portion of the land cultivated the year prior. The plaintiff testified that he was a citizen of the United States, and owned no other land. On September 7, 1886, the defendant served upon him a written demand, which reads as follows:

"SAN BERNARDINO, September 7, 1886.

"Mr. Charles R. Gray—SIR: I hereby notify you to vacate the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 8, township 2, range 4 W., San Bernardino meridian, as I have filed on the same, and wish to occupy it myself.

"JOHN C. DIXON."

Plaintiff did not vacate any land; but on the ninth of September, 1886, defendant hauled lumber upon the land, built a small dwelling-house thereon, and in October following took his family to live upon the land, where they have ever since lived. The defendant plowed and sowed some of the land which plaintiff had cultivated in 1885. The defendant offered no evidence.

It is claimed that the act of April 20, 1852, has been repealed by section 18, Pol. Code, inasmuch as title 8, Pol. Code, "fully provides for the settlement, disposition of, and protection of, the rights of the parties in possession of the public lands of the state of California." Section 18, supra, provides that "no statute, law, or rule is continued in force because it is consistent with the provisions of this Code on the same subject, but, in all cases provided for by this Code, all statutes, laws, and rules heretofore in force in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed and abrogated." Title 8 does fully provide for the protection of the rights of parties in possession of lands belonging to the state, and for the settlement and disposition of such lands, but in no wise attempts to regulate the rights of parties in possession of public lands of the United States. Neither does the act of March 3, 1874, affect the rights of claimants who have not filed pre-emption or homestead applications. The laws referred to apply only to those claims which are connected with the paramount source of title. Our attention has not been called to any act or to any section of the Code which brings the possessory act of 1852 within the provisions of section 18, Pol. Code. It is therefore, we think, applicable to cases of this kind.

Again, it is said that, "even were the act not repealed, it would, we submit, be altogether inoperative in so far as it might affect any lands of the United States. The legislature of this state would certainly not have power to confer upon a settler upon the lands of the United States constructive possession of any parcel of such land." But it is too late now to raise such objection to the act. The general rule that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's, and that it is sufficient in defense of such action to show that the title is in a third person, has always been restricted in this state. Owing to the anomalous condition of things, arising out of our peculiar mining and agricultural interests, the origin of titles, and the delays caused in securing final confirmations of grants of land by those claiming under a former sovereign, it was seen early in the history of the state that confusion must follow if the general rule referred to were enforced. The larger portion of the mining lands within the state belonged to the United States. Mining was the principal industry. Actions for possession of mining claims upon the public lands became numerous, and it was very soon perceived that, if proof of the paramount title of the government would operate to defeat such claims, disaster must follow. It therefore came to be the rule, as stated by Mr. Chief Justice FIELD in Hubbard v. Barry, 21 Cal. 325, that, "the owner of the true title not objecting or consenting to the possession of either of the parties, the court regards the better right, as between the parties, to be vested in the first possessor, and grantees claiming through him. The rule rests upon its necessity for the preservation of peace and quiet in a country where titles to tracts of land, measured by leagues, are under consideration by the tribunals of the United States, and there is an indisposition, in numerous instances, on the part of claimants, to assert their legal rights against the occupants until the final action of those tribunals." The reason of this rule has not ceased, neither should the rule itself.

Plaintiff offered to show that he built a house upon the lands, and the cost thereof. Defendant objected, and his objection was sustained. This was error. Plaintiff was required to show a compliance with the statute, which required improvements upon the land to the value of $200 within 90 days after the date of the record. The evidence would have tended, in connection with other evidence introduced without objection, to show that the act had been complied with, and was admissible also to show the character of plaintiff's possession,—his dominion over the lands adjoining the house.

It was also error to exclude evidence showing that defendant had torn down a part of plaintiff's house. The erection and occupation of the house by plaintiff was an important element in determining the character of his possession, and any interference therewith was important in determining the question of ouster. The possessory act provides (section 6) that "the possession or possessory right of the plaintiff shall be considered as extending to the boundaries embraced by the claim of such plaintiff, so as to enable him or his heir, according to section 3, to have and maintain any action as aforesaid, without being compelled to prove an actual inclosure."

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

BARNARD v. WILSON. (No. 12,320.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 21, 1888.)

1. MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER AGAINST HEIR OF THE VENDEE OF THE LAND.

Defendant mortgaged and then sold land. Plaintiff purchased at the mortgage sale. The probate court afterwards assigned the land to defendant as heir to his vendee. Held that, under Code Civil Proc. § 1663, providing that on final settlement of an executor's or administrator's accounts the court shall distribute the estate among those entitled; section 1666, that "such decree is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal;" section 1678, providing for the substitution of purchasers in the place of the heirs, etc., whose interest they hold; and section 1908, declaring judgments of probate courts conclusive as between the parties,—the judgment of the probate court did not affect plaintiff's title, as it related back to the date of the mortgage, and was adverse to that of the estate.

2. SAME—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGOR—PURCHASE OF OUTSTANDING TAX TITLE.

Defendant, having mortgaged and then sold land, again became the owner; and after decree, but before sale under the mortgage, the land was sold for taxes, defendant acquiring the purchaser's interest. Plaintiff afterwards purchased at the mortgage sale. Held, that all defendant's rights acquired under such tax sale are for plaintiff's benefit.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

Action by Sarah H. Barnard against C. N. Wilson to quiet the title to certain real estate in the city of Los Angeles. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Brousseau & Hatch and Will D. Gould, for appellant. Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to quiet the plaintiff's title to four lots of land in the city of Los Angeles. The case was submitted in the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and has appealed from the judgment and order denying her motion.

The material facts of the case are as follows: On the nineteenth day of March, 1875, the defendant, being then the owner of the lots in controversy, mortgaged them to W. C. Barnard, to secure the payment of $1,375. The mortgage used the words, "has granted, bargained, sold, conveyed, and confirmed, and does hereby grant, bargain, sell, convey, and confirm unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns," etc. On the first day of July, 1876, the defendant, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the lots to Miss M. M. Wheeler; and thereafter, in the month of December following, they intermarried. On the fourteenth day of June, 1879, Mrs. Wilson, formerly Miss Wheeler, died intestate, leaving her husband, the defendant, and one sister her only heirs; and on the twenty-seventh day of the same month the sister, by deed of quitclaim, conveyed all her right, title, and interest in and to the lots to the defendant. On the sixteenth day of October, 1879, an action was commenced against the defendant to foreclose the said mortgage, and such proceedings were thereafter had that on the first day of March, 1880, a decree was signed, foreclosing the mortgage, and ordering a sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy the amount found due, viz., $1,230; and on the sixteenth day of October, 1882, under and in pursuance of the decree and order of sale, the sheriff sold the property at public auction to the plaintiff, and on the same day issued to her his certificate of sale, and thereafter, on the twenty-seventh day of April, 1883, there having been no redemption, executed and delivered to her his deed conveying to her the property so sold. On the ninth day of July, 1883, letters of administration on the estate of his deceased wife were duly granted to the defendant, and he continued to act as administrator of the estate until the ninth day of February, 1884, when a decree was entered, distributing the whole of the property of the estate, including the lots in controversy, to him. In the year 1880 the lots were assessed and taxes were levied against them for city purposes. The taxes became delinquent on the first day of November, 1880, and, not being paid, the city tax collector, after due notice, sold the lots on the seventeenth day of February, 1881, to pay the taxes, percentages, and costs. O. Barnard was the purchaser at the tax sale, and received from the collector a certificate of sale for each lot. The time to redeem from the sales expired on the eighteenth day of February, 1882, but no redemption was had; and on the third day of March, 1882, Barnard assigned his certificates to the defendant, who held them until the thirteenth day of July, 1886, and then obtained from the tax collector a deed in proper form and properly executed for each of the lots.

Upon these facts the question for decision is, was the title to the lots in the plaintiff or in the defendant? It is argued for respondent that the decree of the probate court, distributing the lots to him, was in the nature of a judgment in rem, which conclusively determined, as against the appellant, that he was the owner of them; that if the appellant claimed to be the owner of the lots she should have appeared before the court and have asked to have them distributed to her, and that, as she failed to do so, she is now estopped from asserting title to them. In support of their argument counsel cite sections 1665, 1666, 1678, 1908, Code Civil Proc.; Estate of De Castro v. Barry, 18 Cal. 97; Freeman v. Rahm, 58 Cal. 111.

Section 1665 provides that upon the final settlement of the accounts of an executor or administrator, the court must proceed to distribute the residue of the estate "among the persons who by law are entitled thereto." Section 1666 requires the court, in the order or decree, to name the persons and the proportions or parts to which each shall be entitled, and declares that "such order or decree is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal." Section 1678 provides that upon distribution of the real estate, if any of the original heirs, legatees, or devisees have conveyed their shares to other persons, "such shares must be assigned to the person holding the same in the same manner as they otherwise would have been to such heirs, legatees, or devisees." And section 1908 makes the judgments of courts sitting in probate, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, as conclusive between the parties litigating for the same thing under the same title and in the same capacity as other judgments. Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 361, 11 Pac. Rep. 724.

In Estate of De Castro v. Barry the only points decided were that the probate court had jurisdiction to make partition of the real estate of the deceased among the alienees of the heirs or devisees, and that where a wife died leaving separate property and a husband and two infant children, and one of the children died, the surviving child, and not the father, inherited the deceased child's share.

In Freeman v. Rahm, J. R. Campbell, one of the heirs, made a verbal sale of his interest in the real property of an estate to the plaintiff, and gave to the plaintiff a power of attorney to receive his distributive share of the estate. The share was in fact distributed to Campbell, and no mention of the plaintiff, or of the purchase by him, or of the power of attorney, was made in the decree. After the distribution a creditor commenced an action against Campbell, caused his interest in the property to be attached, and in due time obtained judgment. After the attachment, Campbell conveyed all his interest in the property to the plaintiff. Under an execution issued on the judgment, the sheriff was proceeding to sell the property, and the action was brought by plaintiff to restrain the sale. It was held that if the plaintiff had any rights he was estopped by the decree of distribution from asserting them, but that in fact the power of attorney gave him no right to take distribution to himself, as it did not purport to be, and was not, a transfer of the title.

We are unable to see that either of the sections or cases cited is in point here. The appellant was not an heir, devisee, or legatee of Mrs. Wilson, nor did she claim the property under or through Mrs. Wilson's estate. On the contrary, she asserted and asserts title only under and through the defendant. The mortgage was in fee, and when it was executed and foreclosed the whole title was in the defendant. The fact that between those times the title, subject to the mortgage lien, passed from him and then back to him, is immaterial. "A mortgagor is under obligation, from the nature of the mortgage contract, to preserve the property pledged for the purposes of the original security; and, on grounds of public policy, to insure good faith and fair dealing, he is estopped, independent of covenants of warranty, from denying the existence of the lien which he has attempted to create, or defeating its enforcement against the property on which it was placed; and those claiming under the mortgagor are equally estopped." Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 613; Lent v. Morrill, 25 Cal. 492; Land Ass'n v. Viera, 48 Cal. 572; Orr v. Stewart, 67 Cal. 275, 7 Pac. Rep. 693. The appellant's title related back to the date of the mortgage, and was adverse to that of the estate. The probate court had, therefore, no jurisdiction to pass upon it; and appellant suffered no prejudice by failing to appear and ask for distribution to herself. "The probate court has jurisdiction to settle the estate of a deceased person, and has no power, save in certain excepted instances, to determine disputes between the heirs or representatives of the deceased and third persons." Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. Rep. 724.

It is also argued for respondent that, if he did not already have title to the lots, he acquired a good title to them under the tax deeds which he received in 1886. The argument is based upon the fact that the decree of foreclosure was entered before the assessment on which the taxes were levied was made, and before the time for making the assessment had arrived. And it is contended that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee was terminated by the decree, and that thereafter there was nothing to prevent the respondent from purchasing the property, and acquiring a title which could not be affected by the foreclosure proceedings. There are two sufficient answers to this theory:

1. While it is true that the decree of foreclosure was entered on the first day of March, 1880, and the assessment was made for the fiscal year commencing on the first day of April, 1880, still the sale under the decree was not made until the sixteenth day of October, 1882. Now, the respondent was the owner of the lots when the decree was entered, and continued to be the owner of them until the time of the sale. Being the owner when the assessment was made, and when the taxes were levied and became payable, it was the duty of respondent to pay the taxes; and by neglecting to perform that duty he could gain no advantage to himself. 1 Jones, Mortg. § 680. The rule upon this subject was very clearly and concisely stated in Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 38, SANDERSON, C. J., delivering the opinion, as follows: "If the defendant was under any legal or moral obligation to pay the taxes, he could not, by neglecting to pay the same and allowing the land to be sold in consequence of such neglect, add to or strengthen his title by purchasing at the sale himself, or by subsequently buying from a stranger who purchased at the sale; otherwise he would be allowed to gain an advantage from his own fraud or negligence in failing to pay the taxes. This the law does not permit, either directly or indirectly."

2. In Land Ass'n v. Viera, supra, it was held that when a mortgage conveys the estate in fee, a decree enforcing the same is in effect a decree that the estate, vested in the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage, as well as that which shall at any time come to him, be sold; and that the sheriff's deed to the purchaser operates to transfer to such purchaser the estate so directed to be sold. The court said: "The rule that a sheriff's deed delivered upon execution sale imports no warranty of title, but transfers to the purchaser only such estate as was held at the time by the defendant in execution, has no practical application to a sheriff's deed delivered upon foreclosure of a mortgage in fee; for, as we have seen already, the defendant in the latter case must continue to be estopped, by the terms of the mortgage deed itself, to deny that the estate was other or less than an estate in fee in the premises. These terms, importing a conveyance of the fee, are equivalent to a covenant of general warranty of title running with the land." Under this rule, whatever right or title to the lots was acquired by respondent, under the certificates of sale which were assigned to him in March, 1882, or under the deeds which he received in July, 1886, immediately passed to and vested in the appellant.

We conclude, therefore, that upon the facts appearing in the record the appellant was entitled to judgment in the court below, and that the judgment rendered against her, and the order denying her motion for new trial, should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views above expressed.

BLACK v. BLACK. (No. 12,004.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 23, 1888.)

1. REPEVIN—DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover a lot of hogs or their value, where the only evidence of value was the undisputed testimony of one witness that "the value of the hogs is four or five dollars a head," held, that a judgment fixing the value of each hog at four dollars was not error.

2. SAME—APPRAISAL BY SHERIFF—DELIVERY.

Where the value of specific articles of property has been fixed in a judgment for their possession, it is not the duty of the sheriff to assess their value, when in his possession under the writ; and a delivery by him and acceptance by the judgment creditor, of all that could be found at the time of such delivery, will not work a satisfaction of the whole judgment.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE—WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

In an action by the wife to recover from her husband a lot of hogs alleged to be her separate property, the husband testified "that he had no means of his own when he married plaintiff out of which he ever realized anything; that all the hogs claimed were purchased with the proceeds of his wife's property; that he had made no money outside of profits arising from his cultivation of her lands;" and there being no evidence that the hogs in question were those referred to in a contract between the parties, specifying the property of each, judgment for plaintiff held not contrary to the evidence.

4. TRIAL—GENERAL ISSUE—SPECIAL FINDINGS.

An action was brought by the wife against her husband to recover a lot of hogs. The husband offered as an affirmative defense, which was admitted in evidence, a contract in which it was agreed between the parties what should be the individual property of each, and which contained this clause: "All other property, not the separate property of the wife's, to be owned and held exclusively by the husband." Held, that this contract was one of the matters to be considered under the general issue of ownership, and a failure to make special findings thereon was not error.

TEMPLE, J., dissents.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JAMES A. GIBSON, Judge.

The parties to this action are husband and wife, living separate from each other; and the plaintiff, Julia A. Black, brought this action to recover the possession from defendant, Samuel N. Black, of 400 head of hogs, the alleged separate property of plaintiff,—the said hogs being the proceeds and increase of property alleged to have been owned by her at and before her marriage with defendant; and, in case possession could not be had, then for the recovery of the value of the said hogs, to-wit, $2,000. Judgment went for plaintiff for the recovery of 400 hogs, or their value, $1,600, and costs. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, and an order denying his motion for entry of satisfaction of the judgment to the extent of the value of the hogs, defendant appeals.

Hargrave & Gray, for appellant. Paris & Goodcell and Harris & Allen, for appellee.

PATERSON, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and the order denying motion for a new trial, and from an order denying motion to satisfy the judgments. Plaintiff, who is the wife of defendant, but living separate and apart from him, commenced this action May 12, 1886, to recover the possession of 400 hogs alleged to be her separate property, or, if delivery of possession could not be had, for $2,000, the value thereof. The court found the facts alleged in the complaint to be true, i. e., that plaintiff was the owner of the 400 head of hogs; that they were on the Jeff Thomas ranch, occupied by defendant; that the brands or marks were as alleged; that defendant had no right, title, or interest in the property; that it was the separate property of plaintiff; that defendant unlawfully withholds possession of the same; that plaintiff made demand, and defendant refused to deliver possession; and, finally, that "the hogs are of the value of $4 each, the whole number being of the value of $1,600." The judgment which followed the conclusions of law found by the court adjudged that "plaintiff have and recover of defendant the possession of 400 hogs now on the Thomas ranch, in possession of defendant," (describing the brands,) "or, in case delivery cannot be had, that plaintiff have and recover of defendant the value of said hogs, to-wit, the sum of $4 per head, or $1,600 for the whole number; and that plaintiff have costs of the action." The sheriff, under execution, took 96 hogs from defendant, and delivered them to plaintiff, who accepted them. The sheriff then levied the writ on personal property of appellant, and, after a sale thereunder, the writ was returned partially satisfied. He reported that he had delivered to plaintiff "ninety-six hogs, valued at $4 per head, $384; amount realized on execution sale, $426.64. Total, $310.64." Upon a showing of these facts in affidavits, defendant asked the court for an order that the judgment for $1,600 be wholly satisfied, except as to the costs. The motion was denied. It is urged by appellant that inasmuch as the allegation of the complaint, and the prayer thereof, were for 400 hogs or $2,000, the sheriff was bound to deliver all the hogs, or none at all; that, if the sheriff could not return to plaintiff all of the hogs, (400 head,) it was his duty to so state in his return to the writ, and proceed to levy and sell as therein directed; and that the delivery and acceptance of 96 hogs was a satisfaction of the judgment. It is claimed, also, that the finding that each hog is worth $4 is without the issues, and cannot be treated as a finding.

1. With or without an allegation as to the value of each particular hog, it was proper, we think, for the court, under the evidence, to find as it did. The only evidence of value offered was the testimony of the witness Howard, who testified, without objection, that "the value of the hogs was four or five dollars a head." The finding of the court is a fair inference from this evidence, i. e., that the hogs were respectively of the same value. The only specification in the bill of exceptions on this point is that the evidence is insufficient to prove the value of the hogs to be four dollars per head.

2. There is nothing to show that the sheriff in any manner neglected to perform his duty under the judgment and execution. He did not assess the value of the 96 hogs. The value of each hog was fixed in the judgment. The presumption is that he took and delivered all the hogs described in the judgment that he could find. If the hogs which the sheriff refused to take from the Thomas ranch were some of those specified in the judgment, the fact was not shown to the court. Under defendant's theory of the case, if the sheriff delivers a part of the things recovered, and the judgment creditor accepts the same, the judgment debtor can enforce a satisfaction of the judgment before the sheriff can do anything further under the execution.

3. There was no error in the refusal of the court to find upon the matters alleged in the so-called "separate defense." Those matters are all included in the general issue as to ownership. The writings referred to were read in evidence, and were properly considered under the denials as to ownership and separate property. The court found that the hogs mentioned were the separate property of plaintiff, and the testimony of defendant himself is sufficient to support the finding. There is nothing to show that the hogs in controversy were those referred to in the contract or inventory. The contract made subsequent to the recordation of the inventory gives to the defendant "all other property, not the separate property of Julia A. Black."

4. A demand was alleged, and not denied.

Judgment and orders affirmed.

HALL v. COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES. (No. 11,833.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 20, 1888.)

1. COUNTIES—LIABILITIES—CONTRACTS—CONDITIONS.

County Government Act, § 25, subd. 9, giving the board of supervisors power to erect a county jail, provides that it shall not be erected until plans shall have been made therefor and adopted by the board. Held, in an action by an architect against a county for the value of services rendered in making plans for a jail building, which had been adopted by the board on condition that they should receive a bid from some reliable person, and after receiving bids they refused to open or act upon them, and rejected plaintiff's plans, alleging that he procured their adoption by the board by fraud, that the plans had been adopted within the meaning of the act, and that plaintiff could recover.

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

Where the board of supervisors of a county accepted the plans of an architect for a building on condition that a bid by a reliable party was "received" on the basis of such plan, held, that the word "received," as used, was not intended to include an acceptance of a bid. Hall v. County of Los Angeles, 13 Pac. Rep. 854, reversed.

PATERSON, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 13 Pac. Rep. 854. The plaintiff, John Hall, brought this action against the defendant, Los Angeles county, to recover the value of certain services alleged to have been rendered by him in making plans for a jail for defendant. The complaint alleges that the board invited proposals from architects for plans and specifications for the building of a jail, in response to which plaintiff sent in his plans, upon which a resolution was passed adopting them on condition that, after duly advertising therefor, a bid by a reliable party should be received. It was also alleged that, after advertisement, a reliable bid was received, made by a party ready, able, and willing to enter into sufficient bond. That thereafter the board, in pursuance of a resolution, returned all bids, refusing to open or act upon them, and rejected plaintiff's plans. Defendant demurred, and the court sustained the demurrer, and on appeal to the supreme court the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer was affirmed. Plaintiff then filed his petition for a rehearing.

Williams & McKinley, for appellant. Geo. M. Holton, Dist. Atty., and Becknell & White, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Further consideration has convinced us that our former opinion in this case was erroneous. The action is to recover the sum of $2,500 upon a contract alleged to have been made between the plaintiff and the county of Los Angeles, acting through its board of supervisors. The complaint alleges that the board invited proposals from architects for plans and specifications for the building of a jail. In response to this invitation the plaintiff sent in his plans and specifications, and the board thereupon passed the following resolution, viz.: "Resolved, that we adopt the plans of John Hall for a county jail upon the condition that, after duly advertising for bids for the construction thereof, according to said plans and specifications, we receive a bid from a reliable party, who will enter in a good and sufficient bond to construct the same in conformity to said plans and specifications for a sum not exceeding $50,000; otherwise it shall be in the discretion of the board to reject said plans, reserving to the board the privilege of making any alteration or change in said plans previous to advertising for bids as aforesaid, which shall be agreed to by said Hall, and which had been discussed by him and the board in considering the same." It is then alleged that after advertisement, etc., the board received from a reliable party a bid for the construction of the jail in accordance with said plans and specifications, for a sum not exceeding $50,000, which party was ready, able, and willing to enter into a sufficient bond, etc. The complaint then alleges that at a meeting thereafter held the board passed the following resolution: "Whereas, it appears from facts in evidence before this board that John Hall, whose plans for a county jail for the county of Los Angeles have been conditionally adopted, has been a party to the circulation of a baseless report, to the effect that money had been used, or was to be used, with the officers of this county and members of this board in connection with said jail plans; and, whereas, the action of this board in adopting said plans was largely due to the advice of one Holcomb, who represented to said board, and induced said board to believe, that he was there as an unbiased expert, giving impartial advice to the board, whereas he was, as the board verily believes, the secret agent and advocate of said Hall; and, whereas, said Hall has succeeded in procuring the adoption of his said plans and specifications by imposition practiced upon this board as above stated: Therefore, be it resolved, that the order heretofore, on the eighth day of January, 1886, made by this board adopting said plans and specifications, which said order is recorded in book 9, page 74, Minutes of the Board of Supervisors, be and the same is hereby, rescinded, vacated, and set aside, and said plans and specifications rejected." The complaint then alleges that Hall never was a party to the circulation of the report mentioned in the resolution last quoted, and that he had nothing to do with Holcomb; and denies that the adoption of his plans was procured by any kind of fraud or imposition. The court below gave final judgment for defendant upon demurrer to the complaint and the plaintiff appeals.

If plaintiff procured the adoption of his plans through the advocacy of Holcomb, who pretended to be, and was believed by the board to be, an unbiased expert, but was in fact the agent of plaintiff, there was such fraud as justified the board in rescinding the contract. But he says he did not, and upon demurrer it must be assumed that his statement is true. If it is not true, it is for the board to set up the facts constituting the fraud in their answer, and prove them at the trial. If this is done the defendant will be entitled to judgment. But the other ground alleged in the resolution was not sufficient to authorize the rescission of the contract. If Hall slandered the members of the board their remedy was to sue him for damages for the slander. They cannot rescind the county's contract to avenge their personal injuries. It is contended in support of the judgment, however, in the first place, that the board had no power to make a conditional contract with the plaintiff. The argument is that subdivision 9 of section 25 of the county government act provides that the board has power to cause to be erected a county jail, "provided that none of the aforesaid buildings shall be erected or constructed until plans and specifications shall have been made therefor and adopted by the board," and that a conditional adoption does not satisfy this requirement. But we think the plans were "adopted" within the meaning of this provision. The condition was a condition subsequent, going to defeat the adoption which was effected by the resolution, and was, in our opinion, a prudent and proper provision for the board to make.

the board; and that it did not accept any. But the resolution does not say "accepted." It says "received." And we do not think the expressions are equivalent. Probably most men have received many invitations and proposals which they have not accepted. In popular usage the words certainly differ in meaning. And we are not aware of any technical meaning which they have. The context supports this view. For it is provided that the party bidding must be "reliable," and that he must be willing to give bonds. What was the use of putting in these provisions upon defendant's theory? The whole would be included in the word "accepted." The object probably was to be reasonably sure that the plans did not require too great an outlay, and this was accomplished when the board found a reliable party who was willing to do the work and give bonds for its satisfactory performance. The other points made do not require special notice.

We, therefore, advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the amended complaint.

I concur: BELCHER, C. C.

FOOTE, C., (concurring.) I agree with what is said by my associates in the foregoing opinion, except that I am by no means clear, where the word "received" was used in the resolution of the board of supervisors, that it was not intended to include an "acceptance" of a bid.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, with direction to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the amended complaint.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. The board is the proper and the only tribunal to determine whether one proposing to do certain work for the county is a reliable party or not. The judgment of the superior court on that question cannot be substituted for that of the board; but if the complaint states a cause of action this can be done. The fact that the bidder can and will enter into a good and sufficient bond, of course, does not determine his reliability. By "a reliable party" the board evidently meant a party in whom they—the members of the board—had confidence; one so skilled, careful, and honest that there would be no necessity for a suit on his bond. The reasons given by the board for their second order may be very poor, and so unjust and libelous that plaintiff may maintain an action against the members thereof; but this fact does not supply the element necessary to create a contract between him and the county of Los Angeles, viz., a bid from a party known to the board to be reliable.

In re ROWLAND'S ESTATE. (No. 12,301.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 24, 1888.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—DEMANDS AGAINST THE ESTATE—CLAIM OF HUSBAND TO COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Civil Code Cal. § 1401, provides that, "upon the death of the wife, the entire community property, without administration, belongs to the surviving husband." The surviving husband and legatee of testatrix petitioned the court to have certain money and property in the hands of the executor declared community property of petitioner and deceased, segregated from the separate property of the testatrix, and delivered to him, instead of being distributed to the legatees under the will. Held, that his demand only amounted to a claim against the estate, and should have been presented to the executor.

2. SAME—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—EFFECT ON HUSBAND'S CLAIM TO COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1636, (which provides that "on final distribution, in the order or decree, the court must name the persons, and the proportions or parts to which each shall be entitled, and such persons may demand, sue, and recover their respective shares from the executor or administrator, or any person having the same in possession. Such order or decree is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be revised, set aside, or modified on appeal,") the claim of a surviving husband and legatee of a testatrix for community property is not concluded by a decree of distribution, his claim being adverse to the estate.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

M. G. Cobb, (John Reynolds, of counsel,) for appellant. A. N. Drown, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an appeal from a final decree of the superior court distributing the estate of Jane Rowland, deceased, and denying the petition of appellant, the surviving husband of deceased, to have certain money and property in the hands of the executors declared community property of petitioner and deceased, segregated from the separate property of the testatrix, and delivered to him, instead of being distributed to the legatees under the will. It appears from the petition of the appellant, to which a demurrer was interposed and sustained, that in 1867 the petitioner and testatrix, who were husband and wife, by an agreement between themselves, divided their community property; that $12,000 of such property was in the hands of the testatrix, and was not divided, owing to the fact that petitioner supposed it was required to pay off certain claims against the common property. The property thus divided, and thereafter held by the parties in severalty as their separate property, was sold in 1879 for $185,000, and thereupon an accounting was had between the parties, in which petitioner claims the testatrix was improperly allowed $5,000 on account of alleged expenses incurred by her as the agent of petitioner in and about his property. He now claims these amounts, with interest, amounting in the aggregate to $30,000, as community property, to which he was entitled upon the death of his wife. Deceased left a will, which was duly admitted to probate, whereby her property was disposed of, and in which petitioner was a legatee to the extent of one dollar.

It is made the duty of the probate court, or the superior court acting as such, to distribute the estate of deceased persons, when ready therefor, to the heirs, legatees, and devisees, as the case may require, and as provided by law; so, too, debts and demands against the estate may be ascertained, determined, and paid as provided by statute. The law does not contemplate or provide for the distribution of property or money in the hands of the executor or administrator to persons who may claim adversely to the estate, but leaves all such questions to be determined by action on behalf of or against the executor. The estate as distributed must go to the heirs or legatees or devisees, or to some of them, or those holding under them; and the decree, when made, is conclusive as to their rights, subject only to be set aside, modified, or reversed on appeal. Code Civil Proc. § 1666.

Appellant does not claim under or through the estate, but adversely, and in opposition thereto. "Upon the death of the wife, the entire community property, without administration, belongs to the surviving husband," etc. Civil Code, § 1401; Moore v. Jones, 63 Cal. 12. Under the eleventh section of the act of 1850, upon the death of the wife, one-half of the community property vested in her descendants. Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 292. The amendment of 1874, contained in section 1401, quoted above, has changed the rule in this respect; and, as to the community property, the husband does not, upon the death of the wife, take by succession. The estate in expectancy of the wife in the community property is dependent upon her survivorship, and, in the event of her death before her husband, it is deemed never to have existed. If we are correct in this, the husband does not, upon the death of his wife, as to the community property, take by descent or succession, but holds the community property as though acquired by himself, and as if his deceased wife had never existed.

The contention of counsel for appellant that the claim of the latter will be concluded by the decree of distribution, is not tenable. Under section 1666, Code Civil Proc., the decree is only made conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, and devisees. As appellant does not, as to the claim, come within the category of these, he will not be bound thereby. He appears in a twofold capacity: First, as a legatee under the will, and as to his rights as such, he will be bound by the decree; and, second, as a claimant in his own right, antagonistic to the estate. In this latter capacity he will be no more concluded than a third party would be who might chance to claim real estate adversely to decedent and his representatives. Freem. Judgm. § 66, and cases cited; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 359, 11 Pac. Rep. 724. If, as may well be, his demand only amounts to a claim against the estate, which should have been presented to the executors, it cannot alter the case as presented here.

The decree and order of the court below appealed from are affirmed.

MORGAN v. HECKER. (No. 12,216.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—GIFT FROM HUSBAND TO WIFE.

A gift from a husband to his wife, which was not unreasonable, made when the husband had property left with which to pay his debts easily, when no fraudulent intent appears, is not void as to existing creditors.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; LEON D. FREER, Judge.

Belle M. Morgan, plaintiff, sued Fred Hecker, defendant, to recover certain property belonging to her, or the value of it, levied on and sold under judgment against her husband. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Hundley & Gale, for appellant. A. F. Jones and Reardan & Freer, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. Hecker, the respondent here, was a creditor of W. J. Morgan, the husband of the plaintiff, in the sum of $200. While he (the husband) was so indebted, Belle M. Morgan, the plaintiff, received from him as a gift, and without any valuable consideration, a certain mare of the value of $200, a buggy of the value of $75, and a set of harness of the value of $15; all of which property was taken possession of by her, and used as her own, until levied upon by an execution issuing out of a justice's court by virtue of a judgment recovered against W. J. Morgan by the respondent, Hecker. The property was sold under the execution, and bought in by Hecker. This suit was instituted by Belle M. Morgan to recover the property or its value. The court below gave judgment in favor of Hecker, and from that the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment-roll only. From the findings it appears, in addition to the facts heretofore stated, "that the said Morgan, the husband of the said plaintiff, was, at the time of the gift of the said personal property to his said wife, the plaintiff herein, in solvent financial circumstances, being the owner of real and personal property of the value largely in excess of the value of the property given to his said wife, and more than sufficient to meet all of his then existing liabilities, and enjoying and receiving a salary of $166.66 per month." There is no finding that in making the gift there was any intent on the part of W. J. Morgan to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors; nor is it found that he owed any other debt than the one to Hecker.

From the conclusions of law, it is evident that the court below held the gift of the personal property involved in the action to have been void as to Hecker, an existing creditor, solely because the husband owed that debt at the time he made the gift. Formerly, it was a much vexed and doubtful question, so divided were different judges in their opinions upon the subject, whether or not a gift made of any of his property, by one indebted, was absolutely void as to existing creditors; Judge KENT, in Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 481, having gone to the full extent of holding any such gift fraudulent and void; while the supreme court of Connecticut, in Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. 553; the supreme court of New York, in Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. 438, 455, 456; the supreme court of the United States, in Hinds v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. 213, and in Kehr v. Smith, 20 Wall. 31, 35,—seem to repudiate so extreme a rule upon the subject, and hold that a voluntary gift without consideration only creates a prima facie presumption of an intent to defraud, and the presumption of fraudulent intent resulting from that fact may be rebutted by evidence. In California, the rule is declared to be that "the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, not of law." Swartz v. Hazlett, 8 Cal. 128; Read v. Rahm, 65 Cal. 344; Civil Code, § 3442.

So far, then, as this case is concerned, the gift to Mrs. Morgan was void or not according as the facts found show, or do not show, a fraudulent intent on the part of her husband, at the time he made her the gift, to hinder, delay, or defraud his existing creditor, Hecker, for the record does not show that he had any other creditor. The fact that the gift was made without consideration, and that Hecker was at the time a creditor, is a fact which might tend to show a fraudulent intent on the part of W. J. Morgan; but when it is rebutted by the facts set out in the finding that Morgan was solvent, that is, able to pay his debts from his own means as they became due, (Civil Code, § 3450;) that he possessed more than sufficient property, both real and personal, to meet all of his then existing liabilities; and that, besides, he was receiving a salary of $166 per month,—the presumption that might arise from the gift being made without consideration when he was indebted disappears.

It does not appear that the gift was an unreasonable provision for the wife, nor that in making it the husband did not still have enough property left easily, and without any delay or embarrassment, to have promptly paid his debts, or that his creditor could not without trouble have collected the debt by law. The court has not found any fraudulent intent on the part of the husband in making the gift, nor has it found any probative facts, from which the existence of such intent may be inferred as an ultimate fact.

We have been cited to many cases in our state reports, by respondent, as announcing a view in consonance with that held in Reade v. Livingston, supra; but a close examination of those cases discloses the fact that in none of them were the precise points directly decided which are here involved, and what is there said by this court touching those matters is not binding as to the present case.

Wherefore we are of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

In re ALLEN. (No. 12,237.)*

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

HOMESTEAD—EXTENT OF RIGHT—PROPERTY USED IN CONNECTION WITH DWELLING.

Where the family of an insolvent consisted of 11 persons, and his house on one lot contained three bedrooms, and on another lot was his well, cow-house, and other out-buildings, and also a building containing a wagon shop, rented out by the insolvent, and a blacksmith shop used by him, and in the unfinished upper part of the building some of his family slept, and which, when able, he intended to finish to use with his house, both lots were properly set off as a homestead.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; LEON D. FREER, Judge.

Albert Allen, an insolvent, made his application under the insolvent law for a homestead. The court ordered the property claimed set apart as a homestead, from which order the assignee appealed.

F. C. Lusk, for appellant. Park Henshaw, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Appeal from a judgment setting aside a homestead under the insolvent law. The homestead set apart consisted of lots 4 and 5, in block 39, of the town of Chico. These two lots adjoined each other. Upon lot 5 was the dwelling-house, and upon lot 4 were certain out-buildings and a blacksmith shop. The two lots and buildings were together under the value of $5,000. It is conceded that the order was proper as to lot 5, but it is argued that lot 4 was used exclusively for business purposes, and that, therefore, there could not be an actual residence upon it. It appears, however, that a part, at least, of lot 4 was used for family purposes. The court finds that "the well, cow-house, chicken-house, wood-shed, and other out-buildings necessary and convenient for the use of said premises, are situate upon lot 4." This we think is not contradictory of the other findings, when all are taken together. It appears from the evidence that the cow-shed was built in 1884-85. "Before it was built there was a wood-house there. The barn now is used for the same purpose that the old one was; wood-house, chicken-house, and cow-shed combined."

The homestead is not restricted to the ground actually covered by the dwelling-house. It includes the additional ground which is necessary or convenient for family use. In this regard SANDERSON, J., delivering the opinion in Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 227, said. "It represents the dwelling-house at which the family resides, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including out-buildings of every kind necessary or convenient for family use, and lands used for the purposes thereof. If situated in the country it may include a garden or farm. If situated in town it may include one or more lots or one or more blocks. In either case it is unlimited by extent merely." The rule laid down in this case has been frequently approved and followed. And in pursuance of it the court held, in Englebrecht v. Shade, 47 Cal. 627, that the use of an adjoining lot "for the purpose of drying clothes, and as a means of access to the street," was sufficient to support a declaration of homestead including it. So, in Skinner v. Hall, 69 Cal. 195, 10 Pac. Rep. 406, it was held that a portion of a lot used as a chicken-yard, was properly included in the homestead. The above-mentioned portion of lot 4 certainly comes within the rule of these cases. It must be presumed that the legislature intended that the family should have water to drink, and wood to cook with. And inasmuch as a cow and a certain number of chickens are exempt from execution it is reasonable to suppose that it was the intention that there should be a place to keep them. A portion of lot 4, therefore, was clearly properly treated as part of the homestead. As to the remainder of this lot there is more doubt. The facts concerning it are as follows: On one end of the lot is a two-story frame building 80x40 feet, which is equal to about half of the area of the lot. The lower part of this building is divided into two portions. The front portion was used by the insolvent as a blacksmith shop. The rear portion was occupied by one Canfield as a wagon shop. The insolvent and Canfield seem to have been in some way interested together in these undertakings, for the court finds that "the wagon and blacksmith business was carried on in conjunction by Allen and Canfield." The portion of lot 4 not covered by buildings was used for the purpose of storing wagons, setting tires, and other work connected with the blacksmith and wagon shop. The business does not appear to have been conducted on a large scale.

The family of the insolvent was a large one. According to the evidence it consisted of 11 persons, "counting my wife and myself and a small girl we have to stay with us." In the house on lot 5 there were only three bedrooms. The court finds that "the small dwelling-house situate upon lot 5 is not sufficient for the needs of the family of said Allen," and that "said Allen intended, when said shop was built, to occupy the upper part or story in connection with the small house on lot 5 as his dwelling, and has, so far as his means permitted, prepared, used, and occupied it as such, and * * * that it is necessary for the use of his family." The court further finds that the insolvent "has been unable to complete the upper story as intended, for want of means to do so," and that "said building has never been finished off on the inside, either by boarding, ceiling, lathing, plastering, or otherwise;" but that "said upper story of the shop has been, since its erection, used as a sleeping-room for members of Allen's family." One of the rooms in the upper floor was rented out as a paint shop. Another was occupied jointly by one Nigro (who was one of the painters) and one Hall, which latter worked for the insolvent, but received no regular salary, and "boarded at said debtor's dwelling-house, and was considered one of the petitioner's family." At one time another painter lived in the upper floor with his family. Some of the insolvent's sons were in the habit of sleeping in the upper floor wherever they could find a place for their mattresses. Upon the whole evidence we cannot say that it was insufficient to support the finding that "said upper story of the shop has been, since its erection, used as a sleeping-room for members of Allen's family."

Taking this as established, it does not seem to us that the appellate court can say that there was no actual residence upon this part of the property within the meaning of the homestead law. When property is used both as a residence and for business purposes, the question of homestead is always a difficult one. The mere fact that it is partially used for business purposes is not of itself sufficient to defeat the homestead. This is recognized in Gregg v. Bostwick, cited for the appellant, for the court there says: "If, however, it is used as a place of business by the family, which frequently happens, it may not therefore cease to be a homestead, if it would be necessary or convenient for family use, independent of the business." 33 Cal. 228. So the mere fact that a portion of the property is rented out is not of itself sufficient to defeat the homestead. Skinner v. Hall, supra; Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181. Each case must depend in great measure upon its own circumstances. But where the property is necessary and convenient for family use, and is put to such use, we think the homestead should be sustained, unless business is the primary and principal purpose of the property, and the family use merely incidental. Upon the whole, although the case is a close one, we are not convinced that the judgment of the court below was erroneous. Some of the rulings on the admissibility of evidence do not seem quite correct, but we do not think that injury could have resulted.

We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re RADOVICH'S ESTATE. (No. 11,346.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACCOUNTING—CITATION AFTER RESIGNATION.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1629, providing that when the authority of an executor ceases or is revoked he may be cited to account at the instance of the party succeeding him, an executor who has resigned may be compelled to account for certain assets of the estate received by him but not accounted for.

2. SAME—GIVING ASSETS TO HIS ATTORNEY.

An executor of an estate has no right to give away any assets of the estate, though he may consider them worthless, nor has his attorney the right to receive them.

3. SAME—LIABILITIES—VALUE OF ASSETS.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 1613, 1614, providing that an executor shall be charged with the whole of the estate at the appraised value, and with the interest and profits thereof, and any excess at which he sells it, an executor who sells stock for more than the appraised value is liable for the price received, and interest.

4. APPEAL—WHO MAY APPEAL.

A party cannot appeal from an order entered on his motion modifying in his favor a prior order.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from supreme court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of L. Radovich, deceased. This was an order obtained by the administrator of the deceased to compel a former executor, who had resigned, to account for certain assets of the estate received by him. The executor appealed from such order.

A. D. Splivalo, for appellant. A. Comte, Jr., for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. In 1870 S. Martinovich was duly appointed executor of the last will and testament of L. Radovich, deceased, and he continued to act as such executor until August, 1882. Among the assets of the estate which came into his possession as executor was a certificate for five shares of the capital stock of the San Francisco & Oakland Railroad Company. This stock was mentioned in the inventory, and was appraised at $250. Martinovich resigned his place as executor in 1882, and J. L. Radovich was appointed administrator of the estate with the will annexed. Martinovich never obtained any order for the sale or disposition of the stock, and never turned the certificate over to his successor. Subsequently, in March, 1885, Radovich, as administrator, obtained an order from the court requiring Martinovich to appear and render an account under oath of the five shares of stock which he had received and held as executor. To this order Martinovich answered, denying that as executor or otherwise he ever received the five shares of stock referred to, and alleging that at the time of L. Radovich's death the stock was, and ever since had continued to be, worthless, and of no value whatever. A hearing was had before the court, at which Martinovich appeared and testified that he was executor of the last will of L. Radovich, deceased; and that prior to November 28, 1873, as such executor, he had the control and possession of the said five shares of stock as a part of the assets of the estate, and "that he had indorsed the stock as such executor, and had delivered the same to A. D. Splivalo, his attorney and agent, to sell it for whatever he could; and that witness, as such executor, had filed accounts, but had never accounted for said stock, or the proceeds of sale thereof, and that he had been allowed by the court in his accounts, and had received from the estate, all his commissions, disbursements, and charges, and claims of all kinds, including attorney's fees in matter of said estate, and that nowhere and in no manner had he accounted for said shares of stock, but had omitted all mention thereof in his accounts, as he did not consider them of any value. That he had never applied to the court for authority to sell the stock, and that his indorsement of the same and the delivery of the same to said Splivalo was without order from court." Splivalo was called as a witness and testified "that he had been attorney for the estate of L. Radovich, deceased, * * * and that said Martinovich had indorsed the stock as executor, and told him to sell it for what he could get, and keep it for his services; that the stock was not indorsed by any other person than the said Martinovich; that the stock was considered of no value whatever, but that witness sold it for $450 some time prior to November 28, 1875; that $450 was not its value, although he got that sum for it; that the stock had no value; that he received the stock as part compensation for his services in said estate, and that if it were not credited in the accounts it was through forgetfulness." The court found, among other things, that the five shares of stock were indorsed and sold without any order of court, and were transferred to the purchaser thereof on the books of the corporation on the twenty-eighth day of November, 1873; that the stock was sold for $450, and that that sum was its market value at the time of sale; that neither the stock nor the proceeds of the sale thereof were ever accounted for by Martinovich prior to the filing of his account in May, 1885, and that there was no good or any sufficient cause for his delay in accounting for the same. Thereupon an order was made and entered, settling the account at $450, with legal interest thereon from November 28, 1873, in the aggregate $828.92, and requiring Martinovich forthwith to pay the last-named sum to the administrator of the estate. Subsequently, on motion of counsel for Martinovich, an order was made modifying the last-named order in certain unimportant particulars, and thereupon Martinovich appealed from both orders.

1. We fail to see that the court erred in making the first order complained of. As executor Martinovich had no right to sell or otherwise dispose of the stock without an order of court authorizing him to do so. When, therefore, without any such order, he caused the stock to be sold, he, in legal effect, converted it to his own use, and became responsible for its value, with legal interest thereon.

The claim that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order, because Martinovich resigned his trust as executor in 1882, and then settled his accounts and was discharged, is not tenable for two reasons: First, the Code provides that "when the authority of an executor or administrator ceases, or is revoked for any reason, he may be cited to account before the court at the instance of the person succeeding to the administration of the same estate," etc., (section 1629, Code Civil Proc.) and, second, it affirmatively appears that he never accounted for or was discharged from the liability in question.

So the claim that the stock was considered worthless and appellant therefore rightfully turned it over to Splivalo, attorney for the estate, is equally untenable. The executor has no right to give away the assets of the estate, even though he may consider them worthless; and the attorney has no right to receive such a gift from the executor's hands. Both parties knew, or should have known, such to be the law when the transfer was made.

So, too, the claim that appellant, if chargeable at all, should have been charged with only $250, the appraised value of the stock, is wholly without merit. The Code makes the executor chargeable with the whole of the estate at the appraised value, and with all the interest, profit, and income thereof, and it requires him to account for the excess when he sells any part of the estate for more than the appraisement. Sections 1613, 1614, Code Civil Proc. As the stock was actually sold for $450, the appellant was properly chargeable with that sum, with interest thereon.

2. The appeal from the second order cannot be considered, for the reasons—First, it was made at the instance of appellant; and, second, it was made to promote his interests, and could not possibly operate to his prejudice.

We conclude, therefore, that both of the orders appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the orders are affirmed.

ROCCA v. KLEIN. (No. 12,334.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—TO WHAT CASES APPLICABLE—MUTUAL ACCOUNTS.

Where plaintiff had sold goods to defendant for a number of years, and had credited him with payments of cash and merchandise, not considering that defendant had an account against him, it is not a "mutual, open, and current account," as provided for in Code Civil Proc. Cal. 344, but is governed by section 339, providing that actions on contracts not in writing shall be brought within two years.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

John Rocca, plaintiff, sued Frederick Klein, defendant, for a balance alleged to be due on an account. Judgment for plaintiff for a portion of his account, and plaintiff appeals.

F. W. Street, for appellant. F. D. & G. W. Nicol, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to recover the sum of $387.25 balance alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant on a mutual, open, and current account. By his answer, the defendant denied that the account between the parties was mutual, open, and current, and alleged that the plaintiff's action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court found against the plaintiff as to all of the account, except $43.59, which accrued within two years prior to the commencement of the action, and for which judgment was rendered in his favor. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion.

It is admitted for the appellant that the only question presented for decision is as to whether there were reciprocal demands between the parties, making the account a mutual, open, and current account, within the meaning of section 344 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section reads as follows: "In an action brought to recover a balance due upon a mutual, open, and current account, where there have been reciprocal demands between the parties, the cause of action is deemed to have accrued from the time of the last item proved in the account on either side."

In Norton v. Larco, 30 Cal. 126, it was held that mutual accounts are made up of matters of set-off where there is an existing debt on the one side which constitutes a credit on the other, or where there is an express or implied understanding that mutual debts shall be satisfied or set off pro tanto between the parties. And it was further held that a payment, whether it be of money or of an article of personal property of a stipulated value, made on an account and intended as a payment, and not as a set-off pro tanto, does not make an account mutual. See, also, Ang. Lim. § 149; Warren v. Sweeney, 4 Nev. 101; and Adams v. Patterson, 35 Cal. 122.

The plaintiff was the only witness called upon either side. He presented his account, and testified that, within two years prior to the commencement of the action, he had sold defendant goods and merchandise amounting to $43.59. The account showed a balance due plaintiff on the first of May, 1880, of $413.25, and then a large number of charges for goods sold, running down to February 13, 1886. It also showed numerous credits for money paid, and for wheat, wood, hay, and work. In reference to the credits of money, plaintiff testified that the money was paid at the dates named in the account, and was deducted from the amounts then due thereon. And in reference to the other credits, he testified as follows: "On May 1, 1880, I received wheat from the defendant, and gave him credit on the account for $82.22, the value of said wheat. I have accepted this wheat on account at a stated value. I did not consider that the defendant had any demand against me on account of that wheat. I took it as part payment of my account against him. On the same date I received from him wood, for which I gave him credit for $16.75. He cut the wood, and I hauled it myself. We agreed what the value of the wood was, and I gave him credit on the account for the amount agreed upon. I then deducted these credits from the account, and that left a balance due me of $314.28 at that time. I did not consider he had any demand against me on account of this wood and wheat. The next items of credit on the account were for hauling grapes, $6; wood furnished on account, $107.25; and by hauling grapes, $10. We agreed upon the price in February, 1881. He told me to give him credit on his account for the total, which I did, deducting the credit from his account, and there was at that time a balance due of $313.87. These credits were the same as cash to me. I considered them as payments upon account. I did not consider he had any demand against me, or that he could sue me on account of the wood or for the hauling of the grapes. * * * On September 20, 1883, he was given credit on his account for $50, being for hay bought by me from him. I gave him the credit on the account for $50, the same as if it had been $50 in cash. I did not consider he had any demand against me on account of this hay after I had given him credit for it on his account. * * * On July 9, 1884, gave defendant credit for work, $5. Agreed with defendant as to the value of the work; gave him credit accordingly. Struck a balance showing $355.58 due me on account. On July 3, 1885, gave defendant credit for work performed by him for me, $3, and on August 7, 1885, gave defendant credit by wood furnished by him to me, $28. Deducted credits from account and there was at that time a balance due me of $356.17. We understood that these credits were payments on account, and that he had no demand against me for the same."

From this testimony it is very apparent that, within the rule laid down in Norton v. Larco, supra, the articles credited were received by the plaintiff as, and were intended to be, payments on his account. There were, therefore, no reciprocal demands between the parties, making the account mutual, open, and current.

It follows in our opinion that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

FARNUM v. HEFNER. (No. 12,351.) *

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—LEASE—EXECUTION—SALE OF LEASEHOLD—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

A lessor sued defendant for a conversion of crops grown on a leasehold purchased by defendant under execution against the lessee. The lease provided that crops grown on the premises should be the lessor's property until the lessee performed certain conditions. Held that, as the conditions had not been performed, the purchaser acquired no right to the crop, and the judgment of sale and execution were properly excluded from evidence, as immaterial and irrelevant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; L. D. FREER, Judge.

Action by C. E. Farnum against Philip Hefner, to recover the value of certain wheat and hay. There was a trial by the court, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals.

H. V. Reardan, for appellant. Carter P. Pomeroy, for respondent.

*Reversed in banc. See 21 Pac. 955, 79 Cal. 575.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to recover the value of certain wheat and hay claimed to be the property of Farnum, and alleged to have been converted to his own use by Hefner. The plaintiff recovered judgment for the value of the wheat. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and from the order made in the premises an appeal has been taken. The facts of the case are that on October 15, 1884, the plaintiff was the owner of certain farming land in Butte county, and at that date made a written lease of the same to one D. L. Butler for a term of two years. On February 24, 1885, Hefner, the defendant herein, recovered a judgment against Butler in the superior court of Butte county for a considerable sum of money, and had execution duly issued and levied upon the leasehold interest held by Butler, which was afterwards sold under that writ, and purchased by the defendant. Thereupon he entered into possession of the land which Butler had leased, and proceeded to harvest the crop of growing wheat thereon. After the grain was sacked, and the defendant in possession of the whole of it, he offered the plaintiff one-third of it, which, after at first refusing, he afterwards received. The defendant kept the other two-thirds of the wheat, and converted it to his own use, and was sued for its value in this action.

It is claimed by the defendant that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the judgment roll, execution, and return thereon, under which the defendant claimed title to the leasehold interest of Butler, the judgment debtor. This point is not well taken, for the reason that the lease in express terms invested the legal ownership of the entire crop of wheat to be raised and grown upon the leased land in Farnum until the performance of certain stated conditions, and therefore, those conditions not having been complied with, when the defendant bought the leasehold interest of Butler he bought no right to convert the property which belonged to Farnum; and therefore the judgment roll, execution, etc., were immaterial and irrelevant to the issues joined. Until the delivery of the whole of the crop of wheat to Farnum, and a transfer to Butler of his portion by Farnum, the latter was, according to the terms of the lease, the absolute owner of the wheat; and until those conditions had been fulfilled neither Butler, the lessee, nor Hefner, the claimant of the leasehold interest under the judicial sale, could have any legal claim to its possession. Farnum owned the wheat, as the conditions of the lease remained unperformed, and was entitled to recover for its conversion without reference to what interest, if any, passed to Hefner in the demised premises under the sheriff's sale. Howell v. Foster, 65 Cal. 169, 3 Pac. Rep. 647, and cases cited.

It becomes unnecessary to determine the other point made by the defendant, viz., that the court committed error in admitting in evidence a written forfeiture of the lease made and executed by Butler, between the time of the levy of the execution and the sale thereunder; for conceding, without deciding, that the lease was in full force and effect, so far as Hefner's rights were concerned, at the time of the judicial sale, he acquired no right thereby to any of the wheat owned by Farnum, and therefore the admission in evidence of the forfeiture was immaterial, and could work no prejudice to the defendant.

The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; BELCHER, C. C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

RAPP et al. v. SPRING VALLEY GOLD Co. et al. (No. 12,370.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—ATTORNEY'S FEES—WAIVER BY STIPULATION. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1195, relating to the foreclosure of mechanics' liens, provides for the allowance by the court of reasonable attorney's fees as part of the costs. In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, judgment for plaintiffs was entered upon the following stipulation: "Plaintiffs shall reduce their claims to judgment in the following manner: Said G., in conjunction with * * *, shall immediately, or as soon as they can, ascertain and fix the amount due to each of the plaintiffs in said suit, and, upon such ascertainment, judgment shall accordingly be entered in said suit for the foreclosure of the mechanics' liens sued on." Held, that this stipulation did not exclude the allowance of attorney's fees.

2. SAME.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1195, relating to the foreclosure of mechanics' liens, provides that "the court must also allow, as part of the costs, the money paid for filing and recording the lien, and reasonable attorney's fees in the superior and supreme courts," etc. Held, that this should not be construed as a provision against an actual outlay only, that the lienholder may have been compelled to make; but that where there was an express agreement that for services prior to the recording of the lien the attorney should receive 5 per cent. upon the amount collected, and for subsequent services "only such fee as the court would allow," the plaintiff was entitled to an allowance for attorney's fees.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; LEON D. FREER, Judge.

This was an action brought by plaintiffs to foreclose laborers' liens upon the mining property of the defendant the Spring Valley Gold Company. The Bank of California, having an attachment upon said property, was made a defendant. Pending the trial of said action, a written agreement was entered into by plaintiffs and defendants for the entering of judgment for plaintiffs. Upon the filing of said written agreement, plaintiffs moved for a judgment, as prayed for in the complaint. The only controversy upon said motion was as to the allowance of attorney's fees for the foreclosure. The appeal here is from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, and from so much of the judgment as allows an attorney's fee.

Reardan & Freer and Newlands, Allen & Herrin, for appellants. Park Henshaw, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs was entered upon a stipulation. The sole question is whether the plaintiffs should have been allowed an attorney's fee.

1. The first position of the appellants is that the stipulation waived the attorney's fee. The material portion of the stipulation is as follows: "Plaintiffs shall reduce their claims to judgment in the following manner: Said Gregory, in conjunction with Mr. N. S. Walker, Jr., vice-president of the company, shall immediately, or as soon as they can, ascertain and fix the amount due to each of the plaintiffs in said suit, and, upon such ascertainment, judgment shall accordingly be entered in said suit for the foreclosure of the mechanics' liens sued on." The argument for the appellants upon this language is that the provision is that judgment should be entered for the amount due to the plaintiffs, and, by implication, for nothing else, and that the attorney's fee was not a part of the amount due to the plaintiffs. This argument proves too much. It would exclude a judgment for costs, as well as for attorney's fees. Costs are not a part of the amount due to the plaintiffs, but it is not disputed by appellants that the judgment for costs was proper. The attorney's fee in this kind of case is not, strictly speaking, part of the costs. If allowed by the court, it need not be placed in the memorandum of costs. But it was properly allowed, for the same reason that costs were allowed, viz., that it was a necessary incident of the judgment stipulated for, and was not expressly, or by necessary implication, excluded by the stipulation. That the attorney's fee in foreclosure is merely an incident of the judgment, and not an element of the cause of action, was held in Carriere v. Minturn, 5 Cal. 435. In that case HEYDENFELDT, J., delivering the opinion, said: "The counsel fees stipulated to be paid were not the cause of action, but, like the costs, a mere incident to it, and may be fixed by the chancellor at his discretion, not exceeding the amount stipulated." And this case was approved and followed in Monroe v. Fohl, 14 Pac. Rep. 515, 516. If the attorney's fee was an incident to the judgment stipulated for, it was properly allowed by the court, unless excluded by the stipulation, which, as above stated, we do not think was the case.

But it is further argued for the appellants, in this regard, that the negotiations between the parties leading up to the stipulation show that it was understood that no attorney's fees were to be allowed. But if we assume, in favor of the appellants, that prior negotiations were not superseded by the agreement finally arrived at and written out, and that such negotiations should control, we nevertheless do not think the result would be different. If the matter rested solely upon the letter of Mr. Robinson, the president of the gold company, and the reply of the attorney for the plaintiffs, there would be some strength in the position. It might then be contended that the agreement was to be interpreted "in the sense in which the promisor believed at the time of making it that the promisee understood it." Code Civil Proc. § 1649. But the matter does not rest solely upon the letters referred to. It appears that, before the hearing of the cause, the attorney for the plaintiffs had an interview with the attorney for the defendants and the vice-president of the gold company, at which the letter of Mr. Robinson was referred to, and he thereupon distinctly informed them that he did not understand that attorney's fees were cut off by the stipulation, and that he should press the matter before the court. This negatives the theory that the attorney for the plaintiffs allowed the defendants to proceed under the belief that attorney's fees would not be claimed. Upon receiving this information, the defendants, if not satisfied with the stipulation, should have asked to have it set aside. Upon a proper application, the trial court could have relieved them from a stipulation given through a misunderstanding. Bonds v. Hickman, 29 Cal. 464. No such application was made. After being informed of what the plaintiffs were going to do, the defendants chose to rely upon the stipulation, which, as we have seen, does not support their view.

The defendant the Bank of California was not represented at the interview referred to. But the argument as to the prior negotiations is based solely upon communication between the plaintiffs and the other defendant, of which the bank was not shown to be aware. And hence there is no question but that the stipulation prevails as to it.

2. The second position of the appellants is that, independent of the stipulation, the facts shown did not entitle plaintiffs to attorney's fees under section 1195, Code Civil Proc. This, the counsel say, "is a provision against an actual expense that may be incurred by the lienholder on account of the failure of the defendant to pay the lienholder's claim; and, if such expense has been incurred, then, and then only, the court may allow and fix such fees." We have no doubt at all that the attorney's fee need not be actually paid by the plaintiff; nor need there be any express agreement for the payment of a fee. If, indeed, it had appeared that the attorney had expressly agreed to give his services for nothing, or if he were an employe of the plaintiff at a yearly salary, as was the case in Bank v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to an allowance for attorney's fee. But where there is an implied agreement for the payment of the attorney, or where, as here, there is an express agreement that for services prior to the recording of the liens the attorney shall receive 5 per cent. upon the amount collected, and for subsequent services "only such fee as the court would allow," it seems clear that plaintiff is entitled to an allowance for attorney's fees. The court would not be bound by an agreement between plaintiff and his attorney as to amount, but must, under the Code, allow such amount as is reasonable. We cannot say that the amount in this case is not reasonable.

We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

75 Cal. 1

SHARON v. SHARON. (No. 9,984.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 31, 1888.)

1. MARRIAGE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—SECRET AGREEMENT.

Civil Code Cal. § 55, provides that consent alone will not constitute marriage, but must be followed by a solemnization, "or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." Held, that under this provision it is not necessary to the validity of the marriage that the relation of the parties be made public; but, evidence of consent being given, proof of cohabitation is sufficient to show a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties.¹

2. DIVORCE—ALIMONY—ORDER DIRECTING PAYMENT TO THIRD PERSON—FEES OF UNNECESSARY COUNSEL.

Civil Code Cal. § 137, provides that in an action for divorce the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to prosecute or defend the action. Held, that the money must be paid to the wife; and it is not within the discretion of the court to order it paid to any other persons, nor to allow the wife money for unnecessary counsel in the action.

3. SAME—AMOUNT OF ALLOWANCE.

Plaintiff and defendant had been secretly married, and the wife agreed to keep the marriage secret. The husband agreed to allow the wife a certain amount of money per month until the marriage was acknowledged. Held, in an action for divorce, upon application for temporary alimony, that it was an abuse of discretion to allow the wife more than the husband had agreed to allow her until the marriage was acknowledged.

THORNTON, SHARFSTEIN, and McFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action for divorce and alimony, brought by Sarah Althea Sharon against William Sharon. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Pending the appeal, defendant died, and Frederick W. Sharon, executor of William Sharon, was substituted as party defendant. For former opinions in this case, see 7 Pac. Rep. 456, 635, 639; 8 Pac. Rep. 614, 109; 9 Pac. Rep. 187.

McKINSTRY, J. The appeals herein were taken in the life-time of William Sharon, the original defendant. The first is from a judgment determining and declaring the validity of an alleged marriage of plaintiff and defendant; decreeing a divorce, and that plaintiff is entitled to one-half of the community property. The second appeal is from an order directing the payment of counsel fees and alimony. The court below found:

(2) "That on the twenty-fifth day of August, A. D. 1880, the plaintiff and defendant each signed a certain declaration of marriage, in the words and figures following, to-wit:

"In the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, on the twenty-fifth day of August, A. D. 1880, I, Sarah Althea Hill, of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, age twenty-seven years, do here, in the presence of Almighty God, take Senator William Sharon, of the state of Nevada, to be my lawful and wedded husband, and do here acknowledge and declare myself to be the wife of Senator William Sharon of the state of Nevada.

SARAH ALTHEA HILL.

"AUGUST 25, 1880, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

"I agree not to make known the contents of this paper, or its existence, for two years, unless Mr. Sharon himself see fit to make it known.

¹ An actual ceremony of marriage is not essential to the establishment of the relation of husband and wife. It is sufficient that the parties, no impediment existing, consent to take each other as husband and wife, and cohabit as such. Peet v. Peet, (Mich.) 18 N. W. Rep. 220. As to the requisites of such agreement, see Clancy v. Clancy, (Mich.) 33 N. W. Rep. 891. A written contract of marriage, although not provided for by statute, is a good contract of marriage, per verba de presenti. Mathewson v. Foundry Co., 20 Fed. Rep. 281. By the laws of Arizona, marriage may be established by contract, without ceremony. U. S. v. Tenney, 11 Pac. Rep. 472. So, also, in Kansas, State v. Walker, 13 Pac. Rep. 279. Such is also the law in many other states, in the absence of statutory regulations. Maryland v. Baldwin, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278. But common-law marriages are not recognized as valid in West Virginia. Beverlin v. Beverlin, 3 S. E. Rep. 36.

"In the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, on the twenty-fifth day of August, A. D. 1880, I, Senator William Sharon, of the state of Nevada, age sixty years, do here, in the presence of Almighty God, take Sarah Althea Hill, of the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., to be my lawful and wedded wife; do here acknowledge myself to be the husband of Sarah Althea Hill.

WILLIAM SHARON, Nevada.

"August 25, 1880."

—Which was the only written declaration, contract, or agreement of marriage ever entered into between said parties; and, at the time of signing said declaration, plaintiff and defendant mutually agreed to take each other, as, and henceforth to be to each other, husband and wife."

(3) "That afterwards, and about the ——— day of September, 1880, the plaintiff and defendant commenced living and cohabiting together in the way usual with married people, although their cohabitation was kept secret, and so continued for the space of more than one year, and down to the twenty-fifth day of November, 1881, and during all of said time the plaintiff and defendant mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations."

(4) "That during all the time plaintiff and defendant so lived together, defendant visited her relations with her, escorted her to places of amusement, and introduced her to respectable families and to members of his own family, and wrote to her several letters while absent from her, in which he addressed her as 'My dear wife.'"

(6) "The defendant, on or about December 6, 1881, drove plaintiff from her apartments in his hotel, in which she had resided, by his direction, since September, 1880, and which was the residence selected for her by the defendant, refused to longer live with or provide for her support, and has not since then lived with or sought to live with, or requested the plaintiff to return or live with him, or provide in any manner for her support."

(8) "That it is not true, as stated in the answer of defendant, that plaintiff has either falsely or fraudulently assumed the name of Sarah Althea Sharon; but, on the contrary, that it is her real name; nor is it true that she, or any one, forged the document mentioned in the complaint, and heretofore set out; on the contrary, the said document is genuine, and was signed by the plaintiff and defendant at the time it purports to have been signed."

(9) "That defendant never introduced plaintiff as his wife, nor spoke of her as such in the presence of other persons; that plaintiff never introduced defendant as her husband, nor spoke to nor of him to other persons in his presence as her husband; that the parties were never reputed among their mutual friends to be husband and wife, nor was there at any time any mutual, open recognition of such relationship by the parties, nor any public assumption by the parties of the relation of husband and wife."

The appellant contends that, on the findings, the judgment declaring the validity of the marriage must be reversed, and a judgment be ordered that no marriage existed between the parties. This, because of the written promise of the plaintiff, that the written declaration of marriage should, at the option of the defendant, be kept secret for the period of two years, and of the facts found showing that, while their cohabitation continued, the alleged marriage was not made known by the plaintiff or defendant to third persons. The objection that the findings do not sustain the judgment is in the nature of a demurrer to the findings. The evidence is not before us; and we are not to inquire how far, if at all, the secrecy maintained by the plaintiff and defendant, or the insertion of the written promise of secrecy on her part, tended, under the circumstances, to prove that no marriage was contracted. That was a matter to be argued in the court below. Here, and on this appeal, the facts set forth in the findings are admitted to be true.

If the contemporaneous promise of the plaintiff not to make known the paper writing, or its contents, for a limited period, rendered the agreement of the plaintiff and defendant to take each other as husband and wife void, or if the parties could not, as matter of law, mutually assume marital rights, duties, or obligations, without making public their relation as husband and wife, the judgment must be reversed; otherwise we are to consider, as conclusively establishing the marriage, the facts that plaintiff and defendant did sign the paper writing as set forth in finding 2, and mutually agreed to take each other as husband and wife; that in September, 1880, they commenced living and cohabiting together in the manner usual with married people, in an apartment furnished by him, and so continued to live and cohabit together down to November, 1881; that he wrote to her several letters addressed, "My dear wife," and that during all of said time they mutually assumed "towards each other" marital rights, duties, and obligations.

Section 55, Civil Code, reads: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." In the first sentence of the section of the Code "marriage" is defined in terms which accord with the definition of the status or condition of marriage given by courts and learned law writers. The civil contract of the parties is simply that they forthwith enter into a certain status or relation. The rights and obligations of that status are fixed by society, in accordance with the principles of natural law, and are beyond and above the parties themselves. They cannot modify the terms on which they are to live together, nor superadd to the relation a single condition. Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 13. The Code declares marriage to be a personal relation "arising out of contract." The personal relation created by the contract is not merely a contract. The contract is the portal through which the parties enter into the relation of marriage, and they can enter into that relation in no other way. Although all persons competent may marry at their own volition, the law fixes the rights and duties of those who are married. The section of the Code defines "marriage," which, as distinguished from a present contract to marry, or the act of becoming married, is "the civil status of one man and one woman united in law for life, for the discharge to each other and to the community of the duties legally incumbent on those whose association is founded on the distinction of sex." 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 3. The contract out of which the marriage relation arises must be a contract then and there to become husband and wife. Hence, as appears from the cases cited by appellant, a contract between a man and woman to live and cohabit together, or even to assume the duties of husband and wife, for a limited period, or so long as it may prove agreeable to both, or any other agreement which attempts to limit in extent or duration the rights and duties inseparably annexed to the status of matrimony, has sometimes been held not to be an agreement to become husband and wife, out of which arises the relation of marriage.

But to make the principle underlying such decisions applicable to the case at bar, it must be made to appear that, by the terms of our statute, the making public of the marriage relation is a duty or obligation annexed to the status of marriage, without which the status cannot exist. Such is the contention of appellant, based on the last sentence of section 55, Civil Code: "Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations."

It is claimed, in the first place, that the promise to keep secret the contract of marriage for a period of two years, unless defendant should waive that stipulation, controlled and gave color to the other terms of the contract, so that it became not a contract of marriage, but a contract for illicit intercourse. In the second place, it is claimed that, independent of the stipulation as to secrecy, there was no marriage, because of the fact of secrecy; since with secrecy there was and could be no "mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations," within the meaning of the Code. The words "duties" and "obligations" are evidently used in the same sense in the section of the Code. The duties to be assumed are the obligations which flow from the relation of husband and wife. And the word "marital" must, to give any effect to the sentence in which it is found, be treated as the equivalent of conjugal; to include the rights and duties of the wife as well as those of the husband. The validity of the alleged marriage we are considering must depend upon the fact that it was not made known by the parties. The promise of the plaintiff not to make it known for a period of two years, except with the consent of the defendant, was a collateral agreement, and not a condition to the marriage contract taking effect. The agreement to become husband and wife was complete. If she had published the writing, called the "declaration of marriage," at any time, the publication would not have avoided the marriage contract, because the parties did not, if they could, agree, that the contract should become operative only in case the plaintiff should keep it secret for two years, unless in the mean time secrecy was waived by the defendant. It is said by Mr. Bishop: "Not unfrequently the courts hold to be void some contract entered into at the time of the marriage, while the sufficiency of the marriage itself is not denied." 1 Mar. & Div. § 266. Whatever may be the rule where some limitation is introduced into the contract of any of the obligations which accompany the state of wedlock, in such manner as to indicate that the contract would not have been entered into, except upon the condition inserted, here, as we have seen, the promise not to make known the contract was an independent promise, and not a condition. If the promise had been utterly disregarded, it could not be successfully contended that they were not married.

If the last sentence of section 55 means what appellant claims it means, there would have been no marriage in the absence of the promise on the part of plaintiff not to publish it. On the other hand, if there can be a marriage without publicity, the promise of the plaintiff that she would not make it known for a temporary period did not affect its validity, because not an illegal promise. At the common law an agreement to keep the marriage secret does not invalidate it. 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 252, and cases cited in note. In the judicial decisions which speak of an open recognition of the matrimonial union, the effect of such open recognition is considered as evidence. The fact of marriage is one thing; the evidence by which it may be established is another. The fact of the publication of their relation, by the conduct and declarations of the parties, may go far to corroborate testimony with respect to an actual contract to marry. And so, in cases where the contract has not been directly proved, evidence that the parties cohabited together, and were reputed to be husband and wife, or recognized or introduced each other as such, is admissible as tending to prove, and if sufficient, proves, that they had previously entered into an agreement forthwith to become husband and wife. Yet evidence of cohabitation merely, without evidence of recognition of the relation, or repute of marriage, is not sufficient to establish an inference that there had been a mutual consent to marry, in the absence of direct evidence of such consent. Estate of Briswalter, 13 Pac. Rep. 164.

Again, it has sometimes been said (and not incorrectly, in view of the context) that at the common law marriage may be contracted per verba de presenti merely, or per verba de futuro cum copula. But, strictly speaking, there can be no contract per verba de futuro, which imposes the status of marriage. When the parties have been shown to have agreed to a future marriage, evidence of the copula is admitted to prove that they changed their consent to a future marriage into a present consent. This by reason of a presumption in favor of morality. Thus evidence, whether direct or indirect, of a contract of marriage, is always evidence of a consent per verba de præsenti.

But by our statute such present consent does not constitute marriage. Civil Code, § 55. It must be followed by a solemnization or by a mutual assumption of marital rights or duties. What does this mean? It is urged that such mutual assumption is put as the alternative for "solemnization;" and as solemnization implies and requires publicity, so it is intended that the assumption of rights and duties shall be public. By section 78, Civil Code, the solemnization of a marriage is mentioned as a thing distinct from the license to marry, from the authentication of the marriage, and from the record of the marriage certificate. A marriage is solemnized when, in the presence of a judicial officer, priest, or minister, the parties declare that they take each other as husband and wife, (Civil Code, §§ 70, 71;) and the officer or minister who witnesses this ceremony is said to "solemnize" the marriage. Every person authorized to solemnize marriage, who willfully solemnizes a marriage forbidden by law, or makes false return of a marriage, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Pen. Code, §§ 359, 360. But if between competent persons, the solemnization makes the marriage complete, although not preceded by license, or succeeded by record. Such a marriage is valid, although retained within the knowledge of those present at its solemnization; without any communication of its existence to the community at large, which, in a certain sense, is said to have an interest in all marriages, or rather an interest that the institution of matrimony be maintained in its sacred purity. By the language of section 55, Civil Code, the solemnization completes the marriage, although not followed by a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties; since such assumption is required only where there is no solemnization. It may be said, however, it is giving to the word "solemnization," in section 55, too narrow a meaning to confine it to the mere ceremony before the officer or minister; that it should be held to include the issuing of the license and the record of the certificate, with the publicity incidental to the license and record; that the purpose of the section must be to facilitate the proof of marriages by requiring their existence to be made public.

But the purpose of a statute can only be derived from its words, read in the light of the previous law. If it is so confused and uncertain that it can be given no intelligible meaning, we must consider the common law unchanged by it. The public policy of the state can only be ascertained by reference to the constitution and statutes. The courts cannot create a policy, and then declare, in support of the policy so created, that the legislature must have meant what it has not said. By the common law, private marriages, clearly proved, are valid; and it is a cardinal rule of interpretation that the common law continues except as altered by the statute. It is certainly remarkable that if it was intended consent must be followed by a "public" assumption of matrimonial rights and duties, the legislature did not say so in express terms, since, if so much was intended, the departure from the common law would be radical. It may be claimed to be equally strange, if mere "consummation" was meant, it was not so declared. But, giving force to both of these suggestions, the utmost that could be argued from them would be that the code-makers probably meant neither of the two things—a public assumption or mere "consummation."

The commissioners who prepared the Civil Code of California adopted as a foundation for their labors the Civil Code prepared for submission to the legislature of New York, departing in places only from the language of the Code proposed in the latter state. It may throw some light upon the question we are considering to compare sections of the proposed New York Code and sections of our Code.

NEW YORK CODE.

"Sec. 34. Marriage is a personal relation, arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is alone necessary."

"Sec. 36. Any unmarried male of the age of fourteen years or upward, and any unmarried female of the age of twelve years or upward, and not otherwise disqualified, is capable of consenting to marriage," etc.

"Sec. 35. Consent to a marriage may be manifested in any form, and may be proved like any other fact."

The distribution of a statute into sections is arbitrary, and merely for convenience of reference. The New York and California Codes may be read respectively. "The consent of capable parties is alone necessary to constitute marriage; the consent may be manifested in any form, and may be proved like any other fact." N. Y. Code. "Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties; the consent and consummation may be manifested in any form, and proved under the same general rules of evidence as other facts." Cal. Code.

The word "consummation," whenever used as something different from the mere consent or formal solemnization of marriage, had always been held to mean "simply sexual intercourse, copulation, nothing more nor less." Section 57 of our Civil Code provides how this consummation may be proved. As consummation, if it does not constitute, is at least included in, an assumption of marital rights and duties, it is a circumstance of some significance that, when providing for the mode of proving "consent and subsequent consummation," nothing is said with respect to the manner of proving other rights and duties to be mutually assumed, if the proof of others is contemplated by section 55. It is a circumstance tending to show that it was the intention to change the New York Code only by requiring consummation to follow mutual present consent. If more was intended, it would have been easy to say: "The mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases." It has been suggested that "consummation" in sections 56 and 57 is to be interpreted in the broader sense of "completion," and as, by section 55, a marriage is not complete until after a public recognition of it by the parties, the consummation of sections 56 and 57 means the completion of the marriage as provided in section 55. This is only saying that in the absence of solemnization there is no marriage until after cohabitation known to others, or public recognition of the marriage and copulation. This, as we shall see, the sections cannot mean; the legislature could not have intended that (after a present consent to marry) a period of cohabitation, known to others, should be necessary to the constitution of marriage, or precede its "completion;" for, if so, the woman would be compelled to live with the man in such manner as that their coition would be inferred, before their coition would be lawful.

CALIFORNIA CODE.

"Sec. 55. Marriage is a personal relation, arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations.

"Sec. 56. Any unmarried male of the age of eighteen years or upwards, and any unmarried female of the age of fourteen years or upwards, and not otherwise disqualified, are capable of consenting to and consummating marriage.

"Sec. 57. Consent to and subsequent consummation of marriage may be manifested in any form, and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases."

Each article of the Code is preceded by head-notes, numbered to correspond with the sections following, and purporting to give in brief the subject of each of such sections. These head-notes are entitled to more consideration than the "title" to an entire act. They are parts of the statute limiting and defining the sections to which they refer. To refuse to give effect to them according to their import would be to make the law, not to administer it. Barnes v. Jones, 51 Cal. 303; McKINSTRY, J., in Ex parte Koser, 60 Cal. 206; Williams v. People, 45 Barb. 201; People v. Molineux, 53 Barb. 15, 40 N. Y. 119. As we have seen, section 57 of the Civil Code relates to the proof of "consent and subsequent consummation." Additional force is given to the suggestion that it was intended that consent and consummation should constitute marriage by the fact that the head-note to that section is: "Marriage—How manifested and proved." It may be added that when the propriety of requiring a public declaration to accompany unsolemnized marriages was directly called to the attention of the legislature of California, the legislature refused to act upon the suggestion, but permitted section 55 to remain as it now is. Among the amendments reported by the revisory commissioners, appointed in 1873, was one to make section 55 of the Civil Code read: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of the parties is necessary. To render marriage hereafter contracted in this state valid, the contract must be accompanied by a solemnization, or by a public declaration, as provided in this chapter." While adopting many of the amendments proposed by the commissioners, the legislature rejected this one.

We do not propose to decide the question whether at the common-law consummation, as well as consent, was necessary to constitute marriage. Mr. Bishop says: "Consummation—the copula—is no part of the marriage; it only serves, to some extent, as evidence thereof. A maxim of the civil law, equally also of the ecclesiastical, of the common,—indeed, of all law governing the subject,—is, 'Consensus non concubitus facit matrimonium.' Hence, when parties capable of intermarrying agree to a present marriage, the relation is made thereby complete. This is true everywhere, subject to the qualification that in some countries there are laws requiring the addition of specified ceremonies and forms; but the copula gives the marriage nowhere any additional strength." 1 Mar. & Div. § 228; and see cases cited in the note. And Chancellor Kent says: "If the contract be made per verba de presenti, without cohabitation, * * * it amounts to valid marriage, in the absence of all civil regulations to the contrary." 2 Comm. 87.

In this country, in those states where there is no statute prohibiting common-law marriages, and declaring all invalid except those solemnized in some particular form, the decided weight of authority is that to constitute marriage the contract per verba de presenti need not be succeeded by a consummation. Nor is it necessary here to decide whether, by the common law of England, a present consent, with or without subsequent cohabitation, constituted marriage, in the absence of religious sanction evidenced by the presence and approval of a clergyman of the Established Church. In a note to section 55 of our Civil Code the California commissioners say: "As to whether consent alone constitutes marriage: In Jewell v. Jewell, 1 How. 219, the court was equally divided. In Reg. v. Millis, 10 Clark & F., 534, the house of lords, on appeal from Ireland, were also equally divided on the same question. On reference of the question to the court, TINDAL, C. J., gave the unanimous opinion of the court that it was not a valid marriage, and held 'that by the law of England, as it existed at the time of the marriage act, a contract of marriage per verba de presenti was indissoluble between the parties themselves, and afforded to either of them, by application to the spiritual court, the power of compelling the solemnization of an actual marriage; but such contract never constituted a full and complete marriage, in itself, unless made in the presence and with the intervention of a minister in holy orders. The civil contract and the religious ceremony were both necessary to a perfect marriage by the common law." Civil Code, Annotated, § 55.

The opinion referred to in the note as the opinion of the court was, in the opinion of the judges, in response to questions put to them by the lords, and did not decide the case. The judgment of the queen's bench was affirmed, because the votes in the house of lords for reversing or affirming it were equal. The views of the judges in their answers to the questions submitted to them in Reg. v. Millis have since been doubted, perhaps overruled, in England. But the question discussed in that case was whether, by the law of England, prior to the marriage act, 26 Geo. II., a contract per verba de præsenti, without the intervention of a minister in orders, was sufficient to make a complete marriage, so that by marrying a second time the defendant made himself liable to the pains and penalties of bigamy.

In Jewell v. Jewell, 1 How. 219, also referred to in the note, the circuit court directed the jury that, in the absence of solemnization, "if the contract be made per verba de præsenti, and remains without cohabitation, or if made per verba de futuro, and be followed by consummation, it amounts to a valid marriage, and which the parties (being competent as to age and consent) cannot dissolve." Upon this question the supreme court of the United States was equally divided.

The reference to the two cases in the commissioners' note was evidently to indicate that the object of the last clause of section 55 was to declare "a solemnization" not necessary, provided the mutual consent be followed by something else. The cases referred to leave unsettled the questions whether in England a religious ceremony was necessary prior to the marriage act; and whether, in some of the American states, where peculiar laws requiring certain ceremonies obtain, a solemnization in accordance with the forms required by such laws is necessary, in addition to the consent of the parties.

They are of no assistance in the present inquiry, except so far as they tend to show the purpose of the Code—already sufficiently clear from its language—that, in the absence of solemnization, more than mere consent should be requisite to constitute marriage.

As we have said, the Civil Code of California is based upon and in the main follows the Civil Code as reported to the legislature of New York. The California commissioners changed section 34 of the New York Code. That section provided that consent alone is necessary to constitute marriage. Our commissioners altered this by declaring "consent alone will not constitute marriage," and then added the clause so often quoted. This was done with the note of the New York commissioners (to section 34) before them. That note clearly shows the object of section 34. There had been two opinions among jurists; many holding that present consent makes marriage; some that, to make a marriage, either consummation or solemnization was also requisite. The New York commissioners determined to provide that present consent, without consummation or solemnization, should be sufficient. The note of the New York commissioners reads: "By 2 Rev. St. 199, section 1, marriage is declared to be a civil contract to which consent is necessary; but whether anything more than consent is necessary has been mooted; some authorities deeming that either consummation or solemnization is also requisite. Jaques v. Public Adm'r, 1 Bradf. Sur. 499. And see 2 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 74. This provision makes consent alone sufficient, and is in accordance with the views declared in Starr v. Peck, 1 Hill, 270; Jackson v. Winne, 7 Wend. 47; Caujolle v. Ferrie, 23 N. Y. 106; Hayes v. People, 25 N. Y. 390." It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the California commissioners, with the foregoing note before them, decided to adopt the position rejected by the New York commissioners, and to provide that, in the absence of solemnization, consent alone should not constitute marriage; but that it must be followed by "consummation." And yet it may be said the phraseology does excite a suspicion that something more or different was intended, since it is hard to believe that the commissioners were actuated by a hyper-delicacy in rejecting a term in that particular sentence, which they subsequently did not hesitate to employ.

The difficulty of arriving at the meaning of the last clause of section 55 of our Civil Code was very fully set forth and illustrated by John Norton Pomerooy, late professor in the college of law of the university of California, in two articles published by him. 4 West Coast Rep. 50, 152. These articles were referred to by counsel at the argument. The theme of the series of articles in which the two above cited are included, is the necessity of applying well-known, uniform, and consistent principles of interpretation in adjudicating upon, applying, and enforcing all the various sections of the Civil Code. 3 West Coast Rep. 585. His conclusion is that the only method by which any certain, consistent, and just results can be attained through an interpretation of the provisions of the Code, is by adopting and following the principle that they are, "in general," declaratory of common-law and equity rules. 4 West Coast Rep. 150. And he points out that where the provisions of the Code are clearly not merely declaratory of the common law, the great, and in some instances apparently insurmountable, difficulty is to ascertain how far the particular provision departs from or changes the pre-existing law. This arises from a defect "which may be said to characterize the entire Code as a work of legislation." "From their constant, but wholly unnecessary, practice of abandoning well-known legal terms and phrases, the signification, force, and effect of which had long been settled and certain, and of adopting instead thereof an unknown and hitherto unused language and terminology, as well in their ordinary definitions as in the statement of general doctrines and single rules, they constantly create an uncertainty whether they intend merely to declare and restate, without change, a known common-law definition, doctrine, or rule, or whether, on the other hand, they intend to alter or modify such definition, doctrine, or rule; and, if the latter be their general intent, they make it uncertain how far the alteration extends." 3 West Coast Rep. 586.

Among other illustrations of the employment of language which renders the meaning, intent, and consequent effect of a particular section "obscure and uncertain," he cites section 55 of the Civil Code. With reference to that section he says: " 'Consent alone will not constitute a marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations.' What is the meaning of this strange phrase? The phrase is absolutely unknown to the law. Does it mean that the two spouses must live openly as husband and wife, must hold each other out to the world as husband and wife, etc.? There are strong arguments against that meaning. In the first place, the phraseology to describe exactly that condition has long been settled, and is very familiar; and if the authors of the Code had such a meaning, it seems hardly possible that they should reject this familiar and expressive phraseology. Instead of saying that consent must be followed by 'habit and repute,' or 'by the parties holding themselves out to the world as husband and wife,' which would have left no doubt as to their meaning, they adopt this uncouth phrase, which does not necessarily have such a meaning. But, in the second place, such an alteration of the common-law rule seems to be entirely without any reason, and opposed to common sense. Under the law previous to the Code, proof that two parties had treated each other as husband and wife, had lived together as such, and had held each other out to the world as such, was sufficient to enable a jury or court to infer and find the fact of marriage. Why? Not at all because such living and holding out of itself constitutes a marriage; but solely because from such living and holding out the court or jury may find that at some previous time the two parties did, as a fact, consent to be married,—did, as a fact, agree to be husband and wife. This conclusion is sustained by all the decisions of authority. The previous actual consent or agreement to be husband and wife is the ultimate and essential fact which the jury must find; the mode of life, the holding out, and the like, are nothing but circumstantial evidence from which that fact may be inferred. Now, when living as husband and wife, and holding out as such, were only necessary as evidence for the purpose of inferring the fact of a previous consent, it seems strange and useless to require evidence of the same kind,—of holding out and living as husband and wife, and the like,—when the fact of a prior consent has already been clearly established by other and independent evidence.” 4 West Coast Rep. 51.

In a subsequent article (4 West Coast Rep. 152) the same learned writer said: “Whatever weight may be due the considerations before suggested in a former article, there are, in my opinion, equal, if not greater, obstacles to an interpretation which treats the section (55) as having made no material alteration in the rule as previously settled—the common-law rule. If, by the previous rule, after verba de præsenti, the copula was sufficient to constitute a marriage, it seems almost impossible to suppose that in the phrase ‘by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations’ the authors of the Code and the legislature did not mean something more and different—something additional. We may wonder at the employment of terms so unlike the usual phraseology of statutes, and may regret that words more certain and definite in their meaning were not selected; and still, if we give any fair and reasonable construction to all the language, we can hardly escape the conclusion that ‘a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations’ imports acts and conduct of the two parties towards each other, and rights and duties belonging to the marriage relation, which cannot possibly be embraced in the word ‘copula,’ or the word ‘consummation,’ or even, perhaps, the word ‘cohabitation.’”

There is no statement in either article that, in the opinion of the writer, a public recognition of the marriage relation is required by the Code. The writer does not pretend to interpret the provision of the Code, and his interpretation would not have been authoritative. His very purpose is to show the uncertainty of its language, by pointing out the objections to holding it to mean either consummation alone, or more than consummation. Much of the force of the argument of the second article is taken away when the uncertainty of the premise on which it is based is considered. “If, by the previous rule, after verba de præsenti, the copula was sufficient,” would seem to imply that, at the common law, the copula was necessary to constitute marriage. But as we have seen, Mr. Bishop, in his work on Marriage and Divorce, (referring to authorities in support of his position,) lays down the rule that the copula adds no force to the present consent, but the latter makes a complete marriage without the copula. Kent holds to the same view; and such is the effect of the decided weight of authority in this country. The New York cases cited in the note of the commissioners in that state are to the effect that, where the contract is per verba de præsenti, neither consummation nor solemnization is requisite to make a complete marriage; yet the case in Bradford, and what is said in Parsons on Contracts, induced the New York commissioners to declare in express words that neither should be necessary. The California commissioners deemed it wiser to declare that consent alone should not constitute matrimony; but it cannot be assumed that the provision of our Code was based upon the hypothesis that by the previous law there was no marriage unless consent was followed by consummation. At the most, the result of the statements of Professor Pomeroy is that it is doubtful whether the language of section 55 of the Civil Code means that the consent must be followed by consummation, or by consummation and something more.

It is claimed that, in Graham v. Bennet, 2 Cal. 503, the supreme court, by HYDENFELDT, J., speaking of an unsolemnized marriage, entered into in 1845, decided that to constitute such a marriage there must be an open assumption of the relative duties of husband and wife; and that the code commissioners clearly showed their intention to adopt the rule laid down in that case. In Graham v. Bennet the facts showed that the consent was in the presence of witnesses, and was followed by open and acknowledged cohabitation as man and wife. The learned judge delivering the opinion there said: "Marriage is regarded as a civil contract, and no form is necessary for its solemnization. If it take place between parties able to contract, an open avowal of the intention, and an assumption of the relative duties which it imposes on each other, is sufficient to render it valid and binding. The ceremony, therefore, which took place between the plaintiff and defendant, as shown by the complaint, was sufficient to constitute them man and wife," etc. The ceremony set forth in the complaint was the signing by the parties of the writing, witnessed by persons therein named, which reads: "Marriage in the year 1845. Isaac Graham of Santa Cruz, and Catherine Bennet of San Francisco, were married at Lyant, by banns, this twenty-sixth day of September, 1845, by one who was requested to read the ceremony, Henry Ford. This marriage was solemnized between us, ISAAC GRAHAM, CATHERINE BENNET. In presence of WILLIAM WERM, HENRY FORD." The 'ceremony' held to be sufficient to constitute the parties man and wife was the execution of the foregoing writing. By it, in the presence of the witnesses, they made open avowal of their intention, and agreed to take upon themselves the relative duties imposed by marriage. Even if the language of the court should be construed to mean more than an assumption, as proved by the ceremony or consent, it was at most but a decision that, upon the facts of that case,—the consent and subsequent open assumption of marital duties,—the parties were married. The language of a court must always be read in view of the facts before it. This is an established canon of legal criticism. The court did not decide that all the facts appearing in that case must exist to constitute marriage, but that the facts there appearing proved a marriage. The former could not have been intended, because it would be in violation of every precedent. The marriage involved in Graham v. Bennet took place prior to the acquisition of California by the United States, but the court assumed that the law of Mexico was the same as the common law. It had never been held in this country that, at common law, a contract per verba de præsenti—followed or not followed by the copula—must be succeeded by a public assumption of the relative duties arising out of the status of marriage. Nor was such an interpretation placed upon the decision of Graham v. Bennet during the 20 odd years intervening between that decision and the adoption of the Codes.

While this action was pending in the court below, a judgment of the circuit court of the United States for Maryland was reversed by the supreme court of the United States. Maryland v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 490, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278. One of the issues there was, was Markeley the real plaintiff, a son and heir of Daniel Lord, deceased? and it involved the validity of an alleged marriage between the deceased and the mother of the plaintiff. In the circuit court there was a general verdict for the defendants. A witness, one Cross, testified at the trial that the deceased had admitted to him his marriage with plaintiff's mother, and had given a certain reason for concealing his own name and taking hers; also that, after her death deceased had spoken of his marriage, and attributed all his early success to her. One of the defendants was permitted, against the objection of the plaintiff, to testify to conversations with the deceased about Cross; and that the deceased had expressed great distrust of him, calling him anything but an honest man, etc. The supreme court held this last testimony clearly inadmissible; it being mere hearsay. For the error in admitting it, against the objection of the plaintiff, the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. No exception seems to have been taken to the charge of the circuit judge. Mr. Justice FIELD said that, as, for the error mentioned, the cause must go back for a new trial, it was proper to say that by the law of Pennsylvania, where, if at all, the parties were married, a marriage could be made per verba de presenti, without attending ceremonies, religious or civil; that such is the doctrine of the common law. "But where no such ceremonies are required, and no record is made to attest the marriage, some public recognition of it is necessary, as evidence of its existence." He adds, the charge of the court should direct the jury as to the necessity of such recognition, in the absence of statutory regulations on the subject. And the learned judge said: "The law of Pennsylvania, as we are advised, requires, in some form, such recognition. See Nathan's Case, 2 Brewst. 149, 153; Com. v. Stump, 53 Pa. St. 132."

In Maryland v. Baldwin no witness was present at any marriage ceremony, or at any contract of marriage; a marriage, if it existed, was to be inferred from their declarations and living together. Pages 493, 494. The language of the court is to be interpreted in view of the facts. If, however, as claimed by appellant, it was intended to be said that, when there is direct evidence of a contract of marriage, by words in the present tense, there must also, by the law of Pennsylvania, be evidence of a public recognition of the marriage, a reference to the two cases cited shows that the learned judge was wrongly advised as to the law of that state.

In Com. v. Stump, the supreme court of Pennsylvania decided: "Where there is no proof of actual marriage, cohabitation and reputation are necessary to ground a presumption of marriage; proof of cohabitation alone is insufficient." 53 Pa. St. 132, 135.

In Nathan's Case, the court of quarter sessions held that the wife was a competent witness to prove a present contract to marry; and, independent of her testimony, (page 168,) the marriage was sufficiently proved by the acts and declarations of the parties; that reputation and cohabitation are sufficient evidence of marriage, and may be conclusive where the rights of third persons are affected, and the legitimacy of children is called in question.

Even if the "mutual assumption," etc., be a broader expression than "consummation," it may be given full effect by holding it to include, not only consummation directly proved, as it rarely is or can be, but also the mutual taking on, by a man and woman, of marital rights and duties, from which consummation may be inferred. The phrase called by Professor Pomeroy "uncouth," does not, as said by him, require that they shall "hold themselves out to the world as husband and wife." The common law underlies all our legislation and furnishes the rule of decision, except in so far as the statutes have changed the common law. When the common law is departed from by a provision of the Code, effect is to be given to the provision to the extent, and only to the extent, of the departure. This is not saying that the Code must be strictly construed, as those terms were sometimes applied to classes of statutes prior to the Codes. Every provision of the Code, expressed in intelligible language, must be given full force and effect. But, under pretense of an interpretation—or explanation in different language—the courts cannot add to the significant terms of a statute; nor, by resorting to conjecture, can they go beyond the intent derivable from the terms actually employed, considered with the pre-existing law. Certainly the courts are not authorized to declare something more must have been intended, because, in the opinion of individual judges, a greater departure from the common law would be wise or expedient. As said by Lord STOWELL, secrecy sometimes attends the most regular marriages "from prudential reasons," (Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. 54;) although, where prudential reasons do not appear, that may cast doubt upon the fact of marriage. As valid marriages might be secret at the common law, we cannot say that the departure in the Code from the common law requires that in every case they must be public, unless the words employed demand such interpretation.

The question presented by these findings (and we can know nothing of the case except from the findings) is this: Shall a man be permitted to say: "True, this woman and I agreed to enter into the marriage state, by words in the present tense. That agreement was followed by cohabitation, and by our mutually taking upon ourselves 'towards each other' marital rights, duties, and obligations. But we are not married, because we did not discharge a marital duty, to-wit, make public the relation between us; but, on the contrary, by mutual consent, kept it secret for a period; and I never acknowledged it. The community had a right to know that we were married, or pretended to be married, and I appeal to public policy,—as declared by section 55 of the Civil Code,—and to great principles of morality, which demand that such a union as ours shall be declared to be illicit?" Surely, if the legislators had intended consequences such as would flow from upholding a party in a position like that, they would have expressed their purpose in unmistakable terms. If the position of appellants be correct, there is no marriage, notwithstanding previous consent, until after a public recognition of the marriage relation. But from cohabitation and such recognition, sexual intercourse may properly be inferred, and there can be no lawful intercourse of that character before marriage. It would follow, therefore, that, in the absence of solemnization, a marriage could only be proved by establishing a fact from which unlawful intercourse could be inferred. On the other hand, if consummation, "the most intimate union of the sexes," completes the marriage, and is an assumption of marital rights and duties, and the consummation may be proved directly, or as an inference from another fact from which it may be inferred, no such anomaly is presented. The statute either means that, after present consent to marriage, the consummation (however proved) is sufficient evidence of an assumption of marital rights and duties; or the acts, other than consummation, must precede consummation; the consummation must be the last of the series of acts. If cohabitation as man and wife, to the knowledge of the acquaintances of the parties, must precede the consummation, how long must it be continued, and to what extent must it be made public, to authorize sexual intercourse? It is incredible the legislature intended that copulation may take place before the marriage is complete, or to put it in the power of the man, after he has enjoyed the person of the woman, to say, "I will proceed no further." Yet it is the duty of the woman, after the mutual consent to present marriage, to live with the man, and their cohabitation must, from the nature of things, create the presumption of copulation; which reduces the statute to an absurdity. It does not require a public assumption of the marriage relation to create a presumption of consummation. The cohabitation of persons of opposite sexes, whether legal or illicit, suggests sexual intercourse, (Imperial Dict.) and is evidence of it. When previous consent is proved, cohabitation is itself evidence of an assumption of marital rights and duties, and is evidence of such assumption by means of the consummation which has completed the marriage.

It is urged there can be no "mutual assumption" of marital rights and duties which is unknown to the community at large, or to the acquaintances of the parties; that the word "mutual" requires an "open and respectful" recognition before the community, "in all their social intercourse," that they stand to each other in the relation of husband and wife. But, where the holding out to the world of the relation is evidence of a prior contract, such evidence does not necessarily depend for its effect upon amenity of manners, or upon the degree to which the parties extend to each other the affectionate respect which should attend the intercourse of husband and wife in well-ordered households. The statute does not make the validity of a marriage by consent depend upon the full performance of their mutual duties; the failure to perform certain important obligations is made ground for divorce. It may be conceded the Code requires the mutual assumption of such duties. The assumption of rights and duties by the parties must be mutual, and the Code is given effect if they are assumed between and towards each other. The title of a tale by a great novelist—"Our Mutual Friend"—has been much criticised as a misapplication of terms, and it presents, perhaps, the only instance in standard literature of the application of the word "mutual" to that which cannot be interchanged. The adjective "mutual" is defined: "Reciprocally acting or related; reciprocally receiving; reciprocally given and received; reciprocal; interchanged; as mutual love, assistance, advantage, aversion." Webster. If the words had been "mutual performance" of the duties common to both, they would have demanded simply the performance of such duties to each other; and would not have required that the relation should be made public, unless the making it public is a duty inherent in the relation, such as cannot be waived; which it is not. It is said, however, the "assumption" of the Code implies publicity; that the word is ordinarily used as appearing to others in a given character, station, or relation, and necessarily conveys the idea of a public appearance. But the first definition of the lexicographer referred to in the briefs, is "the act of assuming or taking to or upon one's self." (Ad and sumere.) It is sometimes used to express the pretension of having or possessing; the taking on in appearance, and not in reality. But, when used in the last sense, it does not necessarily mean a pretense presented to the eyes of the community, although it may include such general pretense. To adopt the illustrations of counsel, one may assume to an individual—to take upon himself by words, manner, or bearing, in the presence of one person alone—a virtue, though he "have it not." To deceive a single soul, the devil hath power to assume a "pleasing shape."

The section of the Code requires that the parties shall mutually take on themselves marital rights and duties. This they agree to do when they agree to become husband and wife, but inasmuch as the section provides that the mutual assumption shall "follow" consent, it may be conceded that there must be evidence of other facts, showing the assumption, in addition to direct evidence of consent; that the Code does away with the presumption of consummation, which has sometimes been said to arise out of a contract per verba de presenti. But the Code does not declare that the fact of marriage must be proved independently of, and without regard to, direct evidence of an actual present consent. Since, as before the Code, evidence of cohabitation, and that the parties, in the presence and hearing of their acquaintances,—openly, "in their social intercourse,"—have recognized each other as husband and wife, is sufficient to prove previous consent, and, therefore, marriage. In effect, the contention of appellant is that direct evidence of a consent to marry per verba de presenti, however full and satisfactory, shall count for nothing; but that in every case, in the absence of solemnization, there must be evidence sufficient, in and of itself, to prove the marriage, independent of direct evidence of an actual contract. But such independent and complete proof of the marriage is not made necessary by the words "consent alone will not constitute marriage; it (the consent) must be followed by the mutual assumption," etc. The language clearly implies that the "mutual assumption" is to be shown, not by evidence sufficient of itself to prove consent, but as something in addition to consent already proved. Under the Code, the fact to be proved is the existence of the relation which "arises out of a civil contract." Besides evidence of the mutual consent of the parties, which makes the contract, there must be other evidence that they have assumed towards each other marital rights and duties.

"There are two principal ends of marriage—a lawful indulgence of the passions to prevent licentiousness, and the procreation of children under the shield and sanction of the law." Stew. Mar. & Div. 103. The intercourse, which is the means by which these ends are attained, is both a right and duty. Evidence that the man and woman have enjoyed the right and discharged the duty, whether direct or consisting of proof of another fact from which the intercourse may be inferred,—as cohabitation,—is, when preceded by present consent to marry, evidence that the parties to the contract have actually assumed all the duties incident to marriage. Whether, in addition to and in the light of the consent, there is sufficient evidence that they have taken on themselves marital rights and duties, must depend upon the circumstances proved in each case. When parties agree to a present marriage, they mutually agree to take on themselves the obligations appertaining to the marriage state; but the Code requires that to justify a finding of marriage there shall be additional evidence that they have assumed marital rights or obligations. If a case be supposed, where, immediately after consent to present marriage, the parties have permanently separated, there would, perhaps, be no marriage; not because they would not have mutually agreed to assume marital obligations, but because the section of the Code requires evidence of other and subsequent facts, showing the actual assumption of marital obligations. In considering the evidence of such facts subsequently occurring, however, the direct evidence of previous consent is not to be rejected. All the evidence is to be taken together. As we have seen, cohabitation alone does not prove marriage, because the relation between a man and woman cohabiting may not be that of husband and wife. But cohabitation, with evidence of a reputation that they were married, created by the conduct of the parties, proves a previous consent and marriage. So, under the Code, cohabitation, with direct evidence of previous consent, proves a marriage; because, when viewed with the previous consent, cohabitation is evidence of a mutual assumption, etc. Cohabitation being proved, direct proof of previous consent is at least as effective as is evidence of reputation from which the previous consent may be inferred.

So far as we are informed the only law writer, other than Professor Pomeroy, who has employed language similar to that of our Civil Code, is Mr. Stewart, in his work on Marriage and Divorce, published in 1884. At section 103, speaking of "the consummation," he defines consummation as "subsequent sexual intercourse between the parties, or the assumption of the rights, duties, and obligations of husband and wife, from which such intercourse may be implied." In a note he refers to section 55 of the California Code, and to the dissenting opinion of Judge MILLS of the Kentucky court of appeals, in Dumarsely v. Fishly, 3 A. K. Marsh. 377. That was an action of slander, in which the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was his wife. The court held that the position that consummation, in addition to present consent, was necessary to constitute a valid marriage in fact, was "neither founded on reason, nor supported by authority." Citing 1 Ruth. Inst. 345; Co. Lit. 34; 1 Bl. Comm. 433. The dissenting judge thought that a marriage, not solemnized according to statutory formalities, "should require consummation evidenced by cohabitation." If the learned author intended to say that the California Code had adopted the rule thought by Judge MILLS to be the proper one, then the Code simply requires that the consent shall be followed by cohabitation from which sexual intercourse may be inferred. It is only by the inference to be drawn from cohabitation, as husband and wife cohabit, that such intercourse is ordinarily proved. In his dissenting opinion Judge MILLS nowhere suggests that a public recognition of the marriage relation is necessary; and the language of Mr. Stewart, read in the light of his note, intimates that the consummation is the important matter; that the consummation may be inferred from the mutual assumption of marital rights and duties, and that such assumption may be proved under our Code by evidence of cohabitation.

Cohabitation may be lawful or illicit. It is lawful if preceded by consent, by words in the present, however such consent may be proved. When cohabitation follows consent, it is evidence that the parties have mutually assumed marital rights and duties, as it is evidence that the marriage has been completed by consummation. The rights and duties of married persons are manifold. Except as to property rights, the Code does not pretend to enumerate them, except by saying that the parties contract "towards each other obligations of mutual respect, fidelity, and support." Civil Code, § 155. The common-law decisions do not define them, save in general terms. Nor does the Code provide that consent shall not constitute marriage unless followed by a full enjoyment and complete performance of all the rights and duties appertaining to marriage. Whatever else the section may mean, it does not mean that present consent, followed by consummation and cohabitation, and by other acts tending and sufficient to show that the parties have mutually assumed conjugal rights and duties, shall be held no marriage, at the instance of one who may have become dissatisfied with the relation, in case it is shown that either party has not actually discharged all the duties which an exalted view of the subject may induce one to believe to be incidents of marriage.

The court below found as facts that, during a certain period after the consent to marry, "the plaintiff and defendant lived and cohabited in the way usual with married people, * * * and mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations." If, as we have said, they might mutually assume marital rights and duties, although their relation was kept secret, the insertion of the words "towards each other" does not vitiate the finding, and the finding of facts is conclusive on this appeal. Moreover, marital rights and duties are correlative. There can be no rights without corresponding duties. The rights of the wife are to those things which she may claim of the husband, and vice versa. The claim to some of her rights may be waived temporarily, and when waived there is no corresponding duty to be done while the claim is in abeyance. To make public the marriage relation, notwithstanding a mutual assent to privacy, may be conceded to be a duty, when the claim to publicity is asserted; but it is not an absolute duty to be performed while the mutual consent to privacy continues.

Our conclusion is that the provision of the Code requiring a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties to follow consent does not make it indispensable to the validity of the marriage that the relation between the parties shall be made public. The section of the Code does not purport to require it. The policy of the common law does not demand it, and the policy of the common law has not been changed by statutory enactment. It would be giving the words of the statute a meaning which does not accord with just and established rules of interpretation to hold that these parties, who, as found by the superior court, mutually consented to become husband and wife, thereafter cohabited in the manner usual with married people, and mutually assumed towards each other marital rights and duties, were not married. We cannot so construe the Code to meet the supposed exigencies of the particular case.

On the sixteenth of February, 1885, the following order was entered in the cause: "It is hereby ordered that the defendant pay to the plaintiff, or her order, on or before the ninth day of March, 1885, the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars as alimony herein, and the further sum of twenty-five hundred dollars on or before the eighth day of April, 1885, and the same amount on or before the eighth day of each and every month thereafter, as alimony until the further order of this court. It is further ordered that the defendant pay as counsel fees herein, on or before the ninth day of March, 1885, the sum of fifty-five thousand dollars, that is to say—twenty thousand dollars to Messrs. Tyler & Tyler, or order; ten thousand dollars to George Flournoy, or order; ten thousand dollars to Walter Levy, or order; ten thousand dollars to David S. Terry, or order, and five thousand dollars to R. P. Clement, or order; and in case any of such payments are not made on or before the time herein fixed, then the party or the parties entitled thereto shall have execution therefor, pursuant to section 1007 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California."

The court has held the foregoing order to be appealable.¹ The order, so far as it relates to counsel fees, is, in effect, a judgment that the defendant in this action pay to Messrs. Tyler & Tyler, and to the other counsel named, respectively, the several sums mentioned,—aggregating fifty-five thousand dollars,—and that Messrs. Tyler & Tyler, and each of the others, shall have execution for the sum directed to be paid to them or him. Section 137 of the Civil Code provides, “While an action for divorce is pending the court may in its discretion require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself or her children, or to prosecute or defend the action.” There can be no doubt the order must require the alimony to be paid to the wife, and it seems equally plain it was intended that the money ordered to be paid, as necessary to prosecute or defend the action, should be ordered paid to her. Section 137 regulates the matter in this state, and that section contemplates an order to pay to the wife. It would seem that where the statutes are silent on the subject, temporary alimony and suit money can be awarded to the wife. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 396. But when awarded, either by statute or upon general principles, “suit money” is awarded to her; and by section 137 counsel fees, if ordered to be paid, are ordered as part of her necessary expenses for prosecuting or defending the action for divorce. There is a great deal of American authority that the wife’s legal agent cannot recover compensation of the husband, in a distinct action, for his services rendered her in a suit for divorce. Cases cited to section 391, 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. He certainly cannot recover a judgment for such services, past and contemplated, upon a motion in the suit for divorce. The order here was a direct judgment for money in favor of persons not parties to the suit, and to that extent was irregular and void. Moreover, it would seem to be an undeserved reflection upon the administration of justice in the superior courts to hold that at least six lawyers were “necessary” to present the merits of plaintiff’s cause. The wife cannot, as of course, employ as many attorneys as she chooses and compel the husband to furnish funds for whatever she is to pay them. The rule was laid down in Massachusetts to be that the sum required to be paid by him is not to exceed what, under all the circumstances, may be reasonable for the compensation of counsel and the payment of other charges, without regard to what might properly be demanded as between counsel and client by the counsel actually employed. Baldwin v. Baldwin, 6 Gray, 341.

In Williams v. Williams, where it would seem several members of the bar were employed, the supreme court of Wisconsin said: “There can be no doubt whatever that any one of the attorneys for plaintiff, without any severe strain upon his professional ability, would have prosecuted this action to the same result.” 29 Wis. 528. Making every allowance for the suggested difficulties in the prosecution of the case at bar and the labors of counsel,—the full extent of which does not, perhaps, appear on this appeal,—we can conceive of no case of the character of the present which can require as necessary the array of counsel who appeared for the plaintiff herein. Of course, the “necessity” must be gauged by the services rendered in a cause such as are strictly those of attorney and counselor. Independently of the fact that the order was irregular in that it provided for a recovery and collection by those not parties to the action, we are of the opinion the amount was too large, and beyond the legal discretion to be exercised by the court. This action was commenced November 1, 1883. On the twenty-third day of October, 1883, George W. Tyler, member of the firm of Tyler & Tyler, to whom a fee was allowed by the order above recited, entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff herein in words and figures following:

“This agreement, made and entered into this twenty-fourth day of October, 1883, by and between Mrs. William Sharon, formerly Sarah Althea Hill, of the city and county of San Francisco, party of the first part, and George W. Tyler of the same place, party of the second part, witnesseth, that whereas, about three years ago the party of the first part entered into a contract of marriage with one William Sharon, as provided by the Civil Code of California, no ceremony having been performed, and whereas, said William Sharon is now disposed to repudiate said marriage and deny its binding force and efficacy, and whereas, said party of the first part has employed said party of the second part to commence and prosecute to final hearing, or settlement, all such suit or suits as may be necessary to vindicate the good name of the party of the first part, and secure to her a division of the common property of herself and her husband, or a just and suitable provision for her support out of his property, and to defend all such suits as may be brought against her by said Sharon: Now, therefore, it is mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto as follows: The party of the second part, as the attorney of the party of the first part, is to commence and prosecute to final determination, and defend, all such suits as may be brought, or may be necessary or proper for the complete vindication of the name of the party of the first part, and the enforcement of her rights as against said William Sharon, and is to advance the money to pay the costs and all ordinary expenses of any litigation that may ensue in carrying out the objects of this agreement; and as compensation he is to receive one-half of all sums realized or secured to her by such litigation. The party of the second part agrees that he will not settle with said Sharon, or dismiss or compromise any suit or suits that may be brought, without the consent of the party of the first part obtained, and of her agent, W. M. Neilson. The party of the second part agrees to pay one-third of the amount necessary to secure the legal services of D. M. Delmas, or some other person she may desire, as counsel on such litigation, provided his services can be secured for the sum of $1,000. The party of the first part agrees to pay the party of the second part one-half of all money or property secured from said William Sharon by settlement, promise, or litigation, and said party of the first part agrees not to settle or compromise with said Sharon without the consent of the party of the second part.

"This agreement is executed in duplicate.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written. Executed in duplicate.

"October 24, 1883.

GEO. W. TYLER.

"S. A. HILL.

"Witness: F. A. RODNEY."

On the hearing of the motion for alimony and counsel fees no fact was presented to the court below tending to prove either the incapacity of Mr. Tyler, or any indisposition on his part fully to discharge all the obligations assumed by him under his agreement, or that he had in any way failed to perform them. On the contrary, there was evidence that up to that time he had done, with the assistance of others, all he had agreed to do. If he had not, that, perhaps, would have been sufficient reason for not allowing him $20,000 or any other sum. It is not necessary to decide whether, as between the parties, the written agreement is valid and enforceable; and, for obvious reasons, we express no opinion as to its validity. In Reynolds v. Reynolds, 67 Cal. 177, 7 Pac. Rep. 480, this court declined to decide the effect on an order for counsel fees "of an agreement between plaintiff and her attorney that the latter have, as compensation for his services, a share of the property ultimately recovered." Conceding that the agreement cannot be enforced, in case, as the final result of the litigation, the plaintiff shall realize a share or portion of the community property, the agreement was a fact which should have influenced the action of the court below. If it had appeared at the hearing of the motion that Mr. Tyler, actuated solely by a desire to vindicate justice and the good name of the plaintiff, had promised to prosecute the action without compensation, that he was fully competent, and had prosecuted it, the circumstances would show that she had no necessity for money to pay counsel. The question is not whether, as between the parties, counsel ought to be paid, but whether the wife has need of money to prosecute her action. We can neither assume that plaintiff will, nor that she will not, perform her promise to Mr. Tyler if the event contemplated shall occur. Counsel learned in the law must be supposed to have considered and determined to their own satisfaction whether a contingent arrangement of the character mentioned could be enforced, and to have relied upon the contract, or upon the honor of their client to fulfill her promise when she should be in a position to do so. They ought not now to be permitted to say for her, or for themselves, that they are entitled to compensation from another source. If counsel had abandoned her cause, it might perhaps have been necessary for the court to provide the plaintiff means for securing legal assistance. We think the order directing the defendant to pay $55,000 counsel fees should be reversed.

In what we shall say with respect to the remaining question—whether the court below erred in directing the payment to the plaintiff of certain sums as alimony pendente lite—we shall confine ourselves to the points made by counsel for appellants. In a suit for divorce, when the marriage is denied by the defendant's answer, three things must be made to appear on application for temporary alimony: the marriage,—by satisfactory evidence showing, at least prima facie, a marriage in fact; the needs of the party applying for the order; and the "faculties" or ability of the husband to furnish the support ordered. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 386, 402. Evidence of these things has been called "auxiliary proofs;" it is evidence subsidiary to and in support of the order. The making of the order implies a finding of the marriage as to, and for the purposes of, the order. But it does not determine the issue made by the pleadings, so as, in any degree, to affect the final judgment. It has been said that it is not necessary to prove the marriage as fully, or the faculties as exactly, on a preliminary application for a temporary allowance, as to sustain a final decree. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 386; Brinkley v. Brinkley, 50 N. Y. 184. And it is distinctly to be understood that, in affirming an order for temporary alimony, the court expresses no opinion upon the merits of the main controversy, or as to what should be its final determination. Brinkley v. Brinkley, supra.

It is claimed by appellant that, as the main purpose of the action was to obtain a decree declaring the validity of the alleged marriage, and the principal issue was marriage or no marriage, the plaintiff should not have been allowed a support for the time occupied in contesting that issue; and the order was on its face unauthorized, or at least excessive. But the suit was not brought merely to secure a decree declaring the validity of the marriage. The complaint contains all the averments necessary to a complaint in a suit for divorce, including allegations of causes for a divorce, and it prays for a decree of divorce. In every action for divorce, the marriage must be averred by the plaintiff; and if it be denied by the answer of the defendant, it must be proved. The only fact alleged in the complaint, in addition to the marriage and causes for divorce, is that the defendant had refused to recognize the marriage. But, in his answer, the defendant denies the marriage. In this state of the pleadings, the allegation that, prior to the commencement of the action, the defendant had denied or refused to recognize the marriage, did not make it necessary for the plaintiff to introduce other or different evidence than such as would have been necessary if the allegation as to his previous denial of the marriage had not been inserted. The application for alimony should be treated, therefore, as made in an action for divorce, the marriage being denied by the answer.

It is said by counsel for appellant that, in this case, the court is called on to determine whether "the opinion, judgment, and findings" are sufficient to justify the conclusion of the court below that the marriage relation existed at the commencement of the action, and thereupon to make the order for temporary alimony. The order was made February 16, 1885, and the findings and judgment were subsequently filed and entered. The opinion referred to was filed December 24, 1884. It was filed after the trial of the action; refers to and discusses portions of the evidence given at the trial; discusses questions of law arising thereon, and foreshadows the findings to be afterwards filed. It is now before us only because incorporated in an affidavit of the defendant, used on the hearing of the motion for alimony and suit money. It is urged that the opinion clearly shows that, in the mind of the judge below, it was sufficient, to constitute an unsolemnized marriage, for the parties to enter into a secret marriage contract, secretly to indulge in sexual intercourse, etc.; that the court below erred in this view, and, therefore, there was no marriage, and the order for alimony should be reversed. What has been said with reference to the appeal from the judgment is, in our view, a sufficient response to this point.

It is further urged that the order should not have been made, or at least that the amount allowed is excessive, because, in his opinion, the judge below declared that the plaintiff, as a witness, had sworn falsely to various matters, and that she had produced, and attempted to introduce in evidence, fabricated and forged documents. If she attempted to support her cause by forged papers, or by her own perjury, her conduct was evidence tending to prove an admission of the falsity or fraudulent character of her claim. And if, as a witness, she willfully swore falsely with respect to any material matter, her whole testimony was to be distrusted, and it was in the power of the court below to reject all of it. But the evidence given at the trial is not before us, and we cannot say how far the testimony of the plaintiff was corroborated as to such of her statements, if any, as were accepted as true by the court below; nor can we, in the absence of the evidence given at the trial, say but that, as to the material issues, the evidence may have been sufficient to sustain the conclusion reached by the judge in his opinion, even after rejecting all the testimony of the plaintiff, and giving due weight to the discredit cast upon her claim by her resort to fraud in maintaining it.

We cannot say, as the case comes to us, the court should have allowed nothing as alimony. Nevertheless, the evidence before the court below, when the order for alimony was made, shows that the fact of marriage was warmly contested, and that the alleged marriage was not made public. As appears from the opinion, the plaintiff had testified that when "the contract" was signed the defendant had agreed to let her have $500 a month, for her expenses. His payments to her always aggregated at least $500; but, "in many instances," the sums given during a month were largely in excess of $500. Conceding that, for the purposes of the order, the implied finding of the marriage should be held conclusive on this appeal, the actual conditions should have been considered in fixing the amount of the temporary allowance. The order for temporary alimony always precedes the final judgment. After the decree for divorce is granted for the offense of the husband, the court may compel the husband to make a suitable allowance to the wife for her support during her life, etc. Civil Code, § 139. And if a dissolution of the marriage be decreed, on the ground of the adultery or extreme cruelty of the husband, the community property may be assigned to the parties in such proportions as the court may deem proper. Civil Code, § 146. The order for permanent alimony may provide for the payment of the allowance from the appearance of the defendant in the action, or from its commencement. Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 402. Temporary alimony, should, of course, under all ordinary circumstances, be less than permanent alimony. It is not given as the ultimate award of justice, but as a needful step in the course of ascertaining what justice demands. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 458.

No uniform rule can be laid down with respect to the amount to be allowed for support pendente lite. The husband's income is but one of the elements entering into the inquiry. Mr. Bishop says a common rule of the English ecclesiastical courts is, "subject to variations," to allow for temporary alimony about one-fifth of the joint income, though the proportion will vary according to circumstances,—sometimes as little as one-eighth being given,—and that the English practice has been generally followed in this country. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 455, 457, 460. An examination of the cases in which such general statements are made shows that they were cases in which the marriage was not disputed. On the other hand, in New York, even where the marriage is admitted, a wife proceeding against the husband is, according to some of the judicial decisions there, allowed, in general, no more than will meet her actual wants; the object of the rule being to discourage vexatious suits, and other like abuses, and to prevent indiscreet friends from fomenting family quarrels. Mr. Bishop says of the New York practice: "A yet stronger claim to favor is its admirable equity, when, with it, another rule sometimes resorted to in this state is permitted to operate; namely, to let the permanent alimony commence from the date of the suit, deducting from it the temporary alimony already paid." 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 461. As we have seen, in California, the decree for permanent alimony may provide for its payment from a date anterior to the order. But, without adopting the New York rule in its strictness, it seems very clear that the amount of temporary alimony named in the order appealed from is excessive. Where the income of the husband is very large, and the parties have publicly lived together in a style conformable to such income, a just allowance would seem to be one sufficient to enable the wife to continue the enjoyment of many luxuries which habit has made apparent necessities; this, however, subject to the limitation that, while her suit is pending, she is to live in the discreet and quiet manner appropriate to one whose domestic relations are being made the subject of public investigation; and without expenditures for mere display, or the gratification of personal vanity.

In the case now here, the plaintiff never enjoyed a portion of the defendant's income accordant with the position of his recognized wife. Assuming every fact in her favor, she was, at the commencement of their relations, willing that the marriage should be kept secret for a definite time, and, during that period, to live in comparative obscurity, upon an allowance of $500 a month. That largesum (however small a portion of the defendant's actual income) was amply sufficient for her comfortable support, and to supply her with many of the appliances of wealth. An order providing for the continuance during the pendency of the action of the sum that the defendant had agreed to pay her during their cohabitation, and until their marriage should be made public, would surely have provided for her reasonable, not to say liberal, support; whatever was more than reasonable was excessive. The discretion of the court below is a legal discretion to be reasonably exercised. "Abuse of discretion" in making such orders does not necessarily imply a wilful abuse, or intentional wrong. In a legal sense, discretion is abused whenever, in its exercise, a court exceeds the bounds of reason, all the circumstances before it being considered. An application for temporary alimony may be made at any time, at least after answer. The fact that, in this case, the application was made so late, does not alter the principle on which it is to be determined. Ordinarily, when the application is heard, the ultimate decree cannot be anticipated,—the plaintiff may fail to establish any cause of action. When the marriage is denied, although the marriage may be shown prima facie on the hearing of the motion, it is unreasonable to allow the wife, for her support pendente lite, not only more than is necessary to supply her actual wants, but more than the defendant agreed to pay her until the marriage should be openly acknowledged; that sum being fully sufficient to secure every comfort and many of the luxuries of life.

The judgment appealed from (entered on the nineteenth day of February, A. D. 1885) is affirmed. The judgment or order appealed from, (made and entered the sixteenth day of February, 1885,) directing the payment of alimony to the plaintiff, and the payment of counsel fees, is modified by striking out therefrom the words "the sum of $7,500 as alimony herein, and the further sum of $2,500, on or before the eighth day of April, 1885," and inserting in the stead and place of those words "the sum of $1,500, as alimony herein, and the further sum of $500, on or before the eighth day of April, 1885." And the judgment or order appealed from (so as aforesaid made and entered on the sixteenth day of February, 1885) is further modified by striking out therefrom the portion thereof which reads: "It is further ordered that the defendant pay as counsel fees herein, on or before the ninth day of March, 1885, the sum of fifty-five thousand dollars; that is to say: Twenty thousand dollars to Messrs. Tyler & Tyler, or order; $10,000 to George Flournoy, or order; $10,000 to Walter Levy, or order; $10,000 to David S. Terry, or order, and $5,000 to R. P. Clement, or order; and in case any of such payments are not made on or before the time herein fixed, then the party or parties entitled thereto shall have execution therefor, pursuant to section 1007 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California;" and the portion of said order of February 16, 1885, so as aforesaid providing for the payment of counsel fees, is hereby reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.; PATERSON, J.

TEMPLE, J., (concurring.) I have concurred in the prevailing opinion, and I add: The main question is a pure question of law. Do these facts constitute marriage? Persons capable of marriage consented to present marriage. Thereafter they cohabited in the way usual with married persons, for more than one year, during which time they mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations. The cohabitation and the supposed marriage was, however, kept a secret, pursuant to an agreement in writing made at the time of the mutual consent to present marriage. But for the secrecy there would be no doubt as to the validity of the marriage. Does that render the marriage void? This depends entirely upon our statute. Section 55, Civil Code, is as follows: "Sec. 55. Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage. It must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." It is claimed that the words, "the mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations" implies the public assumption of the relation. Such is certainly not the natural and obvious meaning of the language. That would naturally, and in the absence of any preconceived idea upon the subject, be held to mean only that the parties must not only agree to present marriage, but must by some act or deed take upon themselves the duties and rights of the relation. The language is exactly adapted to express the necessity of actually taking upon themselves contract obligations. However it may be looked upon from other points of view, in law marriage is regarded simply as a relation arising from civil contract. It is so declared in this very section. Perhaps we should be able to appreciate the force of the language better if we substitute for marriage some other well-known contract relation. For instance, "Partnership is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute partnership; it must be followed by a mutual assumption of partnership rights, duties, or obligations." Had there been a section of the Code to this effect, would any one doubt its meaning? It would mean simply that an agreement to be partners was not sufficient to constitute partnership until it was followed by the actual commencement of partnership business. It seems to me this illustration shows that the language of the section is exactly adapted to the purpose intended, and that, as I have said, it is only when read with the preconceived idea that it ought to mean something else that it seems to be inexact or ambiguous. And it may be added that, in the case supposed, there would be nothing inconsistent with the assumption of partnership rights, duties, or obligations, inter sese, if the relation were kept secret or even denied. A secret partner assumes the duties and obligations of the relation. The only trouble is in the matter of proof. There is no necessary relation between the assumption of contract rights and duties and publicity.

This construction will be understood when we remember there were two species of marriage at common law, by mere act of the parties, per verba de presenti merely, or per verba de futuro cum copula, and there were those who contended that marriage per verba de presenti must also be cum copula subsequente. The legislature plainly intended to adopt the view that the agreement to present marriage must be followed by consummation, which, however, might consist of any conduct which would show that the parties had actually entered upon the married state. This is made still more obvious by section 57, Civil Code. The word "consummation" was avoided in section 55, because it has come to be a euphemism for the more indelicate word "copula," and thereby has acquired a more narrow meaning than was intended. Therefore the phrase which only indicates the assumption of the contract relation was used. But in section 57 the word "consummation" is substituted for the phrase. It cannot mislead here, for it has been defined; but it shows that the mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations is of the nature of consummation,—something in the nature of part performance of the consent to present marriage; though that is not limited to the copula.

"Sec. 57. Consent and consummation may be manifested in any form, and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases." Subsequent consummation, as well as consent, may be manifested in any form. What can this mean except exactly what I have claimed for it? And if in any form, why not by secret cohabitation, where the husband claims the right, believing himself a husband, and the wife submits because she believes herself a wife? It is contended that the use of the word manifested in this section indicates that it must be made known—that it cannot be secret. But this is a total misapprehension of the office of the section. It is simply and only to provide a mode of proving a private marriage, and the word "manifested" has reference to proof. To illustrate: Suppose in this case the plaintiff had testified in her own behalf in general words, "Defendant and myself each agreed to present marriage, and we subsequently consummated it." It would then be natural to ask, "You say the defendant consented to marriage with you; how did he manifest that consent? what did he say?" etc. This shows what to my mind is the plain, obvious, and only meaning of the word in this section. It means manifested for the purposes of proof, whenever the fact may come in issue. A private marriage must still be capable of proof, otherwise it is practically no marriage. In fact, the provisions of our statute with reference to solemnization are mainly, if not entirely, to provide means of proof, and not for the purpose of publicity. If it had been intended to require publicity, the addition of one word would have removed all doubt. On the contrary, the language is exactly adapted to express the mere assumption of contract obligations. It seems to me it is rather late in the Christian era to claim that a secret marriage, or a contemporaneous agreement to keep the marriage secret, is opposed to good morals or public policy, in any sense which will render the marriage, otherwise contracted according to the law of the land, void. By the Justinian Code, in the sixth century, it was expressly provided that the mere consent of the parties should be sufficient to constitute marriage, except as to persons of rank. Such marriages have been held valid throughout Christendom ever since, with some few exceptions, made by positive law, within the past two centuries. It goes without saying that there have always been secret marriages. They have always been condemned by the church and by the courts; and yet they have always been held legal. It is, I think, safe to say that there is not a case in any country in Christendom in which a marriage has been held void merely because it was kept a secret, or because of a contemporaneous agreement of secrecy; and no law writer has ever suggested this as a possible cause of invalidity.

Our ancestors seem to have realized the strength of the passion they were attempting to regulate. They knew there would always be irregular unions, and they evidently thought it in the interest of good morals and good public policy to bring as many of these relations as possible within the regulative force of law, and the courts have always inclined to the validity of marriages in favor of the legitimacy of offspring. A secret marriage is not necessarily clandestine or irregular. The most regular marriage, and one duly solemnized, may be secret. Under our statute, consent and consummation are in all respects the equivalent of solemnization. The law requires a solemnized marriage to be recorded, but if not recorded, and if in fact kept secret, no one would doubt its validity. The issue of the license does not prove a marriage; and, of course, cannot give it publicity. Many licenses issue where no marriage follows. Repute—the holding out to the world—living in the face of their neighbors as husband and wife—is evidence of marriage without proof of solemnization. It appears to me that much confusion arises right here. It is tacitly, perhaps unconsciously, assumed that the marriage thus proved is marriage by mere consent; and then the proposition is reversed, and it is claimed that marriage by consent and consummation can be proved only by repute,—that it is not marriage unless followed by publicity. This idea, although not expressed, is, I think, implicit in all the arguments in favor of the necessity of publicity. But, in the first place, the marriage presumed from repute may as well be one by solemnization as by the mere act of the parties. In the next place, our statute makes a marriage by consent, with consummation, the equivalent in all respects with marriage by solemnization. And finally, this view is expressly and ex industria negated by our statute, which provides that consent and consummation may be manifested in any form. It need not be by repute, nor by the copula, nor by support and cohabitation, nor by the recognition of children as legitimate; but it may be by any of these modes, or by any other act in addition to mere consent, which manifests an actual entering upon the relation. And I think it will be found that all the cases which seem to insist upon some degree of publicity are cases of presumed marriages, without direct proof. It is admitted that to establish marriage in that mode, publicity, to some extent, is required. But the exigency of appellant's argument is a case where an actual marriage being proven, it was held invalid because kept secret.

But we are not without authority upon the effect of secrecy, the marriage being otherwise valid. Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 4 Eng. Ecc. R. 485, was decided by Lord Stowell, perhaps the very highest authority upon questions of this character. The case arose under the Scotch law, which is, on this point, exactly the law of California; that is, consent and consummation were sufficient without solemnization. The parties so married; but, at the time of the consent, the wife also stipulated in writing to keep the marriage secret. The marriage was in fact kept secret for nearly four years, when the husband married again. The second marriage was held void. Lord Stowell remarks as to the agreement of secrecy: "An engagement of secrecy is perfectly consistent with the most valid, and even with the most regular, marriages. It frequently exists even in them from prudential reasons; from the same motive it almost always does in private or clandestine marriages. It is only an evidence against the existence of a marriage when no such prudential reasons can be assigned for it, and where everything, arising from the very nature of the marriage, calls for its publication." This last suggestion, it seems to me, contains all there is in the matter of secrecy. It is merely an important fact in the proof of the marriage. This case strikingly illustrates this: The plaintiff, by this agreement, certainly placed herself in a most trying situation. Had the secret cohabitation been discovered, her mouth would have been hermetically sealed for at least twelve calendar months to any explanation of the most compromising circumstance. She might have become a mother, and have been for the same period unable to deny the bastardy of her child, and her own disgrace. And had either event happened, her silence would have rendered it extremely difficult ever after to establish her wifehood. These undeniable difficulties in her case seem not only to create a prejudice against the case, but against the law under which the validity of the marriage is claimed, and have constituted, in my opinion, no small part of the force of appellant's argument here. These facts were entitled to great weight in the court below, and no doubt received due consideration, and yet the plaintiff was found to be his very wife. The evidence is not before us; only the facts as found constituting consent and consummation. We can imagine that one might make even this tremendous sacrifice to compass a desirable marriage, and that she might confide in her husband to protect her reputation. At any rate, it is not for us, on this appeal, to estimate probabilities, but to pronounce the judgment of the law upon admitted facts.

THORNTON, J., (dissenting.) Appeal from the judgment declaring a marriage and for a divorce.

I dissent. Let it be admitted that marriage at common law might be consummated by words of present contract, or per verba in futuro cum copula, still the validity of a marriage in this state, since the Code went into effect, must be determined by the provisions of the Civil Code. This Code has ample provisions on the subject of marriage; and it is declared in section 4 that it "establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." It is further declared in the same section that "the rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code." The clause last quoted immediately precedes the one first quoted. Derogation is defined by Webster to be "the act of annulling or breaking a law or some part of it. More generally, the act of taking away or destroying the value or effect of anything, or of limiting its extent, or of restraining its operation; as, an act of parliament is passed in derogation of the king's prerogative; we cannot do anything in derogation of the moral law." Whatever meaning we may attribute to the word "derogation" in the first clause of the section referred to, so far as the Code annuls or changes the common law, its provisions must be not strictly, but liberally construed to effect its objects and to promote justice. The object of a law is the end or purpose for which it was enacted. Such end or purpose must be deduced from the words employed in the statute; and when such end or purpose can be deduced from the law, its provisions are to be liberally construed, to effect such end or purpose. We do not understand by this language that words are to be construed so as to give them a strained meaning, — a meaning which the words, on a reasonable interpretation, cannot bear; in fact, the language of the fourth section is controlled by the thirteenth section of the Code, which declares that "words and phrases are construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language; and in the case of technical words and phrases, or such others as may have acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law, or the meaning defined by statute, they are to be construed according to such peculiar and appropriate meaning or definition."

The fifty-fifth section of the Civil Code defines marriage and what shall constitute it. In the first clause of the section marriage is defined thus: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary." As to what shall constitute the relation of marriage, these words are used: "Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." The words "marital rights, duties, or obligations" have some meaning. We cannot presume that such words were idly used by the law-making power, or that they used unmeaning words. We must first find that they are meaningless, before we can reject them as entitled to no weight in arriving at the meaning of the statute. Whatever the meaning of these words, it is something additional to the consent spoken of in the first clause of the section. If anything is added, the rule of the common law is changed, and a new rule is established. At the common law there could be no valid marriage without consent. In the case where the nuptial contract is made by present words, the consent was manifested by express words; in the case of a union where there was not this express consent, the consent to marry was deduced from circumstances, either from cohabitation or from cohabitation and the various acts accompanying the marriage state, which may be designated as its res gestæ or indicia. We think that the above rule can be positively declared to exist as a part of the common law, viz., that there can be no valid marriage at common law without consent to marry. The consent between the contracting parties constituted the marriage. Whether there was such consent, when the marriage is denied, and becomes a subject of judicial investigation between the parties to a cause, must be established by proof. In the one case, it is shown by express declaration or unequivocal acts; in the other, it has to be implied or deduced from circumstances. When such consent was found to exist, the marriage was held to have been constituted.

Now, if anything is added, by the section referred to, to consent, the common law is changed. How far changed we do not say here. It may not be necessary to say how far these words change the rule of the common law, to define, point out, and limit the extent of the change made. It is the better course to leave each case as it arises to be determined on the peculiar facts or circumstances presented by it. "Consummating marriage" and "consummation of marriage" are mentioned in the sections immediately following the section first quoted; the first form of words is employed in the fifty-sixth, and the latter form in the fifty-seventh, section. Conceding that at common law a marriage was consummated by sexual intercourse, we cannot understand these words as having that meaning in the fifty-sixth and fifty-seventh sections. The consummation referred to in them is, we think, the assumption by each of the contracting parties, following consent, of the marital rights, duties, or obligations. The declaration in the fifty-fifth section, that consent alone will not constitute marriage, but it must be followed where there is no solemnization by a mutual assumption of the marital rights, duties, or obligations, is, in effect, declaring the consummation referred to must be the mutual assumption of the marital rights, duties, or obligations. Sexual intercourse may be an element in such assumption, but it is not all of it. In our judgment, in a case of consent to marry, followed by sexual intercourse merely, without living together, the mutual assumption required by law is not indicated. If consent and sexual intercourse, alone, constituted marriage, then a single act of such intercourse, immediately after which the parties separated, each party going his own way, and never meeting the other again, would be such an assumption as the law required. We cannot think that such is or can be the meaning of the law in this state, as declared in the fifty-fifth section of the Civil Code.

After a careful consideration of the findings in this case, we discern that the following facts are found: That the parties had the residence in the city and county of San Francisco required by law, prior to the action herein; that on the twenty-fifth of August, 1880, they consented in writing, actually signed by them, to intermarry; that afterwards, sometime in September, 1880, they commenced living and cohabiting together, in the way usual with married people, although their cohabitation was kept secret, and so continued for the space of more than one year, and down to the twenty-fifth day of November, 1881, and that during all of said time the parties mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations; that during all of the same time plaintiff and defendant so lived together, defendant visited her relations with her, escorted her to places of amusement, and introduced her to respectable families and members of his own family, and wrote to her several letters, while absent from her, in which he addressed her as "My dear wife;" that the marriage was never solemnized, and the consent in writing to intermarry was not a declaration made in compliance with section 75 of the Civil Code of this state; that defendant, on or about December 6, 1881, drove plaintiff from her apartments in his hotel, in which she had resided by his directions since September, 1880, and which was the residence selected for her by defendant, refused to longer live with her, or provide for her support, and has not since then lived with, or sought to live with her, or requested the plaintiff to return or live with him, or provided in any manner for her support; that plaintiff's real name is Sarah Althea Sharon, and that she has not falsely or fraudulently assumed it; that defendant never introduced plaintiff as his wife, or spoke of her as such in the presence of other persons; that plaintiff never introduced defendant as her husband, nor spoke to him or of him to other persons in his presence, as her husband; that the parties were never reputed among their mutual friends to be husband and wife, nor was there at any time any mutual, open recognition of such relationship by the parties, nor any public assumption by the parties of the relation of husband and wife. The written consent to marry, above referred to, contains an agreement by plaintiff not to make known the contents of such writing, or its existence, for two years, unless the defendant himself shall see fit to make it known.

It will be observed that the veil of secrecy covers all the acts of the parties which pertained to the alleged marriage. Their entire intercourse is hidden and concealed, except when they visited together or attended places of amusement. They lived together secretly. Such we understand to be the meaning of the finding, that their cohabitation was kept secret; inasmuch as living together and cohabitation mean the same thing. By no act of the parties were marital relations indicated to other persons; not even to their mutual friends and associates. They never addressed each other as husband or wife in the presence of any person, never spoke of each other as husband or wife to any person, nor was this relation known or indicated by any act to any person whatever. The lives of the parties were, during every moment of the period referred to in the findings, an assertion that the relation of husband and wife did not exist between them. It is not even found, and, therefore, does not appear, that defendant supported plaintiff. The finding on this point is that defendant, some time in 1881, drove plaintiff from her apartments in his hotel, in which she had resided by his directions since September, 1880, and which was the residence selected for her by the defendant, and refused to longer live with her, or provide for her support. The finding that he supported her prior to this time, can only be implied from the words "refused to longer live with her, or provide for her support." Such a finding as this is not sufficient. The fact of support prior to the time when he drove her from her apartments in his hotel must not be left to implication. The fact of previous support must be distinctly found, or it cannot be held and acted upon here as a fact which existed. See Brickhead v. Brown, 5 Hill, 634; and Broom, Leg. Max. on the rule De non apparentibus et de non existentibus eadem est ratio. It is not even found that the parties had a common home. The statement in the finding is that defendant drove plaintiff, not from the common apartments of both parties, but from her apartments. It does not appear that plaintiff ever at any time addressed defendant as her husband, or assumed his name during the period of such cohabitation mentioned in the findings. Under the rule for construing findings of fact, we must hold that facts not found never existed. If she had a right to be called by the name of the plaintiff, she never assumed or claimed that right during the period commencing with the twenty-fifth of August, 1880, and ending with the sixth of December, 1881. In fact, it does not appear when she assumed the name of plaintiff, or claimed a right to be called by his name. She not only did not assume or claim this right, but her conduct was such as to amount to a non-claim of any such right. She was never known or called by the name of plaintiff, during the period of time to which the findings refer; and, though it is found that defendant, during the time that he and plaintiff "so lived together," wrote her several letters in which he addressed her as "My dear wife," it does not appear that she ever addressed defendant as her husband, either orally or in writing.

We cannot understand that a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations can be otherwise than open to view, at least open to the view of the mutual friends and associates of the parties. We do not mean by this that such assumption must be carefully and studiously made public; but persons must manifest such assumption by that open, visible, and undisguised living together, such as is usually practiced by persons holding towards each other the relation of husband and wife. When the statute enacts that the subsequent consummation of marriage may be manifested in any form, (section 57, Civil Code,) its meaning is that it must be done in a form which manifests or shows such consummation, that is, manifests the assumptions of marital rights, duties, and obligations; that the conduct of the parties and their intercourse with each other must be of a character which shows that they have mutually assumed the rights and duties of husband and wife. The general finding that during all of said time the plaintiff and defendant mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations, amounts to nothing when it is also found that plaintiff never was known as, or called by the name of, her husband; that defendant never introduced plaintiff as his wife, nor spoke of her as such in the presence of other persons; that plaintiff never introduced defendant as her husband, nor spoke to him nor of him as her husband, in the presence of other persons, or in his presence; that the parties never were reputed among their mutual friends to be husband and wife; nor was there at any time any mutual, open recognition of the relation of husband and wife by the parties; that their whole intercourse with each other was kept hidden from the view of every one; that defendant never supported plaintiff, nor contributed any further to her support than to furnish her apartments in his hotel, in which she resided; that she never assumed or claimed the right to assume his name. Of such circumstances, though defendant did write plaintiff letters during the period mentioned above, in which he addressed her as "My dear wife," it cannot be held as matter of law that there was ever a mutual assumption by the parties of marital rights, duties, or obligations. It follows from the above that marriage was never consummated by the parties in this cause, and that plaintiff and defendant were never, according to the laws of this state, married, or sustained toward each other the relation of husband and wife.

We are of opinion that the judgment in favor of plaintiff, adjudging a marriage and for divorce, should be reversed, and judgment ordered for defendant. As, in our opinion, there was no marriage, there can be no order for alimony and counsel fees. The judgment or order for alimony and counsel fees should therefore be reversed.

I concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.

McFARLAND, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. The complaint avers a marriage between plaintiff and defendant, and various acts of defendant constituting causes of divorce. The answer denies the marriage. It was admitted that if there was a marriage, a divorce should follow; so that the real contest in the case was as to the existence of the marriage. The court below made and filed its findings; adjudged that the parties were husband and wife; and decreed a divorce, with one-half of the common property, etc. From the judgment defendant appealed. (Since the trial in the lower court, the defendant died, and his executor has been substituted as appellant.) With the sufficiency of the evidence in the case to justify the decision of the court below we have nothing to do on this appeal. The full "findings of fact" (so-called) of the court are as follows:

"First. That for more than six months prior to the commencement of this suit the plaintiff and defendant were residents of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California.

"Second. That on the twenty-fifth day of August, A. D. 1880, the plaintiff and defendant each signed a certain declaration of marriage in the words and figures following, to-wit:

"In the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, on the twenty-fifth day of August, A. D. 1880, I, Sarah Althea Hill, of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, age twenty-seven years, do here, in the presence of Almighty God, take Senator William Sharon, of the state of Nevada, to be my lawful and wedded husband, and do here acknowledge and declare myself to be the wife of Senator William Sharon, of the state of Nevada.

SARAH ALTHEA HILL.

"AUGUST 25, 1880, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

"I agree not to make known the contents of this paper or its existence, for two years, unless Mr. Sharon himself see fit to make it known.

"S. A. HILL.

"In the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, on the twenty-fifth day of August, A. D. 1880, I, William Sharon, of the state of Nevada, aged sixty years, do here, in the presence of Almighty God, take Sarah Althea Hill, of the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., to be my lawful and wedded wife, do here acknowledge myself to be the husband of Sarah Althea Hill.

"August 25, 1880.

WILLIAM SHARON, Nevada.'

—Which was the only written declaration, contract, or agreement of marriage ever entered into between said parties, and, at the time of signing said declaration, plaintiff and defendant mutually agreed to take each other, as, and henceforth to be to each other, husband and wife.

"Third. That afterwards, and about the —— day of September, 1880, the plaintiff and defendant commenced living and cohabiting together, in the way usual with married people, although their cohabitation was kept secret, and so continued for the space of more than one year, and down to the twenty-fifth day of November, 1881, and during all of said time the plaintiff and defendant mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations.

"Fourth. That during all the time plaintiff and defendant so lived together, defendant visited her relations with her, escorted her to places of amusement, and introduced her to respectable families, and to members of his own family, and wrote to her several letters while absent from her, in which he addressed her as 'My dear wife.'

"Fifth. From the foregoing facts the court finds that plaintiff and defendant intermarried in August, 1880, and that the allegations of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the complaint as to the fact of marriage are true, except in so far as the declaration therein referred to is alleged to be in compliance with section 75 of the Civil Code of this state.

"Sixth. That defendant, on or about December 6, 1881, drove plaintiff from her apartments in his hotel, where she had resided, by his directions, since September, 1880, and which was the residence selected for her by the defendant, refused to longer live with her or provide for her support, and has not since then lived with, or sought to live with her, or provide for her support, and has not since sought to live with her, or requested the plaintiff to return or live with him, or provided in any manner for her support.

"Seventh. That no proof was offered of either charge of adultery in the complaint, the same being, on the trial, deemed withdrawn by mutual consent.

"Eighth. That it is not true as stated in the answer of defendant that plaintiff has either falsely or fraudulently assumed the name of Sarah Althea Sharon, but on the contrary, that it is her real name; nor is it true that she, or any one, forged the document mentioned in the complaint, and heretofore set out; on the contrary, the said document is genuine and was signed by the plaintiff and defendant at the time it purports to have been signed.

"Ninth. That defendant never introduced plaintiff as his wife, nor spoke of her as such in the presence of other persons; that plaintiff never introduced defendant as her husband, nor spoke to nor of him to other persons as her husband; that the parties were never reputed among their mutual friends to be husband and wife, nor was there at any time any mutual, open recognition of such relationship by the parties, nor any public assumption by the parties of the relation of husband and wife."

It will be observed at once that in these findings there is a confused intermingling of matters of fact and matters of law; that many of them include statements which are either clear conclusions of law, or else certain general inferences and deductions which are difficult of assignment to the category of either law or fact; and that, to a great extent, they are inconsistent with each other. For instance, what is the meaning of that part of the third finding, which says that the parties lived together "in the way usual with married people," when read in the light of the ninth finding? The court below can hardly be understood as intending to say that the way of life of these parties, as described in the ninth finding, was "the way usual with married people." And, if it is to be so understood, is the finding to be taken as one of fact, or one of law? Must a conclusion or opinion about a general custom of the country be received as a specific finding of fact? Is the statement in the third finding, that plaintiff and defendant "assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations," to be taken as conclusive, if the facts specifically found show the contrary?

It is not difficult, however, to see in these findings what actual facts are found, and what are not found; and to segregate those parts which are merely indefinite generalities, containing conclusions, opinions, and inferences, but not facts. And the case must be decided by the application of the law to the actual facts which appear upon the face of the findings. These facts are briefly as follows: The parties had the required residence where the suit was brought. On the twenty-fifth day of August, 1880, they executed the written instrument set forth in the second finding. For more than a year from that date they had secret sexual intercourse. During that time plaintiff, by defendant's directions, occupied apartments in defendant's hotel. During that time also, defendant visited plaintiff's relations with her, escorted her to places of amusement, and introduced her to respectable families, and to members of his own family,—all the time introducing her as a single, unmarried woman. (The italicized part of the last sentence is clearly found; because, while the fourth finding states that he did introduce her, etc., the ninth finding specifically states that he never introduced her as his wife, or spoke of her as such.) Defendant also, during this time, wrote to plaintiff "several letters," in which he addressed her as "My dear wife." It does not appear affirmatively that he furnished her money or other support than the apartments in the hotel in which she resided. She never, during this time, took or was known by his name. About December 8, 1881, he "drove plaintiff from her apartments in his hotel." It does not appear that at that time she asserted her claim as wife. And during all this time it appears, as stated in the ninth finding, "that defendant never introduced plaintiff as his wife, nor spoke of her as such in the presence of other persons; that plaintiff never introduced defendant as her husband, nor spoke to nor of him to other persons, in his presence, as her husband; that the parties were never reputed among their mutual friends to be husband and wife, nor was there at any time any mutual, open recognition of such relationship by the parties, nor any public assumption by the parties of the relation of husband and wife." During the period mentioned, their whole lives, conduct, and deportment constituted, except secretly between themselves, a direct and continued repudiation and disavowal of the marital relation. It does not appear if any person ever imputed to either of them that relation, (indeed, it does not appear that their marriage was ever suspected;) but if such imputation was ever made, it must, of course, have been met with a denial. The court below came to the conclusion that these facts constituted a valid marriage, under the laws of this state; and the question to be determined is, was that conclusion right or not?

We are aided but little, in determining this question, by inquiring what the law of England was upon the subject fifty or a hundred years ago. Jurisprudence here is not called upon to stand with drawn sword among the broken arches and prostrate columns of old common law, and defend them from fancied attacks of the legislature. There is no rule here that statutes derogatory of the common law are to be strictly construed. The Code itself prescribes the rule upon the subject in the following language: "The rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates; and its provisions are to be liberally construed to effect its objects and to promote justice." Civil Code, § 5. And the Code treats of marriage fully and in great detail, and "establishes the law" upon that subject. But, as counsel have discussed with great learning and ability the requisites of a valid common-law marriage, we may say, in passing by the subject, that it is by no means clear that at any time, in England, a present contract, followed by nothing more than secret sexual intercourse, constituted a perfect marriage at common law. There are innumerable authorities upon the subject, and they greatly conflict. In some cases the law is strained in favor of the legitimacy of children, and of persons criminally charged. But in cases, like the one at bar, of direct attempts to establish marriage, the weight of authorities seems to be against the position taken by respondent. Whoever shall closely study the arguments and authorities presented in the elaborate report of the celebrated case of Queen v. Millis, 10 Clark & F. 534, will see most cogent reasons for agreeing with the unanimous conclusion to which the judges came in that case. And that conclusion was to this effect: That with respect to the requisites of a valid marriage, the common law followed the ecclesiastical law; not the general canon law of Europe, but the "king's ecclesiastical law," as established and administered in England; that whatever the latter provided the former required; and that at no time did the ecclesiastical law hold a marriage valid unless performed in the presence of an ordained minister. Lord Chief Justice TINDAL, in delivering the opinion, says: "And with respect to the decisions of the courts of law, and the other common-law authorities, if no case can be referred to, directly and distinctly laying it down as law, in so many words, that a contract per verba de presenti, alone, and without the intervention of a minister in orders, is not sufficient to create a valid and complete marriage, yet such conclusion is necessary from many of the decided cases, and is inconsistent with none; nor in fact could the difficulty to be determined in any of the cases ever have existed, except upon the supposition that some religious ceremony was necessary to the contract; thus leading to the conclusion above laid down that, by the law of England, the contract per verba de presenti alone did not constitute a full and complete marriage."

There are numerous authorities to the same effect; although there are others which hold, or seem to hold, differently. But Queen v. Millis presents the fullest discussion of the question which we have been able to find. It is said that the common law looked upon marriage as a civil, rather than as a religious, institution. That may be true; but, as it always followed the ecclesiastical law, and as the latter always required a celebration in the face of the church, thus, as a matter of fact, the common law always did employ a machinery which worked the publicity of marriages. Whether, if the ecclesiastical rule had not been adopted, some other method of publicity would have grown up with the common law, cannot be known, but may be presumed. And it is rare, indeed, to find a case at common law where any respectable court has held a marriage entirely secret to be valid. In Queen v. Millis, the attorney general and the solicitor general were contending for the validity of the marriage there in question, where the ceremony was performed by a Presbyterian preacher, and not by a minister of the Established Church; and in nearly every authority cited by them there had been an agreement of marriage before witnesses, and generally some form of religious ceremony. And it must be remembered that the "clandestine marriage" referred to in the authorities was by no means a secret marriage; it was a marriage entered into before witnesses, usually with an irregular ceremony,—without the publication of banns, and lacking other requisites of the ecclesiastical law. Even the Fleet and Gretna Green marriages were not secret.

But, if it were admitted that the common law was what the counsel for respondent claim it to have been, what consequences important in the decision of the case at bar would flow from such admission? Take for instance the doctrine of the case of Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, so much relied on by respondent, 4 Eng. Ecc. R. 485,—which case, however, was held in Queen v. Millis to be only declaratory of the loose Scotch law of marriage, and to be incorrect so far as it undertook to state the law of England. The doctrine of the Dalrymple Case is that present mutual consent to be married does, of itself, at common law, constitute marriage, whether followed by any other act or not. Now, of what value is such an authority here, even if it be taken as a correct statement of the common law, in face of an express provision (as we shall see) of the statute law of California that "consent alone will not constitute marriage."

Let us see, then, what the law of marriage in this state is. It may be first remarked, however, that under all the authorities, and from the very nature of the relation, marriage is something more than a contract; it is a civil condition. Bishop defines it as "the civil status of one man and one woman united in law for life for the discharge to each other, and the community, of the duties legally incumbent on those whose association is founded on the distinction of sex." 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 3. Husband and wife owe a duty to society, as well as to each other. Except as to property, they cannot, either before or after marriage, settle or merge or modify their rights or obligations. Neither can end the relation by notice; and a disregard of marriage obligations by one does not give a right of action for damages for breach of contract to the other. Their rights and obligations come, not from any contract between themselves, but from the law. They are changed by a change of the law, or by a change of residence to a place where the law is different. The divorce laws which happened to exist at the time the relation is entered into do not form "part of the contract." If the legislature should at its next session repeal all laws granting divorces, such repeal would not affect the legal status of married people in the least. They may be said to enter into the marriage condition by contract; but after that the contract vanishes.

Now, marriage is defined in section 55 of the Civil Code of this state; and by that section, and not by the Scotch or the Irish law, or the canon law of Europe, or the common law of England, (whatever it may be,) must the question here presented be determined. That section is as follows: "Sec. 55. Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." Here, then, it is clearly, and beyond all controversy, "provided, deliberately and expressly, that consent alone is not sufficient. The whole doctrine of a contract per verba de presenti or per verba de futuro cum copula being a sufficient marriage is obliterated. In order to "constitute marriage," not as evidence merely, but as an essential part of the thing itself, the consent must be followed either by solemnization, or by the "assumption" of the marriage relation. And, as in the case at bar, there was no solemnization, the only question is: Was there an "assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations" within the meaning of the language of the Code? The words of the language to be construed do not appear to have any well-defined "technical" meaning. Neither have they "peculiar" meaning in law. They do not occur in the statute law of any other state or country—at least we have not been referred to any which contain them. They are therefore to be construed as stated in section 13, Civil Code, "according to the context and the approved use of language." Now, we venture to say that neither in the works of any standard author, nor in the common speech of intelligent people, can any instance be found where the word "assumption" or "assume" has been used in any sense consistent with, or in any sense other than repugnant to, the idea of concealment, denial, or repudiation. A man may assume to be that which he is not; but how can he, with any "approved use of language," be said to assume to be that which he denies himself to be? The etymological meaning of assume is to "take on." Among the definitions given by Webster are "to pretend to possess," "to take in appearance;" and as synonyms, "arrogate," "usurp." Stormonth also gives the definition "to pretend to possess;" and as synonyms, "affect," "pretend," "presume." Now, could any of these meanings be rightfully applied to relations of men and women who sedulously, and ex industria, and in accordance with a prior contract, conceal those relations, and, if charged with holding them, deny and repudiate their existence? Moreover, in order to assume the marriage relation there must be an assumption of that which is peculiar to that relation—that which distinguishes it from all other relations. But mere secret sexual intercourse is not peculiar to marriage, and does not distinguish it from illicit sexual commerce. To call a horse "an animal with four legs," is to give no definition of a horse; and so, to describe marriage, or the assumption of its rights, duties, and obligations, merely as secret copulation, is to give no definition of marriage. How, therefore, can logic draw the conclusions that by the assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, the legislature meant only the secret act referred to?

Again, what plainer or more obvious construction can be put upon the language in question than to say that the legislature meant by it that kind of conduct which generally, and we might say, universally, characterizes married people who have assumed marital rights, duties, and obligations? The legislature must be presumed to have had that common knowledge which all people have of the familiar and habitual social customs of the country with respect to the marriage relation, and of the usual deportment of persons who have assumed that relation. Now, can it be pretended that married people usually (or at all) refuse to recognize each other as husband and wife, in the presence of others; that they never speak of each other as husband and wife; that they never so live together that their residence, however humble,—though it be but a room in a garret,—is the recognized home of a family with its usual relations and associations; that they so carefully guard their conduct that they are never reputed, or even suspected, among their acquaintances and friends to be husband and wife; that they never indulge in any deportment whatever that would intimate in the slightest way to any human being except themselves that they were married? It seems difficult for any human understanding, not too much swayed by artificial distinctions and attenuated niceties, to receive such conduct as an “assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations.” What marital rights has a woman “assumed” who could not even protect herself against apparent shame by asserting the honorable name of wife? What marital obligation of protection can a man fulfill towards a woman whose wifehood he publicly repudiates? And how can society enforce its rights in a relation of which it can have no knowledge, and of the existence of which it has no grounds of suspicion? And what of the children, if any, of such a marriage? Is there to be no one whom they can call “father” or “mother?” And what possible protection could there be against fraudulent pretenses of marriages—made, perhaps, for the first time after the deaths of alleged husbands or wives?

It is argued that but little meaning can be attached to the language of the Code because the word “open” is not used to qualify the word “assumption.” It is possible that to some mental visions the adjective referred to might have made the meaning more satisfactory; just as some minds, perhaps, could not entirely grasp the idea conveyed by the word “ball,” or “globe,” unless it were accompanied by the word “round.” But in either case, the use of the adjective would be wholly superfluous—ferens ligna in sylva. When people assume the marital relation, the assumption becomes necessarily open. There is no need to have it proclaimed by the town crier, or placarded on the walls of the court-house. If they assume the marital relation, and do not deny it, no matter how quietly and modestly they may conduct themselves, and no matter how small may be their circle of friends, or how humble their surroundings, the fact of the marriage will inevitably disclose itself.

Some confusion is sought to be thrown into the problem by the endeavor to give a peculiar and limited meaning to the word “consummation,” as used in section 57 of the Code. That section is as follows: “Consent to, and subsequent consummation of, marriage, may be manifested in any form, and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases.” And it is argued that “consummation” means simply sexual intercourse; and that, therefore, sexual intercourse, following consent, is all that the Code requires to constitute a valid marriage. No doubt, in some of the cases which hold that a contract per verba de presenti, or per verba de futuro cum subsequente copula, constitutes a marriage, the copula is sometimes spoken of as the consummation. But the essential meaning of consummation is “the act of carrying to the utmost extent or degree; completion; termination; close; perfection.” Webster. And its particular meaning when used in connection with other language must be gathered from the context. Now, section 57 almost immediately follows section 55; and both sections are about the same subject; and as section 55 provides what must follow consent in order to make the marriage valid,—in order to give it “completion” and “perfection,”—no reasonable construction can be given to the two sections together other than that “consummation” in the latter refers to the “completion,” the “perfection” provided in the former,—that is, the “assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations;” so that the meaning of these words last quoted is the sole question in this case, no matter from what direction we approach it.

It is impossible, within reasonable limits, to notice the various points made by counsel in the able and learned arguments, both oral and written, which they have presented to the court. For instance, it is argued very forcibly that secret marriages, or secret attempts at marriages, are against the policy of the law; and that, therefore, the very contract relied on in this case as constituting the marriage is itself absolutely void, because it enjoins secrecy. Section 75 of the Code provides that persons married without solemnization "must jointly make a declaration of marriage;" and section 77 provides that "declarations of marriage must be acknowledged and recorded in like manner as grants of real property." It is true that a previous section of the same article provides that "non-compliance with its provisions does not invalidate any lawful marriage;" but, considering all the sections together, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the policy and intent of the Code, with respect to unsolemnized marriages, is that they must either be made matters of record, or that they must be accompanied by such circumstances—such acts and conduct of the parties—as will approximate that publicity of which a record notice is the most complete evidence; and that, therefore, a contract to enter upon the marriage relation which provides for secrecy is void; for, if the relation between these parties was marriage, then all marriages may be of that character; and society might be undermined everywhere with such secret relations without there being one recognized wife or family home in all the land. And it must be remembered that the legislature adopted the Code with the knowledge that this court, in Graham v. Bennet, 2 Cal. 506, speaking of marriage, used this language: "If it takes place between parties able to contract, an open avowal of the intention, and an assumption of the relative duties which it imposes on each other, is sufficient to render it valid and binding." But, while we are strongly of the impression that the contract relied on in this case is void on account of its clause of secrecy, we are not called upon to hold that if, notwithstanding said agreement for secrecy, the parties had assumed the marital relation in the way hereinbefore indicated, there still would have been no marriage.

My conclusion is that the facts found in this case did not, under the law of this state, constitute marriage; and that the judgment should be reversed, with directions to the superior court to enter judgment for defendant. With respect to the appeal from the orders allowing alimony and counsel fees, as, in my opinion, there was no marriage, of course, in my judgment, those orders should be reversed.

HYDE v. REDDING. (No. 12,245.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 17, 1888.)

1. QUIETING TITLE—RIGHT TO MAINTAIN ACTION—AGAINST ACTUAL ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, provides that "an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him." Held, that under this section an action to quiet title can be maintained, though defendant is in the actual adverse possession of the premises in controversy.

2. SAME—JURISDICTION.

And the superior courts of California, as courts of equity, have jurisdiction of such actions, even though plaintiff's title is a legal title, on which he could recover at law in "ejectment."

3. SAME—LACHES.

Plaintiff on the twenty-second of May, 1872, became the owner by assignment of a certificate of purchase issued by the state to one G., November 21, 1872, judgments were entered by the district court foreclosing and annulling the interest of G. in said certificate of purchase; and March 15, 1883, certificates of purchase of the same land were issued to the assignors of defendant, and they received patents, February 20, 1884. Plaintiff brought suit December 26, 1883, for possession and to quiet title, alleging invalidity of the judgments of the district court aforesaid. Held that, if the issue presented was one to be tried in a court of law, the question of laches could not arise, as defendant must rely upon the statute of limitations; and if the action be treated merely as a bill in equity to quiet title, only nine months having elapsed after the issue of the certificates of purchase to defendant's assignors, and the patents not having been granted until after the commencement of the action, there was no such laches as to deprive plaintiff of his right to sue.

4. SAME—PLEADING.

A bill to quiet title alleged generally the invalidity of the judgments which constituted the source of defendant's title, but did not aver the specific facts showing such invalidity. Held that, in the absence of a demurrer to the complaint, such general allegations were sufficient.

5. JUDGMENTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where the affidavits of service in an action were wholly insufficient to authorize the court in entering judgment, and such defect appeared upon the face of the judgment roll, held, that the judgment could be collaterally attacked. People v. Greene, ante, 197, followed.¹

6. SAME—REGISTRY—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

And the filing of a copy of such judgment with the state register, as provided by the act of 1868, § 66, (St. Cal. 527,) was not conclusive evidence of its own validity so as to put a party claiming under it in the attitude of an innocent purchaser for value, under the registry laws.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. B. CANFIELD, Judge.

Joseph B. Redding and Crittenden Thornton, for appellant. C. A. Stoke, S. W. Benton, and Sawyer & Burnett, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Santa Barbara, and from an order denying a new trial. The action was brought to determine the adverse claims of the defendant to certain lands and premises situated in the said county. The plaintiff claims under two certificates of purchase from the state of California, for the land in controversy, made and issued to one W. E. Greene on the sixteenth of November, 1868, and by mesne assignments from said Greene to himself. The defendant claims under two certificates of purchase made and issued to M. Wolf and George Lee, respectively, which, as alleged, became vested through certain mesne assignments in the defendant. The particular adverse claim made by the defendant is (as stated in the complaint) under a judgment given and made by the district court of the First judicial district of the state of California in and for the county of Santa Barbara, in a certain action brought by the people of the state of California against W. E. Greene and others. This judgment is alleged to have been rendered without jurisdiction. It may be inferred from the language of the complaint that the judgment was one purporting to foreclose and annul the interest of Greene in the certificates of purchase above mentioned. The further allegation is made that the claim of the defendant is without right, and that the defendants have not any right, title, estate, or interest in the premises; that the certificates of purchase issued to Wolf and Lee, and by them assigned to the defendant, were unlawfully and improvidently issued, and constitute a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, etc. Prayed that the defendants may set forth the nature of their several claims, that the same may be determined; that the said judgment and certificates of purchase hereinabove referred to may be decreed null and void; and that the defendant may be forever debarred from asserting any claim whatsoever in or to said lands and premises; and for general relief. The answer of the defendant appealing contained—First, a general denial; second, a plea of two judgments, such as mentioned and referred to in the complaint, as a bar to the plaintiff's action; third, a plea setting forth the rendition of the said judgments on November 21, 1872, and a plea of laches committed and permitted by the plaintiff in neglecting to allege or assert any rights therein until the filing of the complaint herein, (which was on December 26, 1883;) fourth, an allegation that the defendant is the owner in use of the premises in controversy, under patents issued by the state of California, subsequent to the commencement of the action.

Upon these pleadings a trial was had. At the trial the defendant admitted that W. E. Greene made application to the state to purchase the lands in the complaint mentioned, and made the first payment required by law to be made, to-wit, 20 per cent. of the purchase money, and one year's interest, and no more, and received certificates of purchase thereof. It was further admitted that the consideration for the assignment of each of the certificates mentioned was the sum of five dollars. Upon these admissions the plaintiff rested. Thereupon the defendant, to maintain the issues upon his part, introduced and offered in evidence the judgment rolls in the cases of People, etc., v. W. E. Greene et al. These judgment rolls are set forth at full length in the transcript. The judgments purport to foreclose the rights of defendants in those actions, and to annul the certificates of purchase under which such defendants claim. The defendant further proved that copies of both of the judgments mentioned were filed in the office of the register of the state land-office prior to the purchase of the land by Wolf and Lee, the defendant's assignors; that by certain probate proceedings in the estate of B. B. Redding, deceased, and assignments, all the estate of said Redding (claimed to be derived to him from Wolf and Lee) had become vested in the defendant; that the said defendant had made valuable improvements upon the premises to the amount and value of $1,000; that he had paid taxes to the extent of $100; that the defendant and his predecessors in interest had been in possession, and had paid all taxes levied upon said premises; and that the amount of the purchase money and interest paid to acquire the land from the state was the sum of $1,550. The court found according to the admissions of the parties, and in accordance with the allegations of the complainant. The superior court held, in terms, that the judgment alleged by the plaintiff to be void, and by the defendant to be valid, was void and of no effect.

1. It is contended by appellant that the action cannot be maintained, because, when it was commenced, the defendant was in the actual adverse possession of the premises in controversy; that the plaintiff's title, if any he has, is a legal title, on which he can recover at law in "ejectment;" and that the legislature has no power to deprive a party of his trial by jury, in cases where a jury trial was a right at the common law, by attempting to give the superior court, as a court of equity, jurisdiction of matter of purely legal cognizance.

But the superior court has jurisdiction to enforce a legal title to land, and the legislature may provide the mode in which the jurisdiction may be employed. If, in an action brought under section 738, Code Civil Proc., the plaintiff avers a legal title against a defendant in possession, the latter is perhaps entitled, under the constitution, to a trial by jury of the issue at law thus presented. But section 738 provides that the issue (which might have been the subject upon action of ejectment) may be tried in a proceeding begun under that section. That issue determined, the court—by virtue of the authority conferred by section 738—may, in the same action, proceed to determine the adverse claims set up by the defendant, and to decree that they be quieted. If the plaintiff shall prove a right to the possession by virtue of his legal title, the further rights of the parties are to be adjudicated as if the plaintiff had been in possession at the commencement of the action. The appellant here cannot be heard to complain that the legal issue, as distinguished from the equitable issues, was not tried by jury, since a trial by jury was expressly waived by a stipulation of the parties. Transc. 22.

The foregoing accords with what is said in People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551-563, 5 Pac. Rep. 263, and 6 Pac. Rep. 481: "It may be said that if it appear the grantees or their assigns could not, under the acts of the legislature, acquire an equity which a court of equity can enforce, the present suit should be dismissed, because the plaintiffs had a perfect remedy at law. Under our system a defendant in an action at law to recover lands, against whom judgment has passed, cannot subsequently, in a distinct suit, assert a legal right which existed when the ejectment was commenced, nor subsequently claim relief based upon an equity which was pleaded by cross-complaint in the ejectment. So far the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in the action of ejectment, is conclusive of the defendant's rights. But a decree in a suit under section 738, Code Civil Proc., that the defendant has no right, title, or interest in certain lands, would seem to be more effective, as a final adjudication with respect to the rights of the parties, than would be a mere judgment for the recovery of the possession. The latter, to some extent, leaves open to be proved, by evidence dehors the record, what rights might have been asserted in the action of ejectment. In an action under section 738, Code Civil Proc., it is not necessary to allege in the complaint the nature of the estate or interest claimed by the defendant. Crook v. Forsyth, 30 Cal. 662. Until the answer comes in, it need not appear that the issues to be tried will be legal, as distinguished from equitable issues. A proceeding by which one may compel another to expose and have adjusted the nature of the interest on which he is asserting an adverse claim against the estate of the former, is one to be conducted in a court of equity. The discovery of the nature of the adverse claim precedes its adjudication. It may be added that, strictly speaking, we have no separate courts of law and equity. Within the limits of the constitution, the legislature may provide the mode by which, in particular cases, the jurisdiction of the superior court shall be employed; may, among other things, prescribe the form of judgment to be entered. Section 738, Code Civil Proc., allows an action to be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest adverse to him. Its language is very broad. If the plaintiff is out and the defendant is in possession, nevertheless the action can be maintained; so, if the plaintiff and the defendant each claims to be the owner in fee. In the last case the question who has the better right may be tried in the action in the form usually called (for want of a better name) 'ejectment,' but it may also be tried in an action under section 738 of the Code. Whether, when brought under the Code, the action be called an action at law, in which the statute authorizes a judgment determining the estate or interest claimed by the defendant, or be called a suit in equity to quiet the plaintiff's title against the adverse claim, the superior court has jurisdiction. If it be considered an action at law, the defendant may demand a jury; but here, as we have seen, a jury was waived. In the case at bar, the defendants, appealing, averred in their answer that they were in possession of the lands when the action was commenced. The court did not find upon that averment, and defendants do not complain of the omission. But the omission is immaterial, because the action is maintainable whether they were or were not in possession."

2. What has been said is to some extent an answer to the claim of appellant that the plaintiff was guilty of such laches as should have barred his right; that, as the plaintiff sues in equity, a delay of 11 years after the entry of the judgments in People v. Greene shows such lack of diligence as should preclude him from demanding equitable relief. But, if the issue first presented is one to be tried in a court of law, the question of laches does not arise. As to that issue, the defendant must rely upon the statute of limitations; and here the statute of limitations was not pleaded, nor was an adverse possession for the statutory time proved. As to the defendant's alleged adverse claim, if plaintiff's legal right to the possession was established, the defendant's adverse claim was, as we have seen, to be tried as if the plaintiff had been in actual possession at the beginning of the action. And where a plaintiff has been in possession of land he cannot be guilty of laches in the bringing of a suit to remove a cloud, at any time before an action has been brought to disturb his possession, or to deprive him of any enjoyment of his right. Liebrand v. Otto, 56 Cal. 248. The continued assertion of the adverse claim constitutes from day to day a new cause of action. The plaintiff became the owner, by assignment, of the certificate of purchase issued to W. E. Greene on the twenty-second day of May, 1872. The judgments in the actions of People v. Greene et al. were entered November 21, 1872. Certificates of purchase were issued to Wolf and Lee—from whom defendant derails—on the fifteenth day of March, 1883, and, as appears from the supplemental complaint, they received patents February 20, 1884. It does not appear that Wolf or Lee ever had possession of the land, nor does it appear when B. B. Redding took possession of it, or when he or the appellant improved it. Was the plaintiff guilty of such laches, even if this action be treated merely as a bill in equity to quiet title or to remove a cloud, as deprived him of the right to seek equitable relief? He waited 11 years after the judgments in People v. Greene, but only nine months elapsed after the certificate of purchase issued to Wolf and Lee. The Wolf and Lee certificates would not have constituted a cloud as against the prior certificate issued to Greene; the patent to Wolf and Lee did not issue until after the commencement of this action. As we shall see, the judgments in People v. Greene are void on their face, and therefore constitute no cloud. Even then, if the action be treated simply as one to remove a cloud, there was no laches such as deprived the plaintiff of his right to sue.

3. It is also contended by appellant that the complaint is insufficient as a bill to remove a cloud upon title, because it does not aver the specific facts showing that the district court had no jurisdiction to enter the judgments in People v. Greene. In support of this view, Stokes v. Geddes, 46 Cal. 17, is referred to by counsel for appellant. In Stokes v. Geddes there appears to have been no general allegation that the court had no power or jurisdiction to render the judgment, and no allegation of irregularity on the face of the proceedings. A demurrer was sustained to the complaint. In the case now here the complaint was not demurred to, and, in the absence of demurrer, we think the averments sufficient as to the invalidity of the judgments in People v. Greene.

4. Appellant claims, however, that the judgments in People v. Greene were regular and valid on the face of the rolls, and are not subject to collateral attack. Section 203 of the practice act provided that, in case the complaint was not answered, the judgment roll should consist of "the summons, with the affidavit or proof of service," and "the complaint," with the default memorandum indorsed thereon. In People v. Greene et al. the affidavits of service were wholly insufficient to authorize the district court to enter the judgments. People v. Greene, ante, 197, (filed December 23, 1887.)

5. Copies of the judgments in People v. Greene were filed with the register, but not, so far as appears, with the county recorder. It is insisted that the only purpose of the sixty-sixth section of the act of 1868, (St. 527,) requiring copies to be so filed, is to afford notice to subsequent purchasers from the state, and that defendant was not affected by the fact that there was no evidence of service in People v. Greene, because the absence of such evidence did not appear in the record,—the judgment roll. But, as we have seen, the non-service did appear in the judgment rolls. Section 66 of the act of 1868, however, only required certified copies of the decrees to be filed. But we are not authorized to assume that the only possible purpose of the requirement was to give notice to subsequent purchasers from the state, so that they are to be absolutely protected by it as conclusive evidence of its own validity. The decree is not a subsequent conveyance by the state, and there is no analogy between the position of appellant and that of a subsequent purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, under the registry laws. It is only when a "decree" shall have been "obtained" that the district attorney is to cause certified copies of such decree to be filed with the state register and county recorder, (St. 1868, p. 527, § 66;) and only after a "decree of the court," that the land is to be subject to entry and sale, (section 67.) The statute does not purport to deprive a prior purchaser of any rights he may have acquired, except by and through a valid decree.

Judgment and order affirmed.

SILVA v. HOLLAND et ux. (No. 12,150.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—ACTIONS AGAINST—JOINDER OF PARTIES.

In an action against a husband and wife to recover for work alleged to have been done for both, there was testimony that plaintiff had worked in and about a business which they conducted jointly, and that the property used therein was the wife's separate estate. Defendants admitted that plaintiff had not been paid for the work. Held, that the evidence tended to prove that defendants were liable jointly, and there was no misjoinder of parties.

2. NONSUIT—MOTION FOR—FAILURE TO SPECIFY GROUNDS.

At the close of the evidence for plaintiff, defendant moved for a nonsuit, without specifying grounds therefor. Held, that the motion was properly denied.

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In California, when the statement on motion for new trial specifies no particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient, the sufficiency of the evidence will not be reviewed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; T. B. MCFARLAND, Judge.

Action by August Silva against M. Holland and A. Holland, his wife, to recover for work done for both defendants. Defendants, in their answer, denied that they were liable jointly. Plaintiff recovered judgment. Defendants appeal, and contend on the appeal that the judgment was not warranted by the evidence. By Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 659, subc. 3, "when the notice of the motion [for new trial] designates as the ground of the motion the insufficiency of the evidence, * * * the statement shall specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient. * * * If no such specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded on the hearing of the motion."

Ed. Martin, for appellants. McKune & George, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to recover the value of work and labor alleged to have been performed by plaintiff for defendants, who are husband and wife. The answer denied all the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. Findings were waived by both parties, and judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for $374 and costs. The defendants moved for a new trial, and have appealed from the judgment, and order denying their motion.

The only point made for appellants relates to the alleged misjoinder of defendants. It is contended that it appeared from the evidence that the husband was alone responsible to the plaintiff, and that, there being no joint responsibility of defendants, the plaintiff should have been nonsuited on motion. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the record recites that: "Defendants here moved for a nonsuit, which, after argument, was denied by the court, and the defendants excepted." But the grounds of the motion were not stated; and for that reason, if for no other, the motion was properly denied. Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 608. If, however, the grounds of the motion had been stated, the ruling must have been the same. It was conceded by both defendants that plaintiff had performed labor for which he had not been paid, and the testimony introduced by him showed that he worked for the defendants in and about a business which they were jointly engaged in carrying on, and that the property used in that business was the separate property of the wife. In the absence of findings, it will be presumed that the court accepted this testimony as true.

The statement on motion for new trial contains no specification of errors, or of particulars wherein the evidence is claimed to be insufficient to justify the decision. The statement must therefore be disregarded. Section 659, Code Civil Proc.

Looking at the whole record, we see no merit in the appeal, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

KELLY v. CENTRAL PAC. R. CO. (No. 11,604.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—FRAUD IN OBTAINING CONTRACT—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSON.

Where plaintiff obtains by fraud from defendant a contract to convey land wherein another had acquired rights by performing labor and making improvements, the injury to the third person is sufficient to render the fraud a bar to an action for specific performance.

2. SAME—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.

Defendant, having large tracts of vacant land, issued a circular inviting settlement thereon, and stating that settlers who in good faith improved the land would generally be given the preference in purchasing. To obtain a contract for conveyance of part of the land, plaintiff falsely represented to defendant that he had settled thereon, thereby deceiving defendant, and inducing him to make the contract, which he would not have done but for the deception. Held, that plaintiff's fraud, without regard to damage resulting from it, was a bar to an action for specific performance.

3. PUBLIC LANDS—SETTLERS—NOTICE.

Plaintiff entered, for the purpose of settling, upon public land whereon another resided and had made improvements. The latter ordered him off. Held, that plaintiff had notice of the other's rights in the land.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYRES, Judge.

Action by Thomas Kelly against the Central Pacific Railroad Company for specific performance of a contract between them for the conveyance of land to plaintiff. George W. Cole intervened, and the court below entered a decree against plaintiff on the merits, and in it directed a conveyance of the land to Cole. Plaintiff appeals from the parts of the decree denying relief to him, and directing a conveyance to Cole.

Hart & White and John M. Fulweiler, for appellant. Hale & Craig, for respondent. C. A. & F. P. Tuttle, for intervenor, George W. Cole.

HAYNE, C. Action for specific performance of a contract to convey land. The Central Pacific Railroad Company, being the owner of large tracts of land acquired from the federal government, placed the disposition of the same in the hands of one of its officers, called its "Land Agent." The finding in this regard is that "said railroad company, for the purpose of disposing of its lands, established a land department, and appointed a land agent, who had power to issue and carry into effect the circulars hereinafter copied. Said land agent had full power to appoint subordinate agents, and to distribute to them the work of the land department." In the exercise of his functions, the land agent addressed a circular to the public, inviting settlement upon its vacant lands, and stating, among other things, that "settlers and actual occupants, who in good faith cultivate and improve lands belonging to either of the companies, will generally be given preference of purchase at the regular price."

It appears that, in the spring of 1881, one Menger, who was then in occupation of the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 7, in township 13, range 9 E., Mount Diablo base and meridian, and of an adjoining piece, received the above-mentioned circular and certain verbal assurances, and, after several months, sold and conveyed whatever rights he had to one Cole. Before making the purchase, Cole inquired of one Perkins, the deputy of the land agent, "whether, if he bought from Menger, he could get the title of the company" to the said S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and the other land which Menger occupied. And Perkins "then gave him one of said circulars, and informed him that, if he moved upon the land and improved it, he could safely buy of said Menger, and that the railroad company would give him the preference to buy the same at such price as it might fix; and said Cole made said purchase under said advice, and moved into said Menger's house immediately upon the purchase. * * * Said Cole moved upon said land, and continued to reside upon it and make improvements on it, relying upon said circulars and what was said to him by said Perkins; believing that he would have the prior right to purchase from said railroad company said land at a price which it might fix." In December, 1881, he filed his application to purchase with the land agent; but no immediate action appears to have been taken thereon.

During all this time, the plaintiff, Kelly, had brought himself within the terms offered by said circular as to certain adjoining land, but had never done so as to the land in controversy. It sufficiently appears, we think, that Kelly had notice of Cole's equities; for he resided in the vicinity, and it is found that on one occasion he undertook to make an entry upon Cole's possession, and commenced to erect "a small board house" upon the land in controversy, but Cole ordered him off, and he left and moved his house away. He therefore knew that Cole had a claim to the land, and by inquiry he could easily have learned the nature of such claim. Several weeks after this, Kelly filed with the land agent an application to purchase certain lands, including the tract in controversy, and represented to the land agent that he (Kelly) had settled upon the same. The land agent, believing these representations, entered into a contract with Kelly for the conveyance to him of this and other tracts, and received from him the first payment therefor. These representations of Kelly were entirely false. The finding in this regard is as follows: "Kelly's said representations made by himself and his witnesses to the land agent were untrue, and he at the time knew that they were untrue, and they deceived the land agent, and induced him to award to said Kelly said south half of the north-east quarter; and the land agent, but for such deception, would not have awarded said south half of the north-east quarter to said Kelly, but would have awarded it to said Cole." Upon becoming aware of the deception which had been practiced upon him, the land agent notified Kelly that he could not have the tract in controversy, and tendered him back the portion of his first payment which applied to that tract, but did not tender him back the money applying to the other lands mentioned in his contract. Kelly refused to receive the money, and brought this action to compel the conveyance to him of all the land mentioned in the contract. Cole intervened and prayed for the conveyance of the land in controversy to him. The court below decreed that the land be conveyed to Cole, and Kelly appeals. The evidence is not brought up; the appeal being from the judgment, and upon the judgment roll alone.

The point made on Kelly's appeal is that the false representation was not productive of injury to the railroad company; and the argument is that there was no injury, because, in the first place, it was under no obligation to convey to Cole,—the promise contained in the circular being merely that “preference will generally be given to settlers,” in which respect it differs from the promise contained in the circular considered in Boyd v. Brinckin, 55 Cal. 427,—and because, in the second place, the company was willing to convey, and will convey, the land to Cole for the same price that it agreed to convey it to Kelly, and hence could not be injured pecuniarily.

It is deserving of serious consideration whether, admitting that Boyd v. Brinckin can be distinguished as contended, there was not sufficient part performance of the oral promise to Cole to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and entitle him to a specific performance. But, waiving this, we think there are two answers to the argument for the appellant:

First. Assuming the correctness of appellant's major proposition, viz., that, in order to defeat a suit for specific performance on the ground of fraud, the fraud must be productive of injury, it is not necessary that the injury should result to the vendor; it is sufficient if it would result to third persons. It is upon this principle that the relief is refused where the thing to be done would operate as a fraud upon the public. Thus, a court will refuse to decree specific performance of an agreement to publish a book purporting to be written by one person, but in fact written by another. Post v. Marsh, 16 Ch. Div. 406. So upon the same principle the relief is refused, where the agreement was in fraud of the rights of creditors. St. John v. Benedict, 6 Johns. Ch. 117, Baldwin v. Campfield, 8 N. J. Eq. 600; Ryan v. Ryan, 97 Ill. 40; or in fraud of the rights of other parties, (Kitchen v. Coffyn, 4 Ind. 507.) So, it is refused where the act sought to be enforced would operate to the injury of interests in remainder, (Fry, Spec. Perf. *p. 141, § 304; Thomas v. Dering, 1 Keen, *747, *748;) or to a wife's right in a homestead, (Phillips v. Stauch, 20 Mich. 383;) or to subsequent purchasers from the same vendor, (Curran v. Holyoke, 116 Mass. 90; and see Pom. Spec. Perf. § 181.) The court will not make itself an instrument to carry out the fraud, whether the person to be injured be a party to the contract or not. It will not assist the plaintiff to get the benefit of the intervenor's labor and improvements upon the tract in controversy.

Second. But we do not think that in order to defeat a suit for the specific performance of a contract to convey land, upon the ground of fraud, the fraud must be productive of damage either to the vendor or to third persons. If the misrepresentation was intentional, and made for the purpose of deceiving the vendor, and the vendor relies upon it, and was deceived by it, and would not have entered into the contract but for the fact that he was so deceived, then we think a court of equity will not enforce the contract whether it be accompanied by damage or not. So far as this kind of suit is concerned, such a misrepresentation is material, although not accompanied by damage.

The counsel for the appellant cite, in this connection, the case of Morrison v. Lods, 39 Cal. 325, as affirming the contrary doctrine. The report of that case is somewhat obscure. It does not show what the representation was, nor whether it was intentionally false, or a mere innocent misrepresentation. But, if the court meant to decide that a court of equity will enforce a contract obtained solely through a false and fraudulent representation, then we think the decision is in violation of established principles. It is perfectly true, as stated in the opinion, that an action at law cannot be maintained for fraud unless accompanied by damage. It is also true, as stated in the opinion, that a court of equity will not set aside a contract obtained through fraud unless it be productive of injury. 1 Story, Eq. Jur., § 203. But it is not true that this applies to suits for specific performance. It is well settled that a court of equity may refuse specific performance of a contract which it would not set aside. Mortlock v. Buller, 10 Ves. *308; Cadman v. Horner, 18 Ves. 11;

Seymour v. Delancy, 6 Johns. Ch. 222; Jackson v. Ashton, 11 Pet. 248; Barksdale v. Payne, Riley, *178; Frisby v. Ballance, 4 Seam. 299; Clement v. Reid, 9 Smedes & M. 543; Taylor v. Merrill, 55 Ill. 61; Hil. Vend. 445; Fry, Spec. Perf. (Amer. Ed.) *p. 192, § 427.

Although the court will refuse to destroy the contract, it will not further in any way the fraudulent design. In such cases, by an application of the maxim that he who comes into equity must come with clean hands, the court is enabled to give greater effect to the principles of morality than can be done in ordinary cases. The leading text writers are agreed in this view. Chancellor Kent, after stating the general rule that fraud must be accompanied by damage, and that "there are many duties that belong to the class of imperfect obligations, which are binding in conscience, but which human laws do not and cannot undertake directly to enforce," goes on to say: "But, where the aid of a court of equity is sought to carry into execution such a contract, then the principles of ethics have a more extensive sway." 2 Comm. 490. This statement is adopted by Story. 1 Eq. Jur. § 206. So Kerr, in his work on Fraud and Mistake, says: "Where the aid of a court of equity is sought by way of specific performance of a contract, the principles of ethics have a more extensive sway than where a contract is sought to be rescinded. * * * Where a party calls for specific performance, he must, as to every part of the transaction, be free from every imputation of fraud or deceit," and "must show that his conduct has been clear, honorable, and fair." Kerr, Fraud & M. (Amer. Ed.) 357, 358. So Hovenden says: "Specific performance of an agreement is never compelled unless the case is clear of the imputation of any deception, the conduct of the party seeking it must be free from all blame." 2 Hov. Frauds, 4. See, also, Fry, Spec. Perf. (Amer. Ed.) *204. This rule is embodied in section 3391, Civil Code, which provides that "specific performance cannot be enforced against a party to a contract * * * (3) if his assent was obtained by the misrepresentation, concealment, circumvention, or unfair practices of any party to whom performance would become due," etc. And it is evident that such must be the rule. To say otherwise is to place suits for specific performance on the same level with actions at law, which is contrary to all the authorities. If, therefore, the case of Morrison v. Lods is to be construed as affirming any such doctrine, it does not state the law correctly. The case of Board, etc., v. Younger, 29 Cal. 172, was a suit to set aside a contract, and not for specific performance.

In the present case the false and fraudulent representation of plaintiff was the inducing cause of the contract. This is apparent from the fact that, as soon as the company discovered the fraud which had been practiced upon it, it repudiated the contract. And it is expressly found that "the land agent, but for such deception, would not have awarded said south half of north-east quarter to said Kelly, but would have awarded it to said Cole." This state of facts well illustrates the wisdom of the doctrine which does not insist upon measuring everything by the standard of damage, but, so far as can be done, allows parties to determine what is for their own interests, and to contract, or refuse to contract, accordingly. It is evident from the circulars contained in the record that it was the policy of the company to encourage the settlement of its vast tracts of unoccupied land. To carry out this policy, it offered special inducements to settlers. It ought to be allowed to fulfill its promises to those who have relied upon its good faith. It is not for one who falsely pretends to be entitled to the benefit of those promises to say that it is all the same to the company because he pays the same price as the other would. The case is one where the vendor has special motives for selling to one person at a price which it would not accept from another. See dictum of Lord ELDON in Bonnett v. Sadler, 14 Ves. 528.

It may be conceded in favor of appellant that the company did not take the proper course to rescind its contract with the plaintiff. Be that as it may, he cannot, for the reasons stated, have the aid of a court of equity to carry it out. His case against the company therefore fails. And, this being so, he cannot inquire into the correctness of the decree directing the company to convey to the intervenor; for, if he is not entitled to the specific thing, it is of no consequence to him what becomes of it, and he cannot concern himself with that question. We do not regard the case of Taylor v. Railroad Co., 67 Cal. 615, 8 Pac. Rep. 436, as conflicting in any degree with the above positions.

We therefore advise that upon the appeal of the plaintiff the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion in the appeal of the plaintiff the judgment is affirmed.

KELLY v. CENTRAL PAC. R. CO. (No. 11,258.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACT OBTAINED BY FRAUD—COSTS.

In an action for specific performance of a contract which plaintiff had obtained fraudulently, where a decree is entered against him on the merits, it is an abuse of the court's discretion as to costs to order defendant to pay them.¹

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYERS, Judge.

Action by Thomas Kelly against the Central Pacific Railroad Company to compel specific performance of a contract between them for the conveyance of land. A decree was entered against plaintiff on the merits, but the court ordered defendant to pay the costs, and defendant appeals from that order.

Hale & Craig, for appellant. Hart & White and J. M. Fulweiler, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. The facts of this case are stated in Kelly v. Railroad Co., ante, 386, (No. 11,604, just decided.) The court below refused to order specific performance in favor of the plaintiff, but ordered the land to be conveyed to the intervenor, and stated in its conclusions of law "that said railroad company pay all the costs of this action." Judgment was entered accordingly. The company appeals from so much of the judgment as relates to the costs.

We are inclined to think that a suit for specific performance "involves the title" to real estate, within the meaning of sections 1022, 1024, Code Civil Proc.; and that therefore, upon a judgment in its favor, the defendant was entitled to costs against the plaintiff as a matter of right. But assuming, in favor of the plaintiff, that this is not so, and that costs were in the discretion of the court, then we think there was an abuse of discretion. The plaintiff was denied a judgment because of his fraudulent misrepresentations. The defendant was free from all blame. What is there in this state of facts which entitled the plaintiff to costs? According to the practice of courts of equity, "where a specific performance is denied in consequence of any unfairness on the part of the plaintiff, costs seem to follow as of course." 2 Hov. Frauds, 24.

No argument is made by appellant as to the intervenor's costs, and for that reason we have not examined that branch of the question.

We therefore advise that that part of the judgment which relates to costs between the plaintiff and the defendant be reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for defendant against plaintiff for its costs of suit; the defendant to recover its costs of appeal from plaintiff.

¹ A bill to compel the specific performance of a contract is an application to the sound discretion of the court, and such performance will not be decreed when for any reason it would be inequitable. Williams v. Williams, (Wis.) 6 N. W. Rep. 814; Town v. Railway Co., (Wis.) 27 N. W. Rep. 169; Bird v. Logan, (Kan.) 10 Pac. Rep. 564; Kelly v. Kendall, (Ill.) 9 N. E. Rep. 261.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion that part of the judgment which relates to costs between the plaintiff and the defendant is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for defendant against plaintiff for its costs of suit; the defendant to recover its costs of appeal from plaintiff.

PEOPLE v. CLINE. (No. 20,341.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE AT DEFENDANT'S REQUEST.

Pen. Code Cal. § 1382, enacts that a prosecution shall be dismissed if a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information. At defendant's request, the court refused to set a cause down for trial which was delayed beyond the time allowed. Held, that defendant was not entitled to a dismissal.

2. LARCENY—RECENT POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS—EVIDENCE.

On the trial of an indictment for the larceny of a horse, defendant offered evidence, by a witness present at the time, to prove a payment he had made for the horse to a party from whom there was some evidence to show he had purchased it. The evidence of the prosecution depended largely upon recent possession. Held, that the evidence offered by defendant was material and admissible.

3. SAME—INSTRUCTION.

The court instructed the jury that "the possession of stolen property, supported by other evidence tending to show guilt, is a strong circumstance tending to show guilt." Held erroneous, as the jury is the sole judge of the weight to be given to the fact of recent possession, in view of all surrounding circumstances.¹

Indictment for larceny. One Cline, being convicted for stealing a horse, appealed.

W. D. Grady, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, for the People.

SEARLS, C. J. The defendant was convicted of grand larceny. The information was filed April 22, 1886. A demurrer was interposed, which was properly overruled, on the eleventh day of June, 1886. The trial did not take place until November 22d of the same year. At the trial, counsel for defendant moved to discharge the defendant upon the ground that said cause had not been brought to trial within 60 days after filing the information. The motion was properly denied. After the demurrer was overruled, the district attorney asked to have the cause set down for trial. This was objected to by counsel for defendant, who thereupon asked that it be not set down, and offered, if the cause was not set down, to waive the time fixed by law for the trial thereof; and thereupon the court refused to fix a day, and it went over. When, as here, the delay has been granted at the request of defendant, and presumably for his benefit, the objection is entitled to little consideration. The delay was of his own seeking, and is equivalent to a motion on his part ¹To warrant a presumption of guilt from the mere circumstance of the possession of stolen property, the possession must be personal, must be recent, must be unexplained, and must involve a distinct and conscious assertion of property. Robinson v. State, (Tex.) 3 S. W. Rep. 736. As to the weight to be assigned to the fact of the possession of stolen goods recently after the theft, see State v. Kirkpatrick, (Iowa,) 34 N. W. Rep. 301, and note; People v. Flynn, (Cal.) 15 Pac. Rep. 102; Bean v. White, (Tex.) 5 S. W. Rep. 525; Moreno v. State, (Tex.) 6 S. W. Rep. 299; Stockman v. State, (Tex.) 6 S. W. for a postponement of the case, and therefore did not entitle him to a dismissal under section 1382, Pen. Code.

At the trial, defendant offered to prove by one Frank Serradell that on the fifth day of February, 1886, at the saloon of one Degan, in Fresno, he paid to one Robles the sum of $20. The testimony was objected to. Objection sustained, and an exception taken, and the ruling is assigned as error. The testimony relied upon by the prosecution to prove guilt depended largely, but not wholly, upon the fact that the horse stolen was found in the possession of defendant soon after the theft was perpetrated. There was evidence tending to show that defendant purchased the animal in question on the fourth day of February from Robles for $30; that he paid $10 on account of the purchase, and agreed to pay the residue of $20 the next day at Fresno; that he took the colt to Owen's ranch, where he worked; that the next day he procured $20 from his employer, mounted the animal, rode it to Fresno, where he placed it in a livery stable, and proceeded to the saloon of Degan, where he met Robles, and, as he himself testified, in the presence of the witness Serradell paid to Robles the $20. Under these circumstances, the proffered testimony was both material and admissible. It was not only proper to prove the fact of payment, but also defendant's declaration, made at the very time of payment, of the account upon which it was paid. The credit to be given to the testimony when introduced was quite another thing, and was a question for the jury to determine, but which did not bear upon its admissibility.

It is also urged that the court erred in giving the jury the following instruction: "The mere possession of stolen property, recently stolen, is not of itself sufficient evidence to convict. The possession of stolen property, supported by other evidence tending to show guilt, is a strong circumstance tending to show guilt." In People v. Ah Sing, 59 Cal. 400, the court below had instructed the jury in language almost precisely similar to the above, and this court reversed the judgment, saying: "Whether the possession was strong evidence, or only slight evidence, tending to show guilt, was a matter for the jury to pass upon, and not a question for the court to determine." In other words, it is not a question of law, upon which the court should instruct the jury, but one of fact, which is wholly within the province of the latter. In deducing the ultimate fact of guilt or innocence, they are the sole judges of the weight to be given to the probative fact of possession of property recently stolen, and of all the circumstances surrounding and stamping the character of such possession.

For the errors indicated, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

WEST v. RUSSELL et al. (No. 12,111.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RUNNING OF THE STATUTE—WHEN CAUSE OF ACTION ACCRUES.

F. and C., residents of Pennsylvania, entered into a contract in 1852 by the terms of which C. was to proceed to the mining regions of California, and engage in mining for 18 months, or longer if arranged by letter. On his return to Pennsylvania he was to give F. half of all he made, or, if he died, F. should have the share just the same. C. came to California, but did not go to the mining regions. F. died in 1880, and his administrator brought action to recover half of what C. had made since he came to California. Held, that F.'s right to an accounting under the contract accrued 18 months after C. arrived in California, and the statute of limitations began to run against his claim from that date.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

This was an action brought by John J. West, as administrator of the estate of Irwin McFarlane, against F. H. Russell, administrator of the estate of William McCain, and the heirs of McCain. The action is brought to recover on a contract as follows: "Article of agreement entered into this twelfth day of February, 1852, between Irwin McFarlane, of the first part, and William McCain, of the second part, witnesseth, that said McFarlane agrees to give said McCain the sum of $275, and the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, with which said McCain agrees to proceed to California to the gold mines; and said McCain agrees to give said McFarlane one-half of what he may make until his return; and if he does not return, or dies, said McFarlane shall be entitled to one-half the same as if he returned,—that is, one-half of all his (McCain's) expenses; and the understanding between the parties is that said McCain shall stay eighteen months, or until other arrangements are made, which arrangements may be made by either." McCain came to California in 1852, but did not go to the mining regions. He accumulated a large property, and finally died in 1885. McFarlane died in 1880, and this suit was begun in May, 1886. No demand for an accounting had been made by McFarlane in his life-time. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Taylor & Hall, for appellant. Freeman, Johnson & Bates, for respondents.

THORNTON, J. The demurrer in this case was properly sustained. The contract on which the action is based was entered into in February, 1852. This suit was commenced on the first of May, 1886. The intention of the contract was that the intestate of the defendant (one William McCain) should go from Pennsylvania (where the contract was made) to the gold mines in California; engage in business there, either of mining or some other employment; remain there 18 months, or a longer period as should be arranged by letter or otherwise; and at the end of such period, and on his (McCain's) return to Pennsylvania, to give McFarlane, plaintiff's intestate, one-half of what he might up to that time have made; and if McCain did not return, or died, McFarlane was to be entitled to one-half, the same as if he returned. McCain came to California in 1852, but it does not appear by averment that he ever went to the mines at all; accumulated property, both real and personal, which he had at the time of his death, which occurred in Sacramento in February, 1885.

We think it would be giving an unjustifiable construction to the agreement to hold that McCain, who broke his agreement, and never did go to the mines, or engage in business in the mining regions, should be held to account to McFarlane for whatever he might make by his labor or industry, exerted elsewhere in California than in the mining regions. Further, we are of opinion, it not appearing that the period of 18 months was ever prolonged by agreement, within a reasonable time after the lapse of the period of 18 months from his arrival in California, McFarlane had a right to call on him for an account, and, not having done so, his right to proceed against McCain under the agreement has been long since barred by lapse of time.

Let it be conceded that McFarlane had a right at any time during the years 1855 or 1856 to call on McCain to account. This would have given the former a reasonable time to demand an account of the latter, and, upon refusal, to bring his action. The statute would then have commenced to run on the first of January, 1857. McFarlane could not be allowed to extend the day on which the statute of limitations began to operate by his failure to call for an account. The statute thus commencing to run on the first of January, 1857, the period of four years (Code Civil Proc. § 343) which barred the relief asked had elapsed several times before the commencement of the action.

The judgment should be affirmed. So ordered.

We concur in the judgment: SEARLS, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.

We concur in the judgment on the ground that the facts set forth in the complaint show such laches on the part of plaintiff and her intestate as justified the court below, as a court of equity, in refusing to entertain a suit for an accounting: McKINSTRY, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

PEOPLE v. HOWARD. (No. 20,353.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Where, upon an application for new trial in a criminal cause, upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence, it does not appear that the party applying might not, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced on the trial the evidence claimed to be newly discovered, or that such newly-discovered evidence might cause a different verdict to be rendered, it is not an abuse of discretion to refuse such application.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Eva Howard, having been convicted of grand larceny, applied for new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The application was refused, and defendant appeals.

S. W. Geiss, for appellant. R. B. Terry, Dist. Atty., and Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was convicted of grand larceny. From the judgment entered in the cause, and an order refusing her a new trial, she has appealed.

We cannot agree with the defendant's contention that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury.

It is urged further, in her behalf, that the newly-discovered evidence which she proposed to introduce if granted a new trial is shown by the affidavits presented on her part to have been such as would unquestionably have resulted, if put before a jury, in her acquittal, and that she could not, by the exercise of due diligence, have discovered and produced that evidence on the trial at which she was convicted. In order that a party shall have the right to a new trial after conviction of a criminal offense of the kind in hand, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, it must appear—"First, that the evidence, and not merely its materiality, be newly discovered; second, that the evidence be cumulative merely; third, that it be such as to render a different result probable on a retrial of the cause; fourth, that the party could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced it at the trial; and, fifth, that these facts be shown by the best evidence of which the case admits." Hayne, New Trials, § 88. "Applications on this ground are addressed to the discretion of the court below, and the action of the court below will not be disturbed except for an abuse of discretion; the presumption being that the discretion was properly exercised." Id. § 87. From the affidavits produced on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, we do not perceive why the defendant might not, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced on her trial what is now claimed to be newly-discovered evidence; nor can we, with any degree of certainty, declare that it is such as to render a different result probable if a retrial was had. As to what would probably have occurred if a new trial had been granted, the court below was in a better situation to judge than this court can now be. We can perceive no possible prejudice created upon the mind of the court by anything which transpired at the hearing of the motion for a new trial, or that it abused the discretion vested in it by law in denying the motion. It has been repeatedly held by this court that applications for a new trial, urged upon the ground now being considered, are to be regarded with "distrust and disfavor." People v. Sutton, 15 Pac. Rep. 86, and cases cited.

There is no prejudicial error shown by the record, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

By THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RUSSELL et al. (No. 11,379.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

COUNTIES—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—ORDINANCES—PUBLICATION.

Act Cal. March 14, 1883, § 26, relating to county and township government, provided that all ordinances passed by the board of supervisors should have an enacting clause in a certain form, and that no ordinance should take effect within less than 15 days after its passage, and before the expiration of the 15 days the ordinance shall be published for one week. Held that, under the section cited, the publication of an ordinance without the enacting clause was not a publication of the whole ordinance, and was not, therefore, sufficient to put the ordinance into operation.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

This was an action against C. J. Russell and R. Brewster to recover a license fee provided for by an ordinance of the board of supervisors of the county of San Luis Obispo relating to licensing business. It appeared that the ordinance in question was published as required by the act of March 14, 1883, but the enacting clause was omitted in the publication. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellants. J. N. Turner, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. The ordinance in this case was published without the enacting clause. By section 26 of the act of March 14, 1883, (St. 1883, p. 309,) entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments," it is provided that the enacting clause of all ordinances of the board of supervisors shall be as follows: "The board of supervisors do ordain as follows." This enacting clause is a part of every ordinance. The section above referred to also provides: "On the passage of all ordinances, the votes of the several members of the board shall be entered on the minutes, and all ordinances shall be entered at length in the ordinance book. No ordinance passed by the board shall take effect within less than fifteen days after its passage; and before the expiration of the said fifteen days the same shall be published, with the names of the members voting for and against the same, for at least one week in some newspaper published in the county, if there be one, and, if there be none published in the county, then such ordinance shall be posted at the court-house door at least one week."

We are of opinion that the intention of the law-makers, in enacting that section of the statute, was that the ordinance should not take effect until it was published, and that the publication of the whole ordinance is required; not of a part of it. The publication of the ordinance, as in this case, where the enacting clause was omitted, was not the publication of the whole ordinance, and was not the publication which the law required. The ordinance under consideration, by reason of non-publication, never went into operation, and no licenses could be collected under it.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendants on the findings. So ordered.

In re GLENN'S ESTATE. (No. 12,102.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE OF DEMANDS—INTEREST ON CLAIM.

A claim against the estate of a decedent, allowed by the administrator, and afterwards duly approved by the judge of probate, bears interest from the date of approval by the judge of probate. PATERSON, TEMPLE, and MCFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGEFORD, Judge.

This was a motion by the Consolidated Bank of Manchester, England, for an order that the administrator of the estate of Hugh J. Glenn should pay to the said bank interest on a claim allowed and approved against said estate in favor of N. Ten Bosch & Co. The order was refused, and claimant appeals.

William Barber, for appellant. F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This is an appeal from an order refusing to direct the payment of interest upon a claim which had been allowed by the administrator and by the probate judge, and filed. The claim was for services rendered and money advanced to deceased in his life-time. It was allowed by the administrator on January 22, 1884, and approved by the judge on February 19, 1884. No order in relation to the payment of the claim was made until September 30, 1886, when the court ordered the principal to be paid, but refused to order the payment of interest. The appellant accepted the principal, reserving objections on account of the non-payment of interest. The only question argued is whether the claim drew interest after its allowance and approval.

Section 1504, Code Civil Proc., which in this respect is substantially the same as section 140 of the old practice act, (see Laws 1851, p. 465,) provides that "a judgment rendered against an executor or administrator, upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator or intestate, only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and a judge. * * *" This is an express provision that a judgment upon a claim has the same effect as an allowance of the claim. The converse of such a proposition must be true; that is to say, the allowance of a claim has the same effect as a judgment upon the claim. But a judgment upon a claim draws interest. Pico v. Stevens, 18 Cal. 377. Hence an allowed claim must draw interest. This conclusion is in harmony with numerous decisions which hold that for some purposes the allowance of a claim is a judgment. Deck's Estate v. Gherke, 6 Cal. 667; Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 239; Estate of Hidden, 23 Cal. 363; Estate of McKinley, 49 Cal. 152; Estate of Olivera, 70 Cal. 184, 11 Pac. Rep. 624. It is true that the allowance is not conclusive upon the heirs. Code Civil Proc. § 1636; Weihe v. Statham, 67 Cal. 84, 7 Pac. Rep. 143. But this only amounts to saying that for some purposes it is not a judgment. As said in Magraw v. McGlynn, 26 Cal. 420: "Claims so allowed and approved pass into judgments of a qualified character only." For the purpose in hand, however, we think, as above stated, that an allowed claim is a judgment, and therefore that it draws interest. The courts of Texas, which are governed by statutes similar to ours, have reached the same conclusion. Finley v. Carothers, 9 Tex. 517. And we think the doctrine is a salutary one. The prompt settlement of estates depends to a great extent upon the wishes of the heirs and the executors or administrators. It is not wise to hold out inducements for their delay.

It is said that in Estate of Selby a contrary view was taken. As no opinion was written in that case, we are unable to say what was the view of the court. It may be that it supposed other questions were involved. But, however this may be, an unwritten opinion is not entitled to much consideration as authority.

It is proper to add that, since there was no agreement fixing the rate, interest must be at legal rates. As to whether a different rule would prevail where the parties had fixed the rate by agreement, we express no opinion.

We therefore advise that the order appealed from be reversed, with directions to the court below to order the payment of interest on the claim, from the date of its approval by the judge, at legal rates.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed, and the court below directed to order the payment of interest on the claim, from the date of its approval by the judge, at legal rates.

MCFADDEN et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF LOS ANGELES CO. (No. 11, 833.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

1. WATERS AND WATER-COURSES—WATER COMPANIES—POWERS OF COUNTY SUPERVISORS. Under the provisions of Const. Cal. art. 14, § 1, and act Cal. March 12, 1885, authorizing the board of supervisors to fix the rates at which water shall be sold, rented, or distributed by a corporation furnishing water to the general public for profit, the board of supervisors of a county have no power to fix the rate at which water shall be sold, rented, or distributed by a corporation organized to furnish water to the stockholders only.

2. CORPORATIONS—STOCKHOLDERS—FAILURE TO SIGN ARTICLES AND BY-LAWS. A stockholder in a corporation is bound by the articles of incorporation and the by-laws of the corporation, whether he has signed them or not.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. BRUNSON, Judge.

This was a petition for a writ of mandate, brought by William McFadden, John Wagner, and others against the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, directing them to fix the rate at which water should be furnished by the Anaheim Water Company. The writ was refused, and the plaintiffs appeal.

G. M. Holton and Albert M. Stephens, for appellants. J. G. McCallum, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. Petition for writ of mandate. The answer in this case sets forth that the Anaheim Union Water Company is a corporation formed under the laws of this state on the twenty-ninth of January, 1884, for the purpose of supplying water for hydraulic, irrigating, and domestic use to the owners and occupants of a district of 12,000 acres of land situated in Los Angeles county, and contained within certain limits which are set forth in the articles of incorporation. It further sets forth that the corporation above named duly adopted by-laws; which by-laws, as well as the articles of incorporation, have been signed by the stockholders thereof, except one of the plaintiffs herein named, John Wagner. These articles and by-laws are made part of the petition. By the by-laws, the directors of the corporation are authorized to charge the stockholders such sums for the water as may cover the ordinary expenses of the company. It further appears, from the answer, that the waters were acquired and held to be used on the lands of the stockholders, and not for sale, distribution, and rental or otherwise; and, from the by-laws, that no water shall be sold or used for any purpose on lands not covered by stock of the company, with a proviso allowing a stockholder to use water on other lands on certain conditions, but the water is to be used by or sold to no one else but a stockholder.

The by-laws adopted, in their scope and extent, do not go beyond the power in the corporation to adopt them. In our view, they are not inconsistent with the constitution or laws of this state.

We think the answer in the particulars above set forth shows that the water was acquired and held for the use of the stockholders of the corporation only, and not for sale, distribution, or rental to the public generally. Nor is it intended that the water, or the agencies used for its distribution, was to be sold or rented or used in any way to accumulate a fund from which dividends were to be declared and paid. Under these circumstances, we do not think that the provisions of the constitution (article 14, § 1,) or of the act of March 12, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 95,) authorized the board of supervisors to fix the rates at which the waters of a corporation like the one involved herein, are to be sold, rented, or distributed. The stockholders have already fixed the mode of regulating what shall be paid for the use of water in the district in which their lands lie, and we are of opinion that the rates so fixed should govern. It will be observed that by these rates it is intended that the stockholders are to be charged such sums only as may cover the ordinary expenses of the company. These ordinary expenses only include the salaries to be paid, and the expense of repairing, and it may be extending, the ditches. The rates to be fixed under the act of 1885 by the board of supervisors of a county are in the cases where the waters controlled by the corporation are to be sold or distributed or rented to the general public for profit, to be distributed as dividends among the stockholders; in which case individuals not stockholders may procure water or not as they choose. In this case it is clearly apparent that the waters under the control of the corporation were acquired to be held and employed for the use of the stockholders only. An individual can certainly acquire water to be used on his own land. With such use a board of supervisors would have nothing to do. We know of no reason why individuals cannot associate themselves, take on a corporate form, and acquire water to be used on their own lands. When this is done, we are of opinion that a board of supervisors can have no more power over the rates to be paid by the stockholders than in the case of individuals.

It does not clearly appear whether John Wagner is a stockholder of the Anaheim Union Water Company or not. If he is a stockholder, he is bound by the articles of incorporation, and by-laws duly and regularly adopted, under section 301, Civil Code (and such we take the by-laws in this case to be,) whether he has signed them or not. As a stockholder, his only control over the fixing of rates is in voting for directors who are authorized to adjust such rates. If not a stockholder, he has no right to interfere in any way in the fixing of rates, or to call on the board of supervisors to fix the rates for water sold or used.

It follows from the above that the answer furnishes a defense in this proceeding; that the demurrer to it was improperly sustained; and that if the averments of the answer are true, no writ of mandate should be granted to the board of supervisors to fix the rates to be charged for water sold or distributed by the Anaheim Union Water Company. The judgment and order must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside the judgment, and enter an order overruling the demurrer to the answer. Ordered accordingly.

PEOPLE v. YUT LING. (No. 20,344.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 25, 1888.)

1. TRIAL—VIEW OF PREMISES—ABSENCE OF JUDGE.

Defendant is entitled to a new trial where the judge does not accompany the jury upon a view. PATERSON and McFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

2. SAME—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—SEPARATION.

In support of a motion for a new trial of an indictment for murder, on the ground of misconduct of the jury while on a view, an affidavit alleged that jurymen B. separated and refused to view the premises, and sat down and refused to follow his fellows, and that defendant was then in another part of the building; that affiant heard another jurymen ask to go out, as he did not propose to do any more. The counter-affidavit of the officer having charge of the jury stated that the jury had to pass a certain place one at a time, and affiant believed B. followed; that affiant told B. to follow him around a bunch of weeds, and that another jurymen was then with him; that he said he was sick, and wanted to get in the shade, and was not over 50 feet from affiant; that the rooms were too small to contain all, and while some were inside others were outside looking in at the windows, and others in an adjoining alley, but were never out of sight of each other for any considerable time. Held, that the motion was properly denied.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Indictment for murder. Defendant moved for a new trial, on the grounds: (1) That the jury viewed the premises without the presence of the judge or the defendant; (2) misconduct of the jury while viewing the premises. The affidavit of one of defendant's attorneys in support of the motion alleged that he accompanied the jury, "and that while so accompanying them one T. T. Barrett, a member of said jury instructed by said court to view the said premises, and further instructed not to separate from his fellow-jurymen, did separate, and refused to view the said premises, on the ground that he was not going to kill himself smelling around opium dens; and further, affiant heard the said jurymen to ask the sheriff O. J. Meade, to allow him to go out, as he did not propose to do any more; affiant further states that the said T. T. Barrett sat down and refused to follow his fellow-jurymen in viewing the said premises; affiant further states that while said Barrett was occupying the said seat spoken of that the defendant was not present, but in another part of said building, in charge of a deputy-sheriff." The counter-affidavit of R. H. Gillespie, a deputy-sheriff, says that he had charge of the jury, and Frank Bedford took charge of the prisoner, that "when we got to the railroad, there was a freight train there, and we all had to pass along by the water-tank, and had to go one at a time to get through * * * and I believe Mr. Barrett followed them; when they had got through and had gone on a little piece I halloed. * * * There was a bunch of grass and weeds there, and Barrett went around; and I told him to come this way, it was the best road. Question. Who was with Barrett when he went around that way? Answer. Mr. Edwards, [a jurymen;] and he said he was sick and had a headache, and wanted to get in the shade of the house. He was not over 50 feet from me." He also states that the China house rooms were too small to contain all the jurymen, and that while some of them were in the house viewing the rooms, some stood outside and looked in the windows, and some were in the alley adjoining, but were never out of sight of each other for any considerable time. The motion was denied, and defendant appealed.

E. D. Edwards, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. There was no misconduct of the jury in this case. It never separated. When the jury went to view the premises, the judge of the court should have gone along with them. It was the right of defendant to have the judge accompany the jurors when they went to take this view. As the judge did not do this, the judgment and order denying a new trial must be reversed, and the cause remanded, that a new trial may be had. Ordered accordingly.

Under Const. Cal. art. 4, § 24, providing that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. * * * No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended," the Cal. act of April 15, 1880, amending by reference to its title, Pol. Code, § 3481, in reference to the organization of swamp and overflowed land districts, and re-enacting and publishing at length said section 3481, as amended, is valid. McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

2. PUBLIC LANDS—SWAMP LANDS—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Act Cal. April 15, 1880, as amending Pol. Code, § 3481, providing that the owners of more than two-thirds of any body of lands within any reclamation or swamp-land district, and in which the lands have not been reclaimed, desiring to have the said body of lands set off from such district, must show that said body of lands, is capable of independent reclamation, does not authorize the setting off of an independent district within the limits of a reclamation district formed prior to the adoption of the Political Code, and not reorganized under the Code.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; T. B. McFARLAND, Judge.

This is an action by the people of the state of California, by E. C. Marshall, attorney general, against E. R. Parvin and others, for a judgment declaring that the defendants have usurped, intruded into, held, and exercised powers and franchises as trustees of the pretended reclamation district No. 366, without authority of law; and that the said pretended district has no legal existence. Decree for plaintiffs in the superior court. Defendants appeal.

A. P. Catlin and McCune & George, for appellants. G. W. Gordon, for respondents.

McKINSTRY, J. Section 43 of the act of March 28, 1868, "to provide for the management and sale of lands belonging to the state," provided that swamp and overflowed land districts, previously formed, could reorganize under that act in the manner therein set forth. In pursuance of the section, and on the tenth day of June, 1871, reclamation district No. 3, which was originally formed June 20, 1861, was organized under act of 1868. The Political Code took effect January 1, 1873, when section 3481 of that Code read as follows: "If the holders of certificates of purchase on patents for lands within any district formed prior to May 28, 1868, and in which the lands have not been reclaimed, desire to have their lands set off from such district, they must, in addition to the petition in section 3446, show to the board of supervisors that their lands are capable of an independent reclamation." And April 15, 1880, section 3481 was amended, (if the amendatory act is valid,) so as to read: "If the owners of lands representing more than two-thirds of any body of lands within any reclamation or swamp-land district, and in which the lands have not been reclaimed, desire to have the said body of lands set off from such district, they must, in addition to the petition required by section 3446, show to the board of supervisors that the said body of lands is capable of an independent reclamation." On the twenty-second of July, 1880, the board of supervisors of Sacramento county, wherein the territory included in reclamation district No. 3 is situated, by order set apart a portion of such territory as and for a separate and independent reclamation district, called, and to be called, "Reclamation District No. 366." This action is by the people of the state for a judgment declaring that the defendants have usurped and exercised powers and franchises as trustees of the pretended reclamation district No. 366, without authority of law; that the said pretended district has no legal existence. Decree was entered for plaintiffs in the superior court.

It is contended by respondent that the reclamation district No. 366 (so called) has no legal existence for two reasons: First. Because the act of April 15, 1880, is not a valid law, in that the title thereof does not conform to the mandatory requirement of the constitution: "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title." Article 4, § 24. Second. Because neither section 3481, Pol. Code, as the same read when the Code was adopted, nor the section, as it purports to have been amended by the act of April 15, 1880, applies to, or authorizes a division of, swamp-land districts, created or reorganized under the act of March 28, 1868.

1. The Political Code constitutes a single statute, thus entitled: "Title of the Act: (1) This act shall be known as the Political Code of the state of California." Whether, under the present constitution, the legislature would have power to enact a law so generally entitled, is a very serious question; but under the constitution existing when the Code was adopted the title was sufficient, and the Code continues in force. The section of the constitution, after providing as above quoted, proceeds: "No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its 'title' (that is, by reference to its title alone;) but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted, and published at length as revised or amended." There is no question here but that section 3481 was "re-enacted and published at length;" and the title of the act amended is very clearly referred to as the "Political Code." With reference to a statute passed since the constitution of 1879 took effect, there can be no doubt that a section of such a statute—the statute itself being properly entitled—may be amended by referring, in the title of the amendment, to the title of the statute amended, and re-enacting the section as amended. If, in such case, the title of the original statute did not state its "subject," both the statute and any amendment of it would be void. But it is enough if the title of the statute is recited; it is not necessary that the subject of the particular section amended shall be stated in the title of the amendatory act. It is to be understood, of course, that if any subject shall be embraced in a section of an act passed under the present constitution, which shall not be expressed in the title of the act, the section is void. Article 4, § 24. It follows, also, that under pretense of amending a particular section, the legislature cannot legislate upon a subject not embraced in the title of the original act. If it be said that the title of the amendatory act of April, 1880, does not express the subject, the reply is that the constitution does not require, in case of an amendment, that the subject shall be any more fully stated than it is stated in the valid statute amended.

Each article of the Political Code is preceded by head-notes numbered to correspond with the sections following, and purporting to give, in brief form, the subject of each of such sections. It would sometimes give fuller notice to the members of the legislature if the title to a bill for amending a section of the Code embraced a statement of the matter contained in the appropriate head-note, or its equivalent. The head-note to section 3481, however, is "un-reclaimed lands may be set off in a separate district;" and even this does not indicate that such district may be formed within another already existing. But the constitution only requires that the title of the act which it is proposed to amend shall be clearly mentioned or recited in the act amending a particular section. This being done, the sufficiency of the title of the amendatory act depends upon the sufficiency of the title of the original act; and as the title of the Political Code was sufficient under the former constitution, we are not prepared to say that the Political Code is a void act, because its title does not conform to the mandate of the constitution, adopted after the Code became an operative law.

2. We are of opinion the act of April 15, 1880, does not authorize the setting off of a new and independent district, within the limits of a reclamation district formed or organized prior to the adoption of the Political Code, and not reorganized under the Political Code. Section 3478 of the Political Code, provides that districts formed under laws in force prior to May 28, 1868, may reorganize under the provisions of the Code. And section 3489 provides a mode by which any reclamation districts organized or erected prior to the Code, may "reorganize and consolidate" under the Code. The provisions of the Political Code, with reference to the levy and collection of assessments, have no application to reclamation district No. 3. It has been so decided by this court. (Reclamation Dist. No. 3 v. Kennedy, 58 Cal. 124.) Why should section 3481 of the same Code be held to apply to and authorize a division of reclamation district No. 3? True, section 3481, as originally adopted, provided for the formation of new districts only within those formed prior to May 28, 1868. But the amendment of 1880 does not necessarily imply an intent to authorize the future formation of new districts within districts formed or organized under the law of 1868. When 3481 was amended, section 3478—which permitted districts formed under laws in force prior to the law of 1868 to reorganize under the Code—was suffered to remain unchanged. We may reasonably presume the purpose of the amendment of 1880 was to provide for the formation of new districts only within those formed or reorganized under the Political Code, and not to authorize the formation of new districts within those formed prior to the Code, which were not reorganized under the Code.

Since the amendment of section 3481, the Code is to be read as if the section 3481, as amended, had been incorporated in it from the beginning. So reading it, there is little difficulty in construing 3481 as intended to permit the formation of new, separate or independent districts only within the territory of the districts formed or reorganized under the provisions of the Political Code

Section 3 of the Political Code expressly provides that no part of it shall be held to be retroactive unless so expressly declared. When the legislature has launched a scheme or system, to be carried into operation in the future, for the acquisition of private rights or the disposition of public property, evidently intended to be exhaustive of the subject of the legislation, the whole plan is to be considered together, and the language used in one portion of the statute (unless the contrary is clearly indicated) should not be given a broader effect than its purpose as part of the scheme. The distribution of the Code is merely arbitrary, and for convenience of reference, and by it no force is added to the suggestion that a particular section is to be given an independent effect, without consideration of the language of the other sections.

The Political Code furnishes a system for the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands, complete in itself, and differing widely, in various particulars, from the system—also intended to be complete—provided by the act of 1868, or by any other previous act. The provisions of the Code relating to the formation and organization of reclamation districts; to the petition to be presented to the supervisors, its contents, by whom signed and verified and how published; to the order of approval, the action of the register, making of by-laws, election of officers, employment of agents, and their duties; to the levy and collection of assessments, etc.,—in short, to all other of the statutory steps to be taken or acts to be done,—relate to reclamation districts to be formed under the Political Code. In like manner, section 3481, as amended, should be held to relate to a setting off from districts formed or reorganized under the Political Code.

Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.

TEMPLE, J. I concur on the ground that the statute did not authorize the formation of the new districts.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment upon the second ground stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice McKINSTRY; but I think that the act of April 15, 1880, is void, because there is no "subject expressed in its title." We have in this state a Code system, which embraces every imaginable subject of legislation. It is nominally divided into four Codes, to each of which is given a name; but neither is confined to any particular subject or subjects, nor is either complete in itself. They are inseparably interwoven with each other. The Penal Code, for instance, does not define all public offenses; it does not contain a statement of the criminal jurisdiction of the courts; and on the trial of a person charged by indictment or information, recourse to rules and principles stated in the other Codes is constantly necessary. The Code of Civil Procedure and the Civil Code are, of course, indissolubly blended; while the Political Code is a hotch-potch in which a great deal of everything—civil and criminal—substantive law and procedure—is indiscriminately mixed up. Together, however, they form a complete system of laws. But the subjects of legislation embraced in this system are innumerable. Therefore the mere statement in the title of an act of the legislature that it is to amend some section of this system, gives no more notion of what the act is about than if the statement were "An act to amend the general laws of the state."

GOLDTREE et al. v. SWINFORD et al. (No. 12,014.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 26, 1888.)

PARTNERSHIP—FICTITIOUS FIRM NAMES—CERTIFICATE OF PARTNERS—EXECUTION BY ATTORNEY IN FACT.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 2466, requiring partners doing business under a fictitious name to file with the clerk of the county where the principal place of business is situated.

Cal.Rep. 16-19 P.—11

uated a certificate showing the full names of all the partners, and their places of residence, and section 2468, providing that the certificate must be signed by the partners, and acknowledged, and that the partnership can maintain no action on partnership contracts until such certificate is filed and publication made, a certificate to which the names of one of the partners is attached by an attorney in fact, under a power of attorney authorizing him to commence and prosecute suits, and to execute and acknowledge all instruments or power to effectuate all or any of the premises appertaining or belonging to the principal, is sufficient, although the power of attorney was executed prior to the enactment of the law requiring certificates.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

This was an action by N. Goldtree, I. Goldtree, and M. Goldtree, partners doing business under the firm name of Goldtree & Co. on a promissory note against John M. Swinford and M. C. Swinford. Civil Code Cal. § 2466, provides that, "except as provided in the next section, every partnership transacting business in this state under a fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business, must file with the clerk of the county in which its principal place of business is situated a certificate stating the names in full of all the members of such partnership, and their places of residence, and publish the same once a week for four successive weeks," etc. Section 2468. "The certificate * * * must be signed by the partners, and acknowledged before some officer authorized to take acknowledgment of conveyances of real property. * * * Persons doing business as partners contrary to the provisions of this article shall not maintain any action upon or on account of any contracts made or transactions had in their partnership name, in any court state, until they have first filed the certificate and made the publication herein required." Plaintiffs alleged a compliance with these provisions, which allegations defendants denied, and set up that the name of N. Goldtree was signed by Isaac Goldtree, his attorney in fact. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellants. T. H. Laine and V. A. Gregg, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. In their complaint the plaintiffs, N. Goldtree, I. Goldtree, and M. Goldtree, allege that they are partners doing business under the firm name of Goldtree & Co., and as such partners, prior to the commencement of this action, filed with the clerk of the county in which the principal place of business of said partnership is now and has at all times been situated a certificate, stating the names of the members of said partnership, in full, and each of their places of residence, signed by all the plaintiffs, and acknowledged by them before an officer authorized to take acknowledgments of conveyances of real property, and by such officer certified as required to be certified to acknowledgments of conveyances of real property, and thereafter, and before the commencement of this action, published the same once a week for four successive weeks in a newspaper published in said county. This is followed by allegations sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendants.

Answering the complaint, the defendants aver they have no information or belief upon the subject as to whether plaintiffs have made, filed, or caused to be published, at any time, the certificate mentioned and referred to in their complaint, and on that ground they deny that plaintiffs ever made, acknowledged, or caused to be published, said certificate.

This is the only issue which it is necessary now to consider. The finding of the court upon this issue is in favor of the defendants. This finding is attacked on the ground that it is not justified by the evidence. The record shows that the plaintiffs introduced in evidence a certificate personally signed and acknowledged by all the plaintiffs, except N. Goldtree, who signed and acknowledged the same by Isaac Goldtree, as his attorney in fact. An affidavit of publication of said certificate was also introduced, after which plaintiffs introduced a power of attorney from N. to Isaac Goldtree, and the latter testified that he communicated to the former the fact of his having signed his name to the certificate about March 12, 1881.

Appellants insist that the evidence shows a sufficient compliance with sections 2466-2468, Civil Code, to entitle them to maintain this action. Respondents deny it, and insist that plaintiff N. Goldtree, one of the partners, did not sign or acknowledge the certificate according to the requirements of said sections of the Code; that the requirement "must be signed by the partners" is not satisfied by a signing by an attorney in fact of one of the partners, under a general power such as this is, executed eight years before the passage of the act requiring certificates to be signed, acknowledged, filed, and published, as a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action upon a contract made in the partnership name. This power of attorney is general, and quite full, as the following extract shows: "To commence and prosecute unto final judgment and execution any suit or suits, action or actions, real, personal, or mixed, which he may deem proper for the recovery, possession, or enjoyment of any matter or thing which is or may hereafter be due, payable, owing, belonging, accruing, or appertaining to me, for or by reason of the premises, or any part thereof, and, in any such suits or actions, for me to appear and plead before any court or tribunals having jurisdiction thereof, and all stipulations undertaken, recognizance, and other requisites, in any suits or actions, and any questions arising on the same, by the arbitration or other compromise, and of all receipts and recoveries in the premises, due acquittances and discharges to execute and deliver, and generally to do and perform all matters and things, transact all business, make, execute, and acknowledge all contracts, orders, deeds, writings, assurances, and instruments which may be requisite, or proper to effectuate all or any of the premises or any other matter or thing appertaining or belonging to me, with the same powers, and to all intents and purposes with the same validity, as I could if personally present."

"An agent may be authorized to do any acts which his principal might do, except those to which the latter is bound to give his personal attention." Civil Code, 2304. "Every act which, according to this Code, may be done by or to any person, may be done by or to the agent of such person for that purpose, unless a contrary intention clearly appears." Id. 2305. In the clause of the power of attorney above quoted the agent has power to commence and prosecute suits; and to execute and acknowledge all instruments or power to effectuate all or any of the premises, or any other matter or thing appertaining or belonging to the principal. The authority with which an agent is invested is not necessarily confined to the performance of those actions alone which are authorized by the bare words in which an authority is conveyed. On the contrary, it is rarely so confined. Evans, Prin. & Ag., 136. We think the signing and acknowledgment of the certificate in question were within the authority conferred on the agent by the power of attorney. And we think that the certificate so signed and acknowledged satisfied the requirements of the Code. The object of those requirements is doubtless quite as well subserved by having it signed and acknowledged by an agent as it would be if it were personally signed and acknowledged by the principal. And the provisions of the Code, and all proceedings under it, are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. Civil Code, 4.

We attach no importance to the fact of this power of attorney having been given long before the provisions of the Code requiring certificates to be executed and filed were passed.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; MCFARLAND, J.; TEMPLE, J.; THORNTON, J.; PATERSON, J.; MCKINSTRY, J.

BURGESS v. RICE. (No. 12,127.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 27, 1888.)

1. EJECTMENT—DEFENSES—PARTNERSHIP IN LANDS ACQUIRED FROM THE STATE.

It is no defense to an action of ejectment for lands purchased from the state that plaintiff and defendant's grantors entered into a partnership to acquire the lands and make improvements thereon, and that he had purchased the interest of his grantors therein, and no settlement of the partnership affairs had been made, especially where it appears that the plaintiff filed on the land in his own name, and paid for the same with his own funds, that it was the understanding of the partners that each should secure and own his own land, and that if any part of the funds used were partnership funds it was a loan by the partnership, and that the improvements made by each claimant were not to be considered a part of the partnership property.

2. SAME—LANDLORD AND TENANT—ESTOPPEL TO DENY TITLE.

In an action of ejectment to recover land purchased by plaintiff from the state against the defendant, who had entered on the premises under a lease from plaintiff, and after the termination of the lease refused to leave the premises, the defendant cannot set up title in himself by purchase from one who claimed to be a partner with plaintiff in the acquisition of the land.¹

Action of ejectment by George W. Burgess against Charles B. Rice. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The plaintiff, while in the occupation of the lands on October 15, 1875, filed an application to purchase from the state. In accordance with his application, proof, and payment, a patent was issued to him for the lands in his own name, August 28, 1885. In his answer the defendant denied that the plaintiff was the sole owner of the property; and in his cross-complaint alleged that the land described in the complaint is a part of a tract of land known as the Poison Camp range; that J. C. French, Enos Peabody, and plaintiff, prior to the commencement of this action, formed a partnership for the purpose of raising stock; that these parties built houses, barns, corrals, etc., upon said range, with partnership funds; that afterwards Peabody sold his interest to Burgess and French, and on the twenty-sixth of February, 1883, French sold his interest in the range to defendant; that the defendant entered into possession under his deed from French; that there has never been an accounting of the improvements placed upon said range by any of the partners. Defendant, therefore, asked for a decree adjudging that he is the owner of an undivided half interest in the lands described in the complaint, and that the land be divided between plaintiff and defendant in such manner as may be equitable and just.

It is difficult to perceive upon what theory defendant seeks the equitable relief prayed for or in what respect the facts stated constitute a defense in an action of ejectment. The ranch referred to was a portion of the public domain of the United States until the land in controversy was patented to the plaintiff. Conceding that there was a partnership, as alleged by the defendant, and that houses, barns, and corrals were built upon said range with partnership funds and for partnership purposes, and that no accounting has been had, these facts of themselves would not make the plaintiff a trustee with respect to the title acquired from the state. The facts stated in the cross-complaint, if true, may be sufficient to entitle the defendant to an accounting from the plaintiff, concerning the partnership funds, stock and improvements, but can in no way affect the title of the plaintiff to the real estate in controversy.

However this may be, it is sufficient to say that the findings of the court are in favor of the plaintiff upon every material allegation, and that the evidence is ample in support thereof. The evidence shows that the plaintiff filed upon the land, in his own name, and paid for the same with his individual funds; that it was the understanding of all the partners that each should secure and own his own land, the land claimed by him; that the improvements all rested upon the surface of the ground except the fences, (there is nothing to show the character of the improvements upon the land in controversy;) that if any portion of the purchase price was partnership funds, it was a loan to plaintiff by the partnership; that the improvements on each claim were to be owned by the claimant, and were not considered as a portion of the partnership assets.

It is a conclusive answer to the claim of the defendant, furthermore, that on the ninth day of March, 1883, he entered under a lease by the terms of which plaintiff leased and demised unto the defendant "all of his interest in the lands known as the Poison Camp ranch and range." Also his undivided half of the sheep on said range at "a yearly rent of seventy-five cents per year for each sheep delivered, * * * said lease being for the period of two years from date." The plaintiff testified: "A portion of the premises described in the complaint are the same as those described in the lease,—those 320 acres of land that appeared in the lease. Under the lease Rice entered into the occupancy of the premises now in controversy. He paid me for the first year's rent, and for the second he paid me all except $12.75. After the termination of the lease I served a notice upon Rice to quit and vacate the premises," etc. The court found the facts above stated to be true,—and the finding is supported by evidence,—and that, at the time of the commencement of this action, the defendant was and still is in the occupancy thereof without the consent of plaintiff, and against his will; and that the defendant, by reason of his leasing the premises from plaintiff and his occupancy under the lease and payment of rent, was estopped from denying the title of the plaintiff, or claiming any interest in the premises adversely to him. Judgment affirmed.

(MARYE et al., Intervenor.) (No. 12,153.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 27, 1888.)

BANKS AND BANKING—SAVINGS BANKS—REORGANIZATION—SUBSCRIPTION BY DEPOSITORS TO CAPITAL STOCK.

A savings bank being in financial straits, the depositors met and agreed to have it incorporated as a bank of capital. It was agreed to open books for subscription to stock, to give the depositors preference in the subscription, and to accept in payment of stock the funds of such as had money in the bank. A considerable amount of stock was taken of which amount nearly all was deposited in bank, including the fund subscribed by depositors; and the parties so subscribing, without waiting for all the stock to be taken had the bank incorporated, organized, and elected officers, and took charge of the affairs of the bank. The subscription to stock was in the ordinary unconditional form. The bank soon suspended, and was turned over to the board of directors for liquidation. The board proceeded to convert the assets into cash, and to pay dividends on the deposits, excluding those whose deposits had been applied on their stock accounts. Held that these stockholders were not entitled to come into court and claim that their subscriptions to the stock were on condition that the whole amount of the capital stock be taken, and to be relegated to their rights as depositors.

v.16p.no.7—32

Action by A. Dallemand, for himself and 77 other stockholders, against the Odd Fellows' Savings Bank, and David Hunter and others, directors, George T. SHARPSTEIN, J. The controlling facts of this case are stated with sufficient fullness, we think, in the following extract of an opinion filed by the court below on overruling a demurrer to the plaintiffs complaint:

"In this action, it appears that the corporation defendant was originally a membership savings bank, incorporated October 13, 1866, as distinguished from one based upon the guaranty of a capital stock. In the year 1878, and prior thereto, there was a great stress upon the administration, by reason of repeated runs, occasioned by panics among the depositors. To obviate the perils then threatening the bank's financial existence, at a meeting of the depositors held on the twenty-fourth day of June, 1878, it was determined to make the bank one of capital stock, reorganizing under section 300, Civil Code; it being hoped that such action would enhance the financial repute of the corporation. On the first day of August, 1878, the corporation also resolved to reincorporate. In accordance with the project, it was determined by such of the depositors as were sanguine in that regard, to subscribe themselves, and to open a subscription for capital stock to the amount of $250,000; to be divided into 2,500 shares of $100 each; to give the depositors the preference as subscribers; no one person to take more than $5,000, and to accept as payment the funds of such as had moneys in the bank. The subscription was effected to the extent of about $133,500, of which amount $128,975 was actually deposited in bank, including as well funds subscribed by depositors as also moneys actually paid into the bank by others, not depositors, for stock; and the parties so subscribing thereupon, without waiting until the completion of stock had been subscribed, executed the articles of incorporation, reciting that stock had been subscribed, and thereafter organized, elected directors and officers, and passed by-laws, and relieved the old board and depositors of the management of the bank, which was concurred in legally, so far as appears by all parties interested. The bank, however, did little business; some deposits were received; some investments made; but owing to the continued calls of depositors, the bank still declined in business; and, finally, on the fifth day of February, 1879, was forced practically to suspend, the business of liquidation being left to the board of directors. This board proceeded to call in as rapidly as it could the outstanding assets, to reduce them to cash, and to pay dividends, which thus far, have amounted to 65 per cent. of the deposits; the stockholders, who had handed over their deposits on account of stock subscription being excluded from participation in the dividends so declared by the directors. These stockholders now come into court for relief, claiming that their subscriptions were only conditional on the event of the entire $250,000 being subscribed; that that amount never actually was subscribed; that the proceedings had in the way of incorporation were inchoate, for the reason of the failure of the condition, and that they, the stockholders, should be relegated to their original status as depositors, and should have their share in the dividends thus far declared made good to them, and be put on a standing of equality with the remaining depositors in all respects. On the other hand, counsel representing the depositors, who are not stockholders, claims that the subscription was not a conditional one; that the plaintiff stockholders waived any condition, if such existed, by incorporating by their articles of incorporation, and by their proceeding to manage the bank as if the old association had been merged in the stockholding organization."

The subscription for said capital stock was made by each of the subscribers signing an instrument in writing, of which the following is a copy:

"SUBSCRIPTIONS OF THE CAPITAL STOCK OF THE ODD FELLOWS' SAVINGS BANK.

"Whereas, the Odd Fellows' Savings Bank, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of California, and having its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, in said state, has resolved at a meeting of said corporation, held this twenty-fourth day of June, A. D. 1878, to create a capital stock for said bank, of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, ($250,000) divided into twenty-five hundred shares (2,500) of one hundred dollars ($100) each, as provided in section 300 of the Civil Code of the State of California.

"Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, do hereby subscribe for the number of shares of said capital stock written opposite to our respective names, and we do hereby agree to pay for the same at the time and in the manner required by said corporation. Dated San Francisco, June 24, 1878. Names,—— No. of shares, —— Amount, —— Residence, ——"

The plaintiff subscribed and paid for 40 shares, $4,000. After that he availed himself of the rights and privileges of a stockholder, and did not assert or claim that his relation to the corporation was other than that of a stockholder, until he commenced this action. He now contends that he never became a stockholder, because it required a subscription of the entire capital stock provided for in the articles of incorporation, to constitute the Odd Fellows' Bank, an incorporation, and that his subscription was upon the condition that the whole amount should be subscribed.

His subscription was not made on any such express condition, and the law of this state, so far as we are advised, does not make the incorporation of a bank, or its right to commence business as such, depend upon the subscription of the entire amount of stock provided for in the articles of incorporation. "The subscription of the entire capital provided by the articles of association or charter of a corporation is ordinarily not a condition precedent to the consummation of the contract of membership and formation of a corporation." 1 Mor. Corp. § 57.

It is not shown that any material errors were committed during the trial of this case, and the findings of fact are justified by the evidence. We think the conclusions of law fully warranted by the facts found.

Judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial affirmed.

BYRD v. REICHERT, Register of State Land-Office. (No. 12,372.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 26, 1888.)

PUBLIC LANDS—UNDER STATE LAWS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE—CONTEST—RES ADJUDICATA.

Where a person has made application to purchase land from the state, and three other persons have made applications, each asking to purchase distinct parcels of the land described by the original applicant, and all three cases are referred to the same court, the fact that the court decided in favor of the original applicant's right to purchase as to two of the parcels does not entitle him to a peremptory writ of mandate to compel a conveyance of the whole of the tract claimed, before the determination of the right to purchase in the third contest.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Application by Pleasant Byrd for a peremptory writ of mandate to compel Theodore Reichert, register of the state land-office, to convey to him certain swamp and overflowed land. The writ was granted, and Reichert appeals.

Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and Frank D. Ryan, for appellant. A. P. Cottin, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The respondent, Pleasant Byrd, obtained a peremptory writ of mandate, commanding the appellant, as register of the state land-office, to prepare, have signed, and issue to him, respondent, a patent for 960 acres of swamp and overflowed land in Tulare county, described as section 1, and the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 2, in township 21 S., range 21 E., Mount Diablo meridian.

The facts involved in this controversy are as follows: The respondent made application to purchase the above-described section and a half of land, and on the eighth day of April, 1873, received from the register of the state land-office a certificate of purchase for the same. On the third day of April, 1884, one Seth Smith made application to purchase a part of the same land, and on the fifth day of April, 1884, one John H. Harter made application to purchase another part of the same land, and on the first day of February, 1887, one E. O. Miller made application to purchase still another part of the same land. On the sixth day of June, 1884, upon demand of Smith and Harter, the contests arising on their applications were referred for adjudication to the superior court of Tulare county, and on the fourth day of May, 1887, upon demand of Miller, the contest arising on his application was referred for adjudication to the same court. Actions to determine their contests were commenced in due time by both Smith and Harter, and such proceedings were afterwards had in them that final judgment was entered in the Harter case on the fourth day of April, 1887, and in the Smith case on the sixteenth day of May, 1887. These judgments were alike, and by them it was adjudged and decreed that Smith and Harter had no right to purchase any part of the lands applied for by them, but that Byrd, defendant there and respondent here, was entitled to purchase the land described in his certificate of purchase and the whole thereof, and, upon making full payment, to receive from the state a patent for the whole of said lands. Copies of these judgments, properly certified, were filed in the office of the register of the land-office on the twentieth day of May, 1887, and thereupon, having made proof, satisfactory to the register, that full payment had been made, and having surrendered his certificate of purchase, respondent requested the register to take the necessary steps to have a patent for all the land described in the certificate issued to him; but the register refused, and still refuses, to take any steps towards the issuing of a patent for that part of the land which was embraced in Miller's application, and was not embraced in the Smith and Harter applications. Thereupon this proceeding was commenced.

The question for decision is, was the respondent entitled, upon his demand, to have a patent executed and delivered to him for all the land which he claimed? It is insisted for respondent that a similar question was involved in the cases of Laugenour v. Shanklin, 57 Cal. 70, and Cunningham v. Shanklin, 60 Cal. 118, and that, under the decisions in those cases, he is clearly entitled to the relief which he obtained in the court below. The cases referred to were applications for writs of mandate against the surveyor general of the state, and the question was whether, after a contest in regard to the right of certain parties to purchase state land had been referred to the proper court and had been there tried and determined, a new party could come in and make application to purchase the same land and have his contest referred to the court for trial. It was held that it was the duty of the surveyor general to obey the directions of the court contained in the judgment upon the first contest, and that the state and its officers were estopped from selling the same land to an applicant who filed his claim pending the action, or subsequent thereto, and that the reception and filing of such an application did not create such a contest as authorized a reference to the court under section 3414 of the Political Code. From this statement it is apparent that the questions decided in those cases were not the same as, or similar to, that presented here. The land which Miller made application to purchase was not the same land as that involved in the contest of either Smith or Harter. In their cases the only issues presented and tried were whether they, or Byrd, had the right to purchase the parcels of land for which they had made application, and no question was, or could have been, raised as to whether Miller had the right to purchase the parcel claimed by him. The Code provides that, where a contest has arisen in the state land-office between opposing applicants for the purchase of lands belonging to the state, and has been referred to a court for determination, and an action has been commenced to determine it, the production of a certified copy of the order of reference "gives the court full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the action." Section 3415, Pol. Code. But if there has been no special order referring such a contest as provided in section 3414 of the Political Code, the courts can acquire no jurisdiction to hear and determine it. Danielwitz v. Temple, 55 Cal. 42. Now, when a court has acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine an action of the kind above referred to, it is evident that it can determine only such questions as are involved in the contest on which the action is based. It cannot determine as to other contests or other asserted rights, and in so far as it attempts to do so, its action, being beyond its jurisdiction, is void.

The judgments in the Smith and Hartey cases, although broad enough to cover the land applied for by Miller, must be limited to the parties and the parcels of land before the court. So far as we can see, Miller had a right to make his application, and until that application is in some way disposed of, the appellant should, we think, refuse to issue a patent for the land embraced in it.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to dismiss the petition.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with direction to the court below to dismiss the petition.

RICE v. WHITMORE. (No. 11,610.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 31, 1888.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—CONTRACT TO LEASE—LAND IN POSSESSION OF ANOTHER—ACTION FOR BREACH.

In California, it is no defense to an action to recover damages for a breach of a contract to lease that, at the time of the making of the contract, the land was in the possession of a tenant of defendant, and that the plaintiff knew that fact, and also knew that the tenant would not give up possession without a lawsuit.

2. SAME—ABANDONMENT OF AGREEMENT—INSTRUCTION.

In an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract to lease land, where defendant claims that he and plaintiff had come to the conclusion that defendant could not give possession in time for plaintiff to put in his crop, and that the contract was mutually abandoned, it is not improper for the court to instruct the jury that if defendant agreed to lease the land on certain terms, which were accepted by plaintiff, and defendant agreed to give him possession on a certain day, then a valid contract was entered into between the parties, the terms of which both were bound to perform, and if either refused or failed to substantially carry out the contract he would be liable to the other in damages for a breach, where the jury had already been instructed that they must find that defendant refused or neglected to perform the contract without plaintiff's consent, and where defendant failed to ask for any more specific instructions in regard to the abandonment.

8. SAME—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for damages for breach of a contract to lease premises, where plaintiff alleges that he owned all the necessary teams, etc., for cultivating said ranch, and had commenced to make his preparations to move onto said ranch when defendant refused to carry out the agreement, instructions that plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages for the breach all that he could have made on the ranch during the year; that he was entitled to the value of the crop that an average farmer would have raised, less the cost of raising and harvesting, which cost was to be determined by the evidence; that, if plaintiff had the stock and utensils, etc., to cultivate the ranch, or any portion thereof, without hiring, the jury have the right to take that into consideration,—are not in conflict with an instruction that, in assessing damages, they are not to assess any damages resulting to plaintiff from the loss of his labor or the use of his teams.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

Action by T. E. B. Rice against Daniel Whitmore to recover damages for breach of contract to lease certain premises. On the question of damages the court instructed the jury, at request of plaintiff, as follows: "If, then, you find that the contract was entered into substantially as claimed by the plaintiff, and that thereafter the defendant refused or neglected to carry out the terms of said agreement against the will of plaintiff, and you further find that the plaintiff has suffered damages by reason of said breach, then I charge you that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant all that he could have made on the ranch during that year; that is, he is entitled to the value of the crop that might have been raised on the ranch during that year by an average farmer, less the cost of raising, cutting, harvesting, etc., the same, and the amount raised, its cost of raising, etc., its value, you must ascertain from the evidence in the case. In determining the amount of damages to be awarded plaintiff, if you find in his favor, the jury should take into consideration all the facts and circumstances proven in the case, and if you find that plaintiff had the stock and utensils, etc., to work and cultivate the ranch or any portion of it without hiring it done, that fact you have a right to take into consideration; and, taking all the facts into consideration, the plaintiff is entitled to recover an amount equal to what he would have made had the contract been carried out."

And at request of defendant: "If the plaintiff and defendant entered into the contract set up in the complaint, and you find from the evidence that there was a breach of such contract on the part of defendant, then, in assessing damages for such breach, you must not consider or assess any damages resulting to plaintiff from loss of his labor, or the loss of the use of his teams." Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

W. L. Dudley, for appellant. W. E. Turner, (Freeman, Bates & Rankin, of counsel,) for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract.

As stated in the complaint, the contract was made by the parties in September, 1883, and was for the lease of a certain ranch in Stanislaus county, containing about 960 acres of land. It is alleged that the defendant agreed to and with the plaintiff that he "would rent, lease, and farm-let to plaintiff" the ranch for the term of one year from September, 1883, and would forthwith put plaintiff into possession thereof, and would accept as rental therefor one-fourth of all grain raised on the premises during the ensuing year, to be delivered to defendant by plaintiff at a certain warehouse in Ceres. It is further alleged that plaintiff then and there agreed to accept, lease, rent, and hire said ranch from the defendant, and to occupy and farm the same on the terms and conditions aforesaid, and that the contract then and there became mutual between the parties. It is then stated that plaintiff owned all necessary teams and outfit to cultivate and farm the ranch, and that he at once commenced to make preparations to enter upon the same, but defendant neglected and refused to put him in possession thereof, and on or about the thirty-first of October, 1883, informed him that he would not carry out the terms of the agreement in any particular, and that he would not lease, let, or rent the ranch, or any part thereof, to him; and that by reason of such neglect and refusal plaintiff sustained damages in the sum of $2,500.

The answer denies that defendant made any contract to lease the ranch to plaintiff, as stated in the complaint, and alleges that at the time of the supposed agreement one Hanscom was in possession of the land as a tenant of defendant, which fact was well known to the plaintiff, and the only agreement made was to the effect that defendant would lease to plaintiff, provided he succeeded in obtaining possession of the land from Hanscom. It is further alleged that at a subsequent time both plaintiff and defendant became satisfied that Hanscom could not be dispossessed in time to rent the land for the ensuing year, and thereupon all negotiations for leasing it were abandoned by consent of the parties, and no lease was made or entered into by or between them. The case was tried by a jury, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of plaintiff. The defendant then moved for a new trial, and, his motion being denied, has brought the case here on appeal from the judgment and order.

1. It is now insisted for appellant that the evidence did not justify the verdict, and a new trial should have been granted for that reason. We have carefully read over all the evidence set out in the transcript, and are of the opinion that it did justify the jury in finding that the agreement constituted a present lease, and was not simply an agreement to make a lease when Hanscom should be dispossessed.

2. But if this be so, it is further claimed that the agreement was void, and damages could not be recovered for its breach, because the defendant was out of possession of the premises, and the plaintiff knew that fact, and also knew that Hanscom would not give up possession without a lawsuit. There is nothing to show that the land was held adversely by Hanscom. On the contrary, he appears to have rented it by the year some 10 years before, and to have held it along from year to year under his original lease. But, however this may be, the rule invoked is the rule of common law, under which property in the adverse possession of another could not be transferred. That rule has been changed here. Under our Code, property of every kind, except a mere possibility not coupled with an interest, may be transferred. Sections 1044, 1045, Civil Code. "A right of re-entry or of re-possession for breach of condition subsequent can be transferred." Section 1046, Civil Code. "Any person claiming title to real property in the adverse possession of another may transfer it with the same effect as if in actual possession." Section 1047, Civil Code. Surely it cannot, then, be said here that a landowner cannot make a valid lease of his land until all former leases have expired, and the tenants have surrendered back to him the possession.

3. The court instructed the jury, at the request of the plaintiff, that if Whitmore, in September, 1883, offered to rent the ranch to Rice upon certain terms, and Rice accepted such terms, and Whitmore agreed to put Rice in possession of the ranch on or before the first of October, 1883, then a valid contract was duly entered into between the parties, the terms of which both parties were bound to perform; and if either party refused or failed to substantially carry out the terms of the contract, such party is, in law, liable to the other in damages for a breach of the contract. This instruction is said to have been erroneous, for the reason that one of the defenses to the action was that plaintiff and defendant became satisfied that Hanscom could not be dispossessed in time to put in a crop, and therefore all negotiations for leasing were off and abandoned by consent of the parties; that this defense was a question of fact to be determined by the jury, and was wholly ignored by the instruction. The answer is that the court had already charged the jury, as one of the necessary elements of plaintiff's case, that it must be shown that "defendant refused or neglected to carry out the terms of the agreement against the will of plaintiff;" and if defendant desired any further or more explicit instruction in reference to the abandonment of the negotiations for a lease he should have asked for such an instruction. Not having done so, he cannot now be heard to complain that it was not given.

4. It is also claimed for the appellant that the instructions upon the question of damages were conflicting, and therefore erroneous. We are unable to see any necessary conflict in these instructions. They seem to us to have stated the law to the jury quite fully and fairly, and without any substantial error.

We conclude, therefore, that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

BANCROFT v. COSBY et al. (No. 12,154.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 26, 1888.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—VENDOR'S LIEN—EFFECT OF TRANSFER OF NOTE—RETRANSFER TO VENDOR.

Civil Code Cal. § 3047 provides that "where a buyer of real property gives to the seller a written contract for the payment of all or part of the price, an absolute transfer of such contract by the seller waives his lien to the extent of the sum payable under the contract; but a transfer of such contract in trust to pay debts, and return the surplus, is not a waiver of the lien." Held that, where a vendor indorsed and delivered a purchase-money note to a third person, and the note, not having been paid, was transferred back to the vendor, the lien was suspended only, and revived on such retransfer.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

S. A. Holmes, for appellants. Wharton & Short, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to enforce a vendor's lien for the sum of $50 and interest. The vendor, after conveying the land to the vendee and receiving the latter's promissory note for the balance due, indorsed and delivered the note to a third person. The note, not having been paid, "came back to the plaintiff's possession as his own." The question is whether a vendor's lien exists. In many of the states, and in California, it is held that the lien is a personal privilege of the vendor, and is not assignable. Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 172; Williams v. Young, Id. 227; Ross v. Heintzen, 36 Cal. 321. In the latter case the court speaks of the lien being "extinguished" by the transfer; but no such question was before the court, and in all probability it meant only to say that the lien was not assignable. The case is not inconsistent with the theory that upon a transfer of the debt the vendor's right is suspended merely. Lord ELDON said in a leading case that what is called the vendor's lien "goes upon this: that a person having got the estate of another, shall not, as between them, keep it and not pay the consideration." Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329. See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1219; Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 172. It is not a specific lien, but is a mere equity capable of acquiring the force and efficacy of a lien under certain circumstances. Green v. Demoss, 10 Humph. 371; Williams v. Young, 21 Cal. 228. The right is worked out upon the notion that to prevent so great a wrong to the vendor a court of equity will impress a trust upon the land. Preston v. Ellington, 74 Ala. 138.

This trust will not be extended beyond the purpose for which it was raised, viz., the protection of the vendor. But, on the other hand, it ought to be carried as far as is necessary for his protection; in other words, when the vendor after having assigned a note for the purchase money, has been forced to take it up, the lien ought to be revived. Every consideration of justice—every consideration which induced courts of equity to create the lien in the first instance—operates to its application to such a case. For if the note was transferred in satisfaction of a debt, the debt would revive upon the non-payment, and the vendor would be in precisely the same situation that he was in before the transfer; and if he is compelled to pay the note to some subsequent holder he has still stronger grounds for relief. Lord ELDON, in one case, enforced a lien where the vendor had transferred the note, and taken it up again, saying: "That the note was discounted amounts to nothing; it was incidental to the nature of the security, and did not vary what it in substance was,—evidence of an intention to pay at four months. I do not believe that either of the parties had this refined equity in that contemplation; but I do not feel that I can refuse to give effect to it." Ex parte Loaring, 2 Rose, 79. See, also, Cotten v. McGehee, 54 Miss. 510; and the dicta in Green v. Demoss, 10 Humph. 375; Lindsay v. Bates, 42 Miss. 400, 401; White v. Williams, 1 Paige, 506. In some states the question whether the vendor's lien is extinguished by a transfer of the debt is made to turn upon whether the vendor is liable on the note. Hallock v. Smith, 3 Barb. 272; Smith v. Smith, 9 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 425, 426; Bankhead v. Owen, 60 Ala. 457; Preston v. Ellington, 74 Ala. 134; Shall v. Biscoe, 18 Ark. 142.

In California, the Civil Code contains the following provision: "Sec. 3047. Where a buyer of real property gives to the seller a written contract for payment of all or part of the price, an absolute transfer of such contract by the seller waives his lien to the extent of the sum payable under the contract, but a transfer of such contract, in trust to pay debts, and return the surplus, is not a waiver of the lien." Looking at the mere language of this provision, it might seem that a transfer of a note upon which the vendor is liable as indorser destroys his lien. But this, we think, would be too narrow a view, and one which would defeat what in the light of the decisions seems to us to be the object of the lien. We think it is not doing violence to the language to hold that a transfer of the note by an indorsement which makes the vendor liable for the debt is not an absolute transfer, within the meaning of the section, and that, in such case, the lien is merely suspended, and revives when the note is taken up by the vendor.

With reference to the point as to the homestead it is sufficient to say that we do not think it arises upon the pleadings.

We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

SUTRO v. DUNN. (No. 12,352.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 27, 1888.)

STATES AND STATE OFFICERS—STATE BONDS—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE.

The state of California, under act of April 25, 1857, issued certain bonds for the payment of expenses of an Indian war, stating on their face that they were payable "only out of any money hereafter to be appropriated by congress for the payment of such expenses." Held, that a purchaser is charged with the knowledge of the provisions of the act of 1857, and the state comptroller cannot be compelled to issue a warrant for their payment until congress creates a fund for that purpose.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Sutro petitioned to compel J. P. Dunn, state comptroller, to issue a warrant to pay Indian war bonds. The petition was denied, and petitioner appealed.

McKune & George, for appellants. G. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., R. T. Derlin, and R. M. Clarken, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is a special proceeding to compel the defendant, Hon. J. P. Dunn, comptroller, to draw a warrant in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $4,172.56 upon the Indian war bond fund for the payment of certain bonds, all of which are in the following form:

"No. 813. $1,000.

"Bond of the state of California, for war indebtedness, in conformity with an act authorizing the treasurer of state to issue bonds in payment of the expenses incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities in certain counties in this state, approved April 25, 1857.

"The State of California promises to pay to the order of the governor thereof the sum of $1,000, to be paid only out of any money hereafter to be appropriated by congress for the payment of such expenses. This bond is transferable by assignment by the owner thereof, or by his attorney in fact.

"In testimony whereof the treasurer, comptroller, and governor have respectively signed, countersigned, and indorsed these presents, and the governor has caused the seal of the state to be affixed hereto this twenty-first day of May, A. D. 1862.

D. R. ASHLEY, Treasurer.

"G. R. WARREN, Comptroller.

"Indorsed:

[Seal.] "LELAND STANFORD, Governor.

"Issued to A. L. Pardee. Certificate, 1,238."

The plaintiff is an innocent purchaser for value from Pardee, so far as legal or mercantile innocence can be considered in connection with such instruments. The court found that he purchased without notice of any defects or infirmity in said bonds other than those disclosed by the terms thereof, and by the several statutes of the state of California and the act of congress mentioned herein, namely: St. 1857, p. 262; St. 1861, pp. 298, 409; St. 1862, pp. 181, 329; St. 1863, p. 399; St. 1867-68, p. 601; Act Cong. 12 St. at Large 1861, p. 199. The statements in the bonds put the purchaser upon inquiry and he took them subject to all defects therein, and subject to all the conditions imposed by the acts of the legislature and of congress upon the subject referred to in the act of April 25, 1857. Section 3088, Civil Code; Cagwin v. Hancock, 84 N. Y. 532; Craig v. Andes, 93 N. Y. 405, Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 34, 52, 437; Bank v. Steinmitz, 64 Cal. 314. It appears from the face of the bonds that payment was dependent entirely upon the condition that congress should make an appropriation therefor. This contingency has never occurred. No fund of the state has ever been pledged for their payment. The bonds are dated May 21, 1862. Congress has not made any appropriation for the payment of claims for the destruction of property. No fund has been created in any way out of which such losses can be paid. The only provision ever made by congress is that found in the terms of the act of March 2, 1861, "for payment for services of volunteers, and for supplies, transportation, and personal service furnished or rendered to said volunteers." The purchaser knew, or was bound to know, that under the statute bonds could issue for two purposes only—First, for services, etc.; second, for the destruction of property. He was charged with the knowledge that the bonds could be paid only out of such appropriations as congress might make therefor. Congress has made an appropriation for the payment of the first class of debts or obligations mentioned, but has made no provision for the payment of the second class. Respondent cannot be compelled to draw a warrant for the payment of the bonds set out in the petition until a fund for the payment thereof has been created by congress.

Judgment affirmed.

Where a warrant by the state comptroller on the state treasurer showed that it was drawn under a section of the law authorizing issuance of warrants to the clerk of the supreme court only, and was issued to the clerk by name, the omission of his official designation was not material.

2. SAME—NEGOTIABILITY OF WARRANT.

A warrant by a state comptroller on a state treasurer is not negotiable, but may be transferred by delivery, so as to authorize the holder to demand payment, and institute suit thereon.¹

3. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS AS TO AMOUNT CALLED FOR IN WARRANT.

In an action to compel the state treasurer to pay a warrant drawn by the state comptroller in favor of the clerk of the supreme court, it will be presumed that the amounts in the clerk's account have been paid, there being no proof to the contrary by defendant.

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

G. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for appellant. Beatty, Benson & Oatman, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is a special proceeding to compel the defendant, the state treasurer, by mandate to pay a certain warrant issued by the state comptroller. The warrant was first presented for payment to Hon. D. J. Oullahan, who was at that time the treasurer, and upon his refusal to cash the same this proceeding was commenced. Judgment went for petitioner in the court below, Oullahan appealed, and his successor, Herold, has been substituted as defendant herein. The following is a copy of the warrant:

"COMPTROLLER'S WARRANT.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 10, 1885.

"The treasurer of state will pay out of the general fund, to the order of J. W. McCarthy, one thousand two hundred and thirteen dollars.

"Kind of service, sundries.

"Liability accrued March 6, 1885.

"JOHN P. DUNN, Comptroller.

[Seal.]

"No. 8,706.

"No. 2,001.

"Indorsed:

"Payable out of the appropriation for expenses of the supreme court, under section 47, C. C. P., thirty-sixth fiscal year.

"Indorsed:

"Pay to I. W. Hellman, or order.

J. W. MCCARTHY.

"ISAIAH W. HELLMAN."

¹As to what constitutes a negotiable instrument, see Hughitt v. Johnson, 28 Fed. Rep. 665, and note; Chandler v. Carey, (Mich.) 31 N. W. Rep. 309, and note.

Appellant claims that he was justified in his refusal to pay the warrant—First, because it was not issued to McCarthy, clerk of the supreme court, but to J. W. McCarthy, individually; second, because such warrants are not negotiable, and they cannot be assigned, at least not without an assignment of the indebtedness; third, it is not shown that the parties with whom the clerk contracted, and to whom the several amounts of the account were due, have been paid.

1. It is expressly stated in the answer that "said warrant No. 8,706 was drawn in favor of and delivered to J. W. McCarthy, clerk of the supreme court." The omission of the comptroller, therefore, to describe the official character of McCarthy in the warrant is not material. The warrant shows that it was issued under section 47, C. C. P., which authorizes the issuance of warrants to no one except the clerk. It was a matter of record that the account upon which the warrant was issued had been duly certified to be correct, and that thereafter the amount claimed had been audited, allowed, and approved by the board of examiners. The treasurer knew, as matter of fact, that the McCarthy named in the warrant was the clerk of the supreme court, knew his signature, and unquestionably would have paid the warrant if presented by McCarthy himself.

2. Appellant cites a large number of authorities in support of his proposition that warrants like the one above set forth are not negotiable, and that a purchaser gains no greater rights than the payee of the warrant had. This may be admitted, but what boots it? In the leading case cited by appellant, Mr. Justice FIELD says: "The warrants being negotiable in form are transferable by delivery so far as to authorize the holder to demand payment of them and to maintain in his own name an action upon them. But they are not negotiable instruments in the sense of the law merchant, so that, when held by a bona fide purchaser, evidence of their invalidity or defenses available against the original payee would be excluded. The transferee takes them subject to all legal and equitable defenses which existed to them in the hands of such payee." Wall v. County of Monroe, 103 U. S. 77. In Martin v. San Francisco, it was held, it is true, that even where there was a regular assignment of such a warrant by the person to whom it was issued the assignee could not maintain an action upon it without an assignment of the original indebtedness, (16 Cal. 285,) but it has since been said that an indorsement and delivery of the warrant would be in equity the assignment of the debt, and an authority to the assignee to receive the money. Dana v. San Francisco, 19 Cal. 491; People v. Gray, 23 Cal. 127.

The answer of defendant alleges two grounds of defense: First. That the warrant was issued without authority of law; second, that it could not be transferred by indorsement. In what respect it is claimed to be without authority of law we have not been informed. In his brief, appellant makes the following fair statement of the case, which we think is a complete answer to his first ground of defense: "It appears from the petition that said warrant was issued to the said J. W. McCarthy under the authority of section 47, C. C. P. Consequently the amount called for was to have been disbursed by him, as provided for in said section. It also appears that up to the time of drawing the warrant the provisions of said section had been complied with, and that the bill was approved for the full amount by the board of examiners. At the time the warrant was issued, and at the time it was presented for payment there was an appropriation, as provided in section 47, C. C. P., and said appropriation was unexhausted. After the issuance of the warrant, said McCarthy sold the warrant to L. W. Hellman for a valuable consideration, and indorsed on the back of the warrant the following: 'Pay to L. W. Hellman, or order. J. W. MCCARTHY.' Said Hellman afterwards sold the warrant to the plaintiff, and indorsed the same in blank, as follows: 'ISAIAH W. HELLMAN.' The court finds that both said Hellman and plaintiff purchased said warrant in good faith and for value."

3. It does not concern the treasurer whether the parties to whom the several amounts allowed in the clerk's account have been actually paid. If the clerk had presented the warrant in person to the treasurer for payment, the latter would not have troubled himself with such an inquiry, and we see no reason for such an inquiry now. None of the creditors of the clerk under this warrant complain, and the treasurer can scarcely be expected to constitute himself their guardian.

If it be conceded that the fact of non-payment by the clerk, if shown, would be a defense to this proceeding, it is sufficient to say that in this case, prima facie, the warrant is good, the presumption being that the officer has done his duty, and if there are any creditors remaining unpaid it devolved upon the defendant herein to prove the fact. No attempt was made to plead or prove it. Judgment affirmed.

MCKINNIE v. SHAFFER. (No. 12,222.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 28, 1888.)

QUIETING TITLE—RIGHT TO MAINTAIN—ACTION—HOLDER OF HOMESTEAD.

Action may be brought by the holder of a homestead interest to quiet title thereto.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

This is an action brought against the defendant, Shaffer, by Mrs. A. K. McKinnie, a widow, to quiet title to her homestead interest in property which, at the death of her husband leaving no minor heir, was community property. The demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendant appeals.

Bicknell & White, for appellants. P. W. Dooner, for appellee.

THORNTON, J. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. We see no reason why a party owning a homestead is not entitled to have his or her title to it quieted against the claims of others. Whatever interest the plaintiff has may be quieted. If a title in fee, such interest may be quieted; if a less interest, the less interest may be likewise quieted. Such we understand to be the rulings of this court. Stoddart v. Burge, 53 Cal. 394; Pierce v. Felter, Id. 18.

We will say further that, under the statute as it stood in 1879, when the order setting apart the homestead was made, the decedent having left a widow and no minor child, and the property of which the homestead was set apart being community property, the homestead so set apart became the property of the widow, A. K. McKinnie. In other words, she became the owner in fee of the property thus set apart. Code Civil Proc. 1468. It having thus become her property, there was no necessity for calling in aid an adverse possession under the statute of limitations. We cannot see how a widow can acquire title to such property by adverse possession as against an heir. Conceding that an adverse possession by the widow is averred, if we reject such portion, the complaint still states facts constituting a cause of action. Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL—REQUISITES—BOND—FOR SEVERAL APPEALS.

An undertaking, filed upon appeal from a judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, is insufficient for both appeals unless it states that an appeal has been taken from both judgment and order.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county. J. G. SWINERTON, Judge.

J. A. Louttit, for appellant. S. D. Woods and A. L. Livinsky, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss appeal from an order denying a new trial. In this cause there is a notice of appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying a motion for a new trial. In the undertaking on appeal, there is no recital that an appeal has been taken from the order. The undertaking only states that an appeal from the judgment has been taken. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the order is made on the ground that the appeal is not recited in the undertaking on appeal, and therefore the undertaking is not sufficient. In our judgment the undertaking is insufficient. Though we have held that but one undertaking on appeal is required when the appeal is from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, we cannot hold the undertaking on appeal from the order is sufficient, when no statement that such appeal has been taken, is made in the undertaking. The act of 1861, referred to by defendant, is not in force since the adoption of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial must be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. GIANCOLI. (No. 20,236.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 31, 1888.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—COMMENTS OF THE COURT.

Where the court, in the trial of an indictment for murder, in admitting evidence of defendant's flight, said to counsel, "flight is an evidence of guilt," and afterwards correctly instructed the jury as to the purpose and effect of evidence of flight, the jury could not have been misled.

2. SAME—FLIGHT AS AN EVIDENCE OF GUILT—INSTRUCTIONS.

In the trial of an indictment for murder an instruction that if the defendant fled from the scene of the homicide, and was captured 20 miles away two days thereafter, it was a circumstance to be considered as tending to prove consciousness of guilt, was not error.

3. SAME.

In the trial of an indictment for murder, an instruction that flight is not an inference of guilt, and the timid might seek safety thereby, while innocent, was properly refused.

4. SAME—REFUSAL TO GIVE INSTRUCTION.

A refusal to give an instruction for defendant, substantially embraced in instructions previously given for him, is not error.

5. HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTION.

In the trial of an indictment for murder, an instruction giving the law of justifiable homicide under the Code, but omitting to say anything about defendant's being the assailant, is not error, when it is in evidence that deceased made the attack.

6. SAME—INDICTMENT—FINDING AND FILING—DEGREE OF CRIME.

Where the testimony before the magistrate tends to support a theory of murder, the determination of the district attorney to charge the offense of murder is conclusive, so far as the validity of the information is concerned.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county.

Louis Giancoli was tried for murder, was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals.

J. A. Cooper, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and J. M. Marmon, for the People.

BELCHER, C. C. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to serve a term of four years in the state prison. He moved for a new trial, and has appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion. The homicide was committed on the twenty-second day of May, 1887, in Mendocino county. Immediately after its commission defendant fled, and was arrested two days afterwards, while traveling down the coast in Sonoma county. It is not claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, but it is insisted that several erroneous rulings were made by the court, which necessitate a reversal of the judgment. After a careful examination of the record, we fail to see that any such errors were committed as will justify a reversal.

1. The remark of the court that "flight is an evidence of guilt" was made to counsel in explanation of the ruling admitting evidence of defendant's flight, and was followed by the statement: "The court does not intimate at all that he is guilty, or that there is any evidence of guilt, but if there should be evidence of guilt, this might be given in evidence." The jury were afterwards correctly instructed as to the purpose and effect of evidence of flight, and we are therefore unable to see how they could have been misled by the remark complained of.

2. The answer of the witness who arrested defendant, that "I started to arrest him for murder, which I supposed it was," was given in explanation of the arrest, and not to prove the commission of the crime. The witness did not pretend to know anything about the facts of the case, and told only why he pursued, and when and where he arrested, defendant. His supposition, therefore, as to the nature of the offense could not, and evidently did not, influence the jury in making up their verdict, which, as we have seen, was only for manslaughter.

3. Upon the subject of flight the court, at the request of the district attorney, instructed the jury as follows: "The flight of a person suspected or charged with a crime is a circumstance to be weighed by the jury, as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt, and if you find from the evidence that the defendant fled from the scene of the homicide after its commission, and was captured some two days afterwards at a distance of twenty miles from the place where the killing occurred, I charge you that this is a circumstance to be considered by you in arriving at a verdict." This instruction was proper. The part of it objected to was taken from the opinion of this court in People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 118, where the rule announced is said to be "well settled." See, also, People v. Vasquez, 49 Cal. 560, where it was held that the court may instruct the jury that testimony has been introduced tending to prove a certain matter. The instruction asked by defendant upon the subject of flight was properly refused. It was apparently drawn rather as an argument in defendant's favor than as a statement of the law upon the matter in hand. If given it would have told the jury that: It (flight) is by no means an inference of guilt. Many men are naturally of weak nerve and timid, and, under certain circumstances, the most innocent person might seek safety in flight. A person, however conscious of his innocence, might not have the courage to stand a trial, but might, although innocent, think it necessary to consult his safety in flight. These were considerations which it was the province of counsel, and not of the court, to present to the jury.

4. Instruction No. 10 asked by defendant, conceding it to be a correct statement of the law applicable to the case, was substantially embraced in the previous instructions which were given at defendant's request. We think, therefore, that its refusal was not a material error.

5. In its charge to the jury the court stated at length the law of justifiable homicide, as declared in the Code, and in doing so used these words: "But if such person is engaged in mortal combat, he must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline such struggle before the homicide is committed." This language is objected to because "nothing is said in the instruction as to whether the defendant was the assailant or not." The provision of the Code is "but such person, or the person in whose behalf the defense was made, if he was the assailant or engaged in mortal combat, must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed." Pen. Code, § 197, sub. 3. Defendant was not the assailant, but was assaulted and knocked down by the deceased without cause or provocation. After he was down, deceased stood over him and struck him several blows on the face. Deceased had no weapon, but struck with his fist. When deceased stopped his battery, and had stepped aside, defendant arose, and, as he did so, drew a knife, and with it stabbed deceased, inflicting a mortal wound. With these facts before the jury, it was not necessary for the court to say anything to them about defendant's being the assailant. The only question was whether he was at the time in such real or apparent danger of receiving great bodily injury as to justify the killing. The instruction was authorized by the Code, and was broad enough to cover the case in hand.

6. The defendant was held to answer before the committing magistrate for manslaughter, but in the information filed against him was charged with murder. The point is made that the information should have charged only manslaughter, and that defendant was prejudiced by the charge of a higher offense. Counsel do not question the correctness of the rule laid down in People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 665, 6 Pac. Rep. 859, and People v. Vierra, 67 Cal. 234, 7 Pac. Rep. 640, to the effect that, when the testimony has been taken down and returned by the magistrate, the responsibility is thrown upon the district attorney to determine therefrom the offense to be charged; but it is insisted that the testimony returned by the magistrate clearly showed that no higher crime than manslaughter had been committed. There was, however, some evidence tending to support the district attorney's theory, and, when such is the case, we think that the determination of the district attorney is conclusive, so far as the validity of the information is concerned, however erroneous that determination may be. And if the information was valid, there can be no question of prejudice to the defendant. There could be no prejudice other than such as must result from any lawful accusation of crime.

We find no material error in the record, and, in our opinion, the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

CHAMPION MIN. CO. v. CONSOLIDATED WYOMING GOLD MIN. CO.
(No. 12,085.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 31, 1883.)

1. MINES AND MINING—UNITED LEDGES—LOCATION OF MINE.

By Rev. St. U. S. § 2336, where two quartz veins unite, the prior location takes the vein below the point of junction. In an action for trespass upon a ledge formed by the union of that of plaintiff and that of defendant, the court found plaintiff's claim to have been located in 1879, while defendant's patent dated 1874. Held, that such finding not being shown clearly contrary to evidence, it would not be disturbed on appeal; and that in view of such finding it was immaterial whether evidence offered by defendant to show a location prior to 1874 was properly or improperly admitted.

2. SAME—RIGHT TO FOLLOW LEDGE UNDER VACANT GROUND.

Plaintiff claimed that between the line of defendant's patent and that of S. there was a piece of ground not included in either of those patents, and that defendant was not entitled, as against plaintiff, to follow a ledge under such vacant piece, or to a united ledge, if found there. The court found that the locations of defendant and S. were prior to that of plaintiff; that defendant's ledge crossed at a point at which its line was identical with the line of S. Held, that defendant and S. were owners of the ledge between the extremities of their patents, and had the exclusive right to follow its dips and angles laterally; and that they had the right, as against the owner of a subsequent location, to divide the work of a ledge under the triangular piece of ground formed by the divergence of their lines.

3. SAME—TRESPASS—INJUNCTION.

Plaintiff claimed that defendant's ledge passed through the side line of defendant's patented ground into plaintiff's ground, thus making the side line in law an end line. The court found such line not to be an end line, and that there was no sufficient evidence to show where the ledge crosses the lines of defendant's patent; that the location of defendant's mine was prior to that of plaintiff; and that defendant had not mined nor threatened to mine any ground claimed by plaintiff, except a united ledge to which defendant had title. Held, that plaintiff had no claim for an injunction or for damages.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

The Champion Mining Company, the plaintiff below, appeals from a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial.

Edward Lynch, for appellant. Gaylord & Searls and Van Clief & Gear, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover damages for alleged trespasses by defendant upon the mining claims of plaintiff, and to obtain an injunction against similar trespasses in the future. The answer admits that defendant, by accident, took from plaintiff's claims gold-bearing quartz of the value of $120, but denies the other material averments of the complaint. The court below (sitting without a jury) found in favor of defendant; gave judgment for plaintiff for said $120, but for no more: and denied the prayer for an injunction. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The transcript is very lengthy; containing a great many exceptions, about a dozen maps, and several hundred pages of oral testimony and documentary evidence. The briefs (filed in addition to the oral argument) are exceedingly elaborate and able, and very ingenious. The whole record presents a formidable mass somewhat discouraging to one seeking to know what there is in it. Upon a thorough examination, however, many of the apparent difficulties vanish, and the case is resolved into a few main propositions.

Each of the parties is a mining corporation, and each owns a body of quartz mining claims. The surface ground of each party adjoins that of the other. In the ground of plaintiff there is a quartz ledge called the "Phillip" ledge, and in the ground of defendant there is a ledge called the "Wyoming." After the respective rights of the parties to these ledges had vested, it became known, for the first time, that at various levels beneath the surface, and at a general average depth of about 500 feet, these two ledges (the Phillip and Wyoming) united, and from thence downward formed only one ledge. Defendant, by accident or mistake, took $120 worth of quartz out of the Phillip ledge at a point above its junction with the Wyoming, for which judgment was confessed; but the real trespass complained of was that the defendant took gold-bearing quartz out of the united ledge below the junction. And so the main question in the case is, who owns the united ledge?

The rule by which such a question must be determined is stated in section 2336, Rev. St. U. S., and is as follows: "Where two or more veins unite, the oldest or prior location shall take the vein below the point of junction, including all the space of intersection." Consequently the main question depends upon the underlying question, which party holds under the older location? and the most important exceptions which appear in the record were to rulings of the court as to the admissibility of evidence offered upon this question of prior location.

The grantors of defendant received a United States patent for the Wyoming ledge (or, at least, for the ground in which the apex and upper part of the ledge are situated) on the nineteenth day of September, 1874. The plaintiff has not a patent for the land in which the Phillip ledge is situated, but holds a possessory title thereto under general mining customs and the laws of the United States and of this state upon the subject. And this latter kind of title is, of course, as good, for the purpose of a suit like the present one, as a patent. The defendant, for the purpose of showing a valid location of the Wyoming ledge at certain periods prior to the date of the patent, introduced, against the objections and exceptions of plaintiff, the preliminary papers and proceedings filed and had in the United States land-office upon which the patent was based. These papers and proceedings, if properly admitted, showed, or intended to show, first, that the official survey of the Wyoming mine, as afterwards incorporated into the patent, was made December 10, 1872. The application for the patent, which was filed March 8, 1873, stated that the mine was located in 1851 or 1852 by persons then unknown, and that, if recorded, the record was destroyed by the fire which burned the court-house in Nevada City in 1856; and also, among other things, that the applicants were in the quiet and actual possession of, and that there had been no opposing or adverse claim to, the premises "for two years last past," that being the statutory period of limitation for actions relative to mining claims. The court below seemed to take the view that these proceedings in the land department of the United States constituted an authoritative adjudication of the truth of the statements in the application, which bound the plaintiff. And counsel for defendant strenuously argues that, as the law of congress provides that actual possession, without any adverse claim, during the period of statutory limitation, gives a right to a patent, and as the application in question put the right to a patent on that ground, therefore it should be held to have been conclusively adjudicated that the Wyoming claim was located at least two years before the date of the application, which would be March 8, 1871.

If the determination of this appeal necessarily involved the correctness of the ruling of the court below on this point, a very grave question would be presented. Where an application for a patent to mining land has been filed in the United States land-office, and notice thereof given as required by statute, and no adverse claim has been filed, and the proceedings have regularly culminated in a patent, it may be said generally that the proceedings are conclusive against a third person as to those things with respect to which he might have filed an adverse claim. But, with respect to the united ledge which was afterwards discovered to be a union of the Wyoming and the Phillip, there was nothing in the application for a patent to the Wyoming claim which called for any contest by the owners of the Phillip. The application for the Wyoming claim, if granted, would result in a patent for only the surface ground claimed, and the ledges whose apexes were within it. If it should turn out that a ledge within that ground united with another ledge, the property of an adjoining owner, the ownership of the united ledge would have to be determined upon the principle of priority of location. Moreover, at the time of the Wyoming application and patent, the union of the two ledges at a great depth in the earth was entirely unknown, and not even suspected. The owners of the Phillip ledge, therefore, with respect to the present claim to the united ledge, would and could not have had any standing in the land department as adverse claimants to the Wyoming application. It is therefore somewhat difficult to see how the question of priority of location between the Phillip and Wyoming ledges could be adjudicated in a proceeding in which the location of the Phillip ledge was not involved at all; or how ex parte proof, offered in the Wyoming application for the satisfaction of the United States government, is admissible in the case at bar, where the contest is about something not appearing on the face of that application, or involved in that proceeding. If, therefore, the determination of this appeal necessarily depended upon the correctness of the ruling of the court below, admitting the proceedings in the land-office in evidence, we would be strongly inclined to hold such ruling to have been erroneous. In the view which we take of the case, however, it is not necessary to pass conclusively upon that question.

The court below found that there was no valid location of the Phillip ledge until 1879,—about five years after the issuance of the Wyoming patent. The finding is “that no boundaries of said location [the Phillip] were ever marked upon the ground so that the same could be readily traced prior to March 25, 1879.” This is a finding of fact; and, unless it can be successfully attacked as not being supported by the evidence, then it is immaterial whether the admission of evidence to show a location of the Wyoming claim at a date prior to the patent was erroneous or not; for, of course, the title of defendant would be good, at least from the date of the patent, and if at that time there was no location of the Phillip claim, then the Wyoming must be held to have been the prior location. And as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding on this point, we need only say that we could not disturb that finding even though we were to go far beyond the limits of the rule so often laid down by this court for the review here of questions of fact. There was clear proof of a location of the Phillip claim on the twenty-fifth of March, 1879; and the court found that there was a location on that day, but that there was none prior to that time. Now, to upset this finding, it must be affirmatively shown that, under the evidence, it was the clear duty of the court, forced upon it by evidence without material conflict, to find a location of the Phillip claim prior to 1879, and, indeed, prior to 1874,—the date of the Wyoming patent. But such a proposition is clearly not maintainable. We, of course, will not recite the evidence here; and it is sufficient to say that if the court had found the other way it would have done so upon an exceedingly slender basis.

The record shows many exceptions to rulings of the court admitting or rejecting offered evidence; but they mostly relate to evidence offered to prove or disprove a location of the Wyoming at dates prior to the patent. But, as we have stated, these rulings, whether right or wrong, were immaterial. With respect to the rulings of the court upon offers of evidence to prove or disprove the true dates of the locations of the Phillip ledge, and of the other claims of appellant, we see no material error. (What has been said of the Phillip ledge applies equally to the small location claimed by appellant called the “Muller,” and also called the “Ural Extension.” It is in the same category with the Phillip, except that the court also finds that it was never marked on the ground so that the boundaries could be readily traced, and that no gold-bearing ledge having its apex within the claim was ever discovered.) And, as the alleged trespasses were committed upon the united ledge claimed by appellant by virtue of its ownership of the Phillip ledge, the above views are determinative of the main controversy in the case against the appellant.

There are two other propositions presented by appellant. The respondent has a patented mine called the "Ural;" and the appellant claims a ledge in its adjoining ground called the "New Year's" and "New Year's Extension." And appellant contends that near the southerly end of respondent's ground the Ural ledge passes through the side line of the Ural patented ground into the New Year's ground; thus making said side line, in law, an end line. But the court finds that said line is not an end line of the Ural ledge of respondent, and that there is no sufficient evidence to show where said ledge crosses the lines of the Ural patent. It finds, also, that the location of the Ural mine was prior to that of the New Year's claims of appellant. Moreover, it finds that respondent has not mined, and does not threaten to mine, any ground claimed by appellant, except the united ledge formed by the junction of the Phillip and the Wyoming as above stated. And these findings are sustained by evidence. There is therefore no basis here for an injunction or damages.

At the northern end of the Wyoming patented ground there is another patented claim called the "Schmidt Claim," owned by the Nevada City Mining Company. And appellant contends that the north line of the one was not identical with the south line of the other; that is, that between the north line of the Wyoming, as patented, and the south line of the Schmidt, as patented, there was a small piece of ground not included within the lines of either patent; and that, therefore, the respondent would not be entitled, as against the owners of the Phillip, to follow the Wyoming ledge under this piece of land, or to the united ledge if found there. But the court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the Wyoming and Schmidt locations were both long prior to that of the Phillip; that they always adjoined each other on the north and south; that the south-west line of the Schmidt patent was for a long distance identical with the north line of the Wyoming patent; and that, where these two lines were thus identical, the Wyoming ledge crosses over the Wyoming patented ground into the Schmidt patented ground, leaving no intermediate ground between the two claims. This undoubtedly gave to the owners of the Wyoming and Schmidt claims the entire ownership of the ledge from the northerly end of the one to the southerly end of the other, with the exclusive right to follow its dips and angles laterally. It appears that at a point a considerable distance easterly of the point where the ledge crosses the line common to the Wyoming and the Schmidt, as aforesaid, the northerly patented line of the Wyoming, and the southerly patented line of the Schmidt, diverge; leaving a small triangular piece of ground between; and the two companies, by agreement, divided this piece of land—or, rather, the right to work the ledge under it—between them. This they had the right to do, as against any third party subsequent in location.

From a thorough examination of the whole case we find no reason to disturb the judgment of the court below. Judgment ordered and affirmed.

SOUTHERN CAL. LUMBER CO. v. SCHMITT et al. (No. 12,009.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 31, 1888.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—LIABILITY OF OWNER TO MATERIAL-MEN—FAILURE TO RECORD CONTRACT.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, provides that contracts for building a house shall be in writing, and before the work is begun, shall be filed with the recorder, otherwise to be void and no recovery had thereon, and that labor done and materials furnished by others than the contractor shall be deemed furnished at the instance of the owner, and be a lien. Held, that when the original contractor had not filed his contract, and the material-man had not filed any lien under the statute, the owner of the building was not liable for material furnished which he had not purchased.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN D. WORKS, Judge.

The Southern California Lumber Company sued to enforce a lien for material furnished a contractor against Charles T. Schmitt, owner of the building, and Elizabeth T. Randall, mortgagee. A nonsuit was granted, and plaintiff appeals.

Collier & Collier, for appellant. W. J. Hunsaker and J. R. Jones, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was, according to the original complaint filed therein, initiated for the purpose of obtaining a judgment against one Gorey, a contractor, for the amount of a bill for materials furnished him by the plaintiff, and against Charles T. Schmitt, to foreclose a mechanic's lien on his building, which Gorey had contracted to build, and in the construction of which the materials bought by Gorey from the plaintiff had been used. Elizabeth T. Randall was also made a party to the suit as a mortgagee of Schmitt. Finding that the contract between Gorey and Schmitt was void because it had not been filed in the office of the county recorder before the commencement of the building, as is requisite to its validity under chapters 1, 2, 3, tit. 4, Code Civil Proc., the plaintiff filed an amendment to the first complaint, in which, setting out the fact that the contract aforesaid was void, it is sought to hold Schmitt and Gorey both personally liable for the amount of the indebtedness contracted by Gorey, and to enforce a lien in favor of the plaintiff as against Schmitt's building. Upon the evidence which was introduced before the court, a motion was made by Gorey and Schmitt for a nonsuit, which was granted, and judgment entered accordingly, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The only point made by the appellant in favor of a reversal of the judgment is that the court erred in refusing to render a personal judgment against Schmitt, instead of granting the nonsuit as to him. It is not controverted that the evidence shows that both the contract of Gorey with Schmitt, because not filed according to law, and the lien of the plaintiff, because the affidavit attached to it was deficient, were void; but it claimed, although no lien exists on the building as to the contractor, and those who may claim under him, and none as to the material-man, that nevertheless, according to section 1183, Code Civil Proc., that the plaintiff ought to have had a personal judgment against Schmitt, with whom he never had any contract to furnish the building materials. The language of the statute under which this contention is made, speaking of the contracts between contractors and owners of buildings, is: "All such contracts shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds $1,000, and shall be subscribed by the parties thereto, and shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder of the county, or city and county, where the property is situated, who shall receive $1 for such filing; otherwise they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case, the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Section 1183, Code Civil Proc.

We cannot agree with the appellant in a case where neither the contractor nor the material-man has filed any lien, such as is given them by statute, that under the section, supra, a personal judgment for the value of the materials furnished may be had against the owner of the building, who did not purchase them, and who was under no contract with the material-man, either express or implied, to pay for them. That section, as it seems to us, means to preserve the right of the material-man who has duly filed his lien according to the statute, in cases where the contractor has failed by reason of not filing his contract to preserve the material-man's rights thereunder; and the language of the statute announces the law to be that where such is the case the material-man may duly file his lien, and enforce it just as if the owner of the building had bought from or contracted for the materials with the material-man in the beginning, instead of the contractor.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

HAGLE v. HAGLE.¹ (No. 12,101.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 28, 1888.)

DIVORCE—DESERTION—EVIDENCE.

In an action by the husband for divorce for desertion, the wife answered, charging that the husband's cruelty forced her to leave. There was no evidence to support plaintiff's testimony, except that defendant lived at some distance in a house owned by plaintiff, and had said she was not coming back to his farm, and also the record of a former suit by the wife for divorce for cruelty, where it was found he was not guilty of cruelty, and the divorce was denied, but the wife was allowed $25 per month. Held not sufficient to warrant a divorce under Civil Code Cal. § 130, providing that a divorce cannot be granted on the uncorroborated statements, admissions, or testimony of the parties.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; T. B. MCFARLAND, Judge.

Grove L. Johnson, for appellant. Clinton L. White, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The plaintiff, John Hagle, seeks in this action to obtain a divorce from his wife, Julia A. Hagle, on the ground of desertion. The defendant denied that she had deserted the plaintiff, and alleged that she had lived separate and apart from him for about three years without any fault on her part, but because of the cruel treatment she had received from him. The parties were married in 1869. They owned and lived on a farm in Sacramento county until July, 1882. They also owned a dwelling-house in the city of Oakland. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the judgment roll in an action commenced on the fifth of October, 1883, by the defendant against the plaintiff in this action for a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. It appeared from the record in that case that the defendant had not been guilty of any of the acts of cruelty alleged in the complaint. The application for a divorce was, therefore, denied. The court found, however, that "his conduct as a husband was cold, harsh, and disagreeable, making it unpleasant for plaintiff to live with him. Plaintiff's conduct as his wife was also not free from blame. The marriage was an unhappy one from the beginning. Plaintiff is several years older than defendant, and for a long time their relations to each other have been unpleasant. From the evidence and the conduct of the parties in court there is now no love or affection between them. * * * There is no probability of the parties ever living together again as husband and wife. Plaintiff will soon be getting too old to earn a living by work, being now about fifty-four years old. Twenty-five dollars per month would be a reasonable sum under the circumstances to be provided by the defendant for the maintenance of plaintiff." And, as a conclusion of law, it was found that "defendant should pay to plaintiff for her maintenance under the provisions of section 136 of the Civil Code, the sum of twenty-five dollars per month." It was accordingly "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that until the further order of this court the said defendant, John Hagle, do pay to the plaintiff, Julia A. Hagle, for her maintenance, the sum of twenty-five dollars per month, payable on the first day of each and every month, commencing on the first day of March, A. D. 1884." From the judgment so entered against him, the defendant appealed to this court, where the judgment was affirmed. Hagle v. Hagle, 68 Cal. 588, 9 Pac. Rep. 842.

The plaintiff testified that the defendant left him in July, 1882, and went to their house in Oakland, but returned twice after that, the last time in July or August, 1883, when she remained seven or eight days cooking for the men; that she then went away again without his consent, and has never since returned; that she had told plaintiff she would not stay on the ranch any longer because she could make her living easier; that he sent word to her to return home; if she could not make her own living to come back on the ranch, because he could not keep up two places. Other witnesses testified that the defendant had said "she was not going to work herself to death on the ranch any longer." Judgment of nonsuit was entered. The plaintiff then moved for a new trial, and his motion being denied, he appealed from the judgment and order.

1 It is claimed that the decision in Hagle v. Hagle, 68 Cal. 588, 9 Pac. Rep. 842, in effect establishes the right of the superior court to require support for the wife when she is living separate and apart from her husband without grounds for divorce, and against his will and consent; and that there could be no desertion on the part of the wife while living separate and apart from her husband under the decree that was entered in the former suit. It is said in the findings in that case that "there is no probability of the parties ever living together again as husband and wife." The divorce was not denied for any of the causes stated in section 111, Civil Code; and there is nothing in the judgment roll which shows that they were not then living together in the same house, or, if living apart, that the separation was not by mutual consent. There is nothing in the decree which requires the defendant therein to support his wife while she is living separate and apart from him without statutory grounds for divorce and against his will and consent. If there were, it would be sufficient to say that there is no authority for such a judicial separation. We are not called upon to determine the power of the court under section 136, in cases of recrimination and other statutory defenses and excuses for absence from the domicile. There is in this state no such thing as divorce a mensa et thoro. Section 136, Civil Code, does not authorize the allowance of support for the wife, and at the same time a release from her marital obligations. In the absence of a statute authorizing it there is no limited divorce. If the legislature had intended to provide for the support of the wife by the husband when she is living separate and apart from him, without grounds for an absolute divorce or statutory excuse for absence from his home, it would have specified the grounds upon which the separation might be declared. It surely was not intended that it should be left to the superior judge in his discretion to say what is a sufficient cause for a divorce from bed and board. A provision similar to that contained in section 136, Civil Code, was construed in P—— v. P——, 24 How. Pr. 197. And this case is cited by the Code commissioners in support of the rule. Annotated Civil Code, § 136. See, also, Proposed Civil Code of New York, § 68, note. The objects of the provision evidently are to enable the court in a proper case to aid in a restoration of domestic harmony, to prevent the breaking up of the family—especially where there are children of tender age and delicate health—and to require penurious husbands to furnish decent support for their wives, and for the care and education of the children, where the parties have no cause for divorce on statutory grounds, or where the innocent party has condoned the offense.

It may be that when the allowance was made to Mrs. Hagle in the former action she was living apart from her husband through no fault of his, but that he was willing, indeed anxious, that she should remain away. In that case, he could not refuse to comply with the order made by the court, simply because of her absence from his house; but the indulgence of her husband in that regard for any length of time would not relieve the wife from her marital obligations to live with him, when required, unless his conduct was such as the statute declares to be a lawful excuse for absence from the dwelling-place. We do not say that support can be required only when the parties are living together. See sections 97-99, 104, 107, 111, 124, 128, Civil Code. The decision in Hagle v. Hagle, 68 Cal. 588, 9 Pac. Rep. 842, when read in the light of the facts of the case, and the questions there before the court, is in harmony with what has been said herein.

2. The respondent contends that the general effect of all the evidence is to establish that the plaintiff and defendant were living apart by mutual consent. However this may be, the judgment of the lower court in cases of this kind should not be reversed unless the evidence is so clear that this court can declare it to be the inevitable duty of the court below to render a different judgment. We cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in considering or weighing the evidence introduced by the plaintiff. The parties had a ranch in the country, and a house in Oakland. There was evidence from which the court might have found that, for a time at least, both parties contemplated making the house at Oakland their residence; that there was a mere quarrel as to where they should live; that they resided at different places for a certain time, by mutual consent; and that there was not that corroboration of the testimony of the plaintiff which is required by section 130, Civil Code. We cannot say that the court below was bound to grant a divorce.

Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; MCKINSTRY, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment; but I dissent from the view that a decree in a divorce case directing the husband to furnish certain support to the wife can be valid only when the parties lived together. I do not think that such is the law, because section 136, Civil Code, makes no such distinction. Moreover, that section provides that the allowance for maintenance may be made "in an action for divorce" when "judgment for divorce is denied;" and how could there be a bona fide action for divorce while the parties were living together? It is true that in this state there can be no divorce a mensa et thoro; but a decree a mensa et thoro is a very different thing from the mere fact of married people living apart. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—DISBARMENT.

Charges against an attorney for the purpose of disbarring him held not sustained by the evidence.

In bank.

Proceedings for the disbarment of E. G. Knapp, attorney at law.

Complainants, who were the debtors of a client of respondent on a judgment confessed by them April 6, 1886, in about $10,000, charged respondent as follows: (1) With having, through the agency of his client, the complainants' creditor, induced them to confess this judgment by promising to stay execution thereon for one year, and with having violated this promise by issuing and levying execution on said judgment, thereby defrauding them; (2) with having misled the superior court of Stanislaus county by a false statement of fact regarding the evidence of one Joseph Lord, a witness in a case brought by complainants to stay this execution; (3) with having, by an artifice, secured the deposition of one T. Vinzent before a notary in the city and county of San Francisco, without proper notice, and by an improper use of the notary's subpoena; (4) with having induced one E. Donovan to make an affidavit contrary to the fact. The petition was verified by the five complainants. Respondent denied the truth of the allegations of the petition. The evidence was taken orally before the court in bank on May — and May —, 1887.

D. S. Terry and W. E. Turner, for complainants. Warren Olney, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding under chapter 1, tit. 5, Code Civil Proc., for the removal of respondent as an attorney and counselor. We think the evidence insufficient to sustain any of the charges preferred against him. Therefore the proceeding is dismissed.

BELL et al. v. BEAN. (No. 12,112.)

(Supreme Court of California February 2, 1888.)

1. NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—CONSIDERATION—INNOCENT PLEDGEEES.

Where a promissory note, drawn payable to "B. or bearer," for $2,500, was pledged to plaintiffs as security for a debt of $200.14, and upon the trial it was shown that the note was without consideration, held, that plaintiffs, as innocent pledgees for value, can only recover against the maker the amount of the debt secured.

2. SAME—ACTIONS ON—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Upon the trial of an action by an innocent pledgee for value of a promissory note, payable to "B. or bearer," against the maker, the admission of evidence tending to limit defendant's liability, and showing no consideration, was harmless, where judgment was rendered for pledgee for full amount of his claim.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; F. D. SOWARD, Judge.

Action by H. C. Bell & Co. against Joel Bean, upon a promissory note for $2,500 payable to Philander C. Bean or bearer, and assigned to plaintiffs. Judgment for plaintiffs for $200.14. Motion for a new trial overruled, and plaintiffs appeal.

Hundley & Gall, for appellants. P. Van Clief, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs as the assignees of a certain promissory note made and executed by the defendant for the sum of $2,500, payable to his brother, Philander C. Bean, or bearer. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs in the sum of $200.14 with interest. From that, and an order refusing the plaintiffs a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The findings show that the defendant was the superintendent and agent of a certain mining corporation engaged in the prosecution of its business in the county of Sierra, in this state. That Philander C. Bean was an employe of that corporation, acting under the orders of the defendant, as superintendent aforesaid. That the defendant had no sort of authority or right from that corporation to make any promissory note which would bind it in any way, nor any authority whatever to settle or compromise any claim or demand for damages which any of the employes or laborers for that corporation may have sustained by any negligence or other wrongful act of it or its agents. That before the twenty-second day of February, 1883, the defendant as such agent of the corporation had employed his brother, Philander C. Bean, Lewis Nevins, David Lewis, and others to work in the capacity of miners of the same class, and about the same business, and that in their employment the defendant exercised ordinary care in their selection as men competent for the duties falling to them in said business and employment. That on the twenty-second day of February, 1883, the mine belonging to the corporation was being worked by the hydraulic process, and the water and débris which was thereby discharged passed through an under-ground bed-rock tunnel. That the tunnel became clogged and obstructed, as it had often before been, so that it would not discharge the water and débris; whereupon Philander C. Bean, Lewis Nevins, and two Chinamen were sent to clear the tunnel of its obstructions in the ordinary and proper way, and in the same mode in which such clearance had been frequently before that time effected; in which operation there was no danger existing to the workmen if they exercised proper care, and the supply of water let into the tunnel was properly regulated by the men at work therein. That, for the purpose of regulating the water as directed by those thus working, the defendant and one David Thomas remained on the outside of the tunnel. The upper end of the tunnel connected with a vertical shaft, through which the water and débris entered the tunnel. If the water should rise in the shaft to any considerable extent, there was more or less danger that the pressure caused thereby would break the obstruction in the tunnel, and permit the water so to rush out through the tunnel as to cause injury to the workmen engaged therein.

The men in the tunnel having been for some time at work, the defendant sent David Lewis to them to see how they were progressing in their undertaking, and if they were in want of anything. On arriving at the tunnel, Davis was told by Nevins and Philander C. Bean to go out and tell the defendant to put on a large head of water, as it was their opinion that the tunnel was then in a condition to receive it. The defendant went to comply with this request; leaving Lewis and a boy on the watch, so that if the water should rise too rapidly in the shaft they could turn it off. After his departure, Lewis disobeyed instructions, and without the authority or knowledge of the defendant, or any one acting for the corporation, left his station, leaving the boy to watch the shaft. The boy, finding the water rising too fast, tried to notify Lewis in time so that danger to the workmen might be averted, but, before this could be accomplished, the obstructions in the tunnel were broken, the water rushed through, and severely injured Philander C. Bean. This was before any water turned on by the defendant, as requested by Philander C. Bean, ever reached the shaft. It is also found that neither the defendant, nor the corporation for which he acted, was guilty of any negligence or want of care tending or contributing in any degree to the injury of Philander C. Bean.

It appears that, after this, one Proseus and Philander C. Bean met at the defendant's house, Proseus professing to act as the attorney of P. C. Bean, for the purpose of conferring about the injury which the latter had suffered; the result of which was, they induced the plaintiff to execute a promissory note for $2,500, contemporaneously with a written agreement limiting the defendant's responsibility thereon to a sum much less than the note called for. It seems that at that interview no one pretended to assert that the defendant was in any way responsible for P. C. Bean having been injured, or that the defendant or the corporation were under any obligation to pay P. C. Bean any money whatever. But it seems Proseus threatened that if the defendant did not settle the matter as proposed, that he would sue him, and put him to as much cost as it would suffice to pay what he would have to pay by reason of giving the promissory note and agreement. The defendant being influenced by the threat, and having a sympathy for his brother's misfortune, and hoping that his making the note might induce the company he represented to pay P. C. Bean some money by way of compensation for his injury, executed the note and agreement, when there was no real claim for damages existing in favor of P. C. Bean, either as against the defendant or the corporation. There was in fact no consideration whatever to support the note and agreement. The defendant not paying the first obligation, Proseus requested him to renew it by making the note sued upon. But no consideration whatever existed to support the second note, which Proseus afterwards gave in pledge, but did not actually assign, to the plaintiffs, as security to them for a debt of $200.14 which Proseus owed the plaintiffs, which was unpaid at the time this action was brought.

Upon these findings, which are fully supported by the evidence, the court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, as innocent pledgees of the note, for the amount of Proseus' indebtedness to them, with interest.

We do not perceive how that tribunal could have rendered any other judgment than it did. The letter of Burgess introduced in evidence, against the plaintiff's objection, was simply for the purpose of showing that the corporation had refused to pay P. C. Bean any damages; and this was material, under the agreement made contemporaneously with the first note, which limited the defendant's liability very largely in the event that the corporation could not be persuaded to pay anything; and it was material as going to show what sort of a claim, whether bona fide or pretended, was the consideration of the note. In no event can we perceive how its admission worked any injury to the plaintiffs. The claim made against the defendant and the corporation was baseless, and did not furnish any consideration sufficient to support the contract sued on, except as to the innocent pledgees for value. They are fully reimbursed for all they can claim by virtue of the security they held; and neither Proseus nor P. C. Bean have ever had any claim, legal or equitable, against the defendant growing out of the transaction. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

BYRNE v. ALAS et al. (No. 11,885.)

(Supreme Court of California. January 31, 1888.)

PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANTS—RIGHTS OF MISSION INDIANS.

Defendants, Mission Indians, and their ancestors, had been in continuous, open, and notorious peaceable and exclusive possession and use of certain lands since 1815, included within the boundaries of a Mexican grant, made December 31, 1842, which grant was confirmed by the United States, and a patent issued therefor, under which plaintiff held; but the Indians had never presented their claim to the board of land commissioners appointed by the act of congress, passed March 3, 1857, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claim in the state of California." Held, in an action of ejectment, where no statute of limitations was relied on, that the Mexican grant conveyed the fee to the grantee, subject to the right of possession in the Indians acquired under the laws of Spain and Mexico; and these rights were not impaired by the acquisition of the territory by the United States, nor by a failure to present their claim to said board.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. T. McNEALY, Judge.

Action of ejectment by M. Byrne against Antonio Alas, and about 20 others, Mission or Pueblo Indians. There was judgment for plaintiff below, and defendants appeal. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Shirley C. Ward, Special U. S. Atty., for Mission Indians, (Wicks & Ward, of counsel,) for appellants. A. B. Hotchkiss, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The complaint in this action is in the usual form in ejectment. The defendants—over 20 in number—are Mission or Pueblo Indians, claiming the land by virtue of their possession, and the continuous, open, and exclusive use and occupancy by their predecessors and ancestors ever since the year 1815. The plaintiff had judgment in the court below upon the following agreed statement of facts: "First. That the premises here in controversy are included within the exterior boundaries of the Mexican grant of the San Jacinto rancho, made December 31, 1842; that said grant was duly confirmed by the United States courts, and that a United States patent issued therefor January 17, 1880; that at the time of the commencement of this action plaintiff held legal title to the premises in controversy as the legal successor of the patentee from the government. Second. That the defendants here are Mission or Pueblo Indians; that their ancestors and predecessors have been in the continuous, open, and notorious peaceable and exclusive possession, occupancy, and use of the premises in controversy, claiming adversely to all the world ever since, and for a long time prior to, the establishment of the Mexican republic, to-wit, ever since the year 1815; that the defendants never presented their claim to the land in controversy to the board of land commissioners appointed by the act of congress passed March 3, 1851, and entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claim in the state of California.' It is further agreed that all defense of the statute of limitations is hereby waived on the part of the defendants herein."

1. The questions presented for our consideration upon these facts are difficult and important. The civilized and Christianized Indians of the Californias, and, indeed, of all the Spanish colonies, seem to have been treated as the special and favorite wards of the Spanish sovereigns. Their moral and spiritual welfare and improvement were regarded as matters of great interest to the country, and their personal security, peace, prosperity, and rights of property were most jealously guarded through legislation and by those in authority. In these respects the contrast between the policy of the Spanish and Mexican governments towards their aborigines, and that manifested in some of the English colonies during contemporaneous reigns, is quite marked. Early in the sixteenth century King Philip commanded that settlements on and apportionments of the new territories should be without damage to the Indians, and "that the farms and lands which shall be given to the Spaniards shall be without prejudice to the Indians, and that those which have been given to their prejudice and damage shall be returned to whom by law they may belong." 2 White, Rec. 51. It was made the special duty of local judges to visit the farms of the Indians, without previous request so to do, and ascertain whether the Indians had suffered any injury in person or in property; and, if deemed best, after due notice, to remove them to some other place. It was provided that "the Indians shall be left in possession of their lands, hereditaments, and pastures in such manner as that they shall not stand in need of the necessities of life." No compositions were admitted of lands which Spaniards had acquired from Indians illegally; and the protectors were commanded to procure all illegal contracts to be annulled. "The broad field of Spanish jurisprudence bristled all over with fortifications for the protection of the Indians. The government of Spain, while careful of their proprietary rights, expended much for their conversion to Christianity. As soon as the Indians became sufficiently pacified, the governors (adelantados) were to distribute them among the colonists, who were to take charge of them, and watch over their welfare, as provided in book 6 of the Recopilacion de las Indias. Laws were provided for the founding of Indian pueblos or towns. It is clear from the whole tenor of the Spanish and Mexican laws, whether in the form of pueblos or ranchos, that the Indians are entitled in equity and in good conscience, and even according to the strict rigor of the laws, to all the lands they have, or have had, in actual possession for cultivation, pasture, or habitation, when such domain can be ascertained to have had any tolerably well-defined boundaries. Both Spain and Mexico have acknowledged this principle to be a just one." Hall, Mex. Law, §§ 38, 40, 151, 153-155, 159-161; also, 1 White, Rec. 411; 2 White, 24, 34, 48, 53, 54, 59, 703.

At first the Indians were permitted, in the presence of the judge, to sell their real and personal property at public auction; but in 1781 a decree was published prohibiting the Indians from selling their real estate without license from the proper authority. This remained in force until the independence of Mexico, which made all inhabitants of the Mexican nation equal before the law. The plan of Iguala, adopted in February, 1821, (when the relation between Mexico and Spain ceased and the sovereignty became vested in the Mexican nation,) declared that "all the inhabitants of New Spain, Africans or Indians, are citizens of this monarchy, * * * and that the person and property of every citizen shall be respected and protected by the government." These principles were reaffirmed by the treaty of August 24, 1821, between the Spanish viceroy and the revolutionary party, and the declaration of independence, issued on the twenty-eighth of September, 1821, reaffirmed the principles of said plan. After the acquisition of California from Mexico, the United States was bound, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to respect and protect all titles, both legal and equitable, acquired previous to the cession; and it devolved upon congress to prescribe methods and steps necessary to a just, speedy, and effective determination of the rights of claimants. Much perplexity existed as to how this was to be accomplished, owing to ignorance as to the condition of land titles here at that time. In July, 1849, William Carey Jones was appointed a "confidential agent of the government to proceed to Mexico and California for the purpose of procuring information as to the condition of land titles in California," to aid, no doubt, in securing intelligent legislation upon the subject. His report was made in March, 1850, to the secretary of the interior, who laid the same before congress. After an extended consideration of this report in congress, the act of March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in the state of California," was passed. In this report Mr. Jones thus speaks of the rights of Indians: "I am also instructed to make an inquiry into the nature of Indian rights (to the soil) under the Spanish and Mexican governments. It is a principle constantly laid down in the Spanish and colonial laws that the Indians shall have a right to such land as they need for their habitations, for tillage, and for pasturage. * * * Special directions were given for the selection of lands for the Indian villages in places suitable for agriculture, and having the necessary wood and water. * * * Agreeably to the theory and spirit of these laws, the Indians in California were always supposed to have a certain property or interest in the missions. * * * We may say, therefore, that however maladministration of the law may have destroyed its interest, the law itself has constantly asserted the rights of the Indians to habitations and sufficient fields for their support. The law always intended the Indians of the missions—all of them who remained there—to have homes upon the mission grounds. The same, I think, may be said of the large ranchos—most or all of which were formerly mission ranchos—and of the Indian settlements or rancherías upon them. I understand the law to be that whenever Indian settlements are established, and the Indians till the ground, they have a right of occupancy in the land they need and use, and whenever a grant is made which includes such settlements, the grant is subject to such occupancy. This right of occupancy, however, at least when on private estates, is not transferable, but whenever the Indians abandon it, the title of the owner becomes perfect. Where there is no private ownership over the settlement, as where the lands it occupies have been assigned it by a functionary of the country thereto authorized, there is a process, as before shown, by which the natives may alien their title. I believe these remarks cover the principles of the Spanish law in regard to Indian settlements, as far as they have been applied in California, and are conformable to the customary law that has prevailed there. The continued observance of this law, and the exercise of the public authority to protect the Indians in their rights under it, cannot, I think, produce any great inconvenience, while a proper regard for long-recognized rights and a proper sympathy for an unfortunate and unhappy race would seem to forbid that it should be abrogated unless for a better. * * * In the wild or wandering tribes the Spanish law does not recognize any title whatever to the soil."

It was held in Leese v. Clarke, 3 Cal. 17, that every Mexican grant must be determined and its validity established by the fundamental law of the Mexican congress, passed in 1824, the regulations of 1828, and the ordinances of the departmental legislature consistent therewith. Under these laws and regulations the territorial governors were authorized to grant—with certain specified exceptions—vacant lands. Hall, Mex. Laws, 504; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 590, note. If it be true that under the laws of Mexico only vacant lands could be granted, and that grants were to be without prejudice to Indians, it would seem that the lands in controversy, having been in the undisturbed possession of defendants and their ancestors ever since 1815, were not subject to grant so as to cut off the right of occupancy; and, as it is expressly provided in the grant before us, that "he (Estudillo) shall in no way disturb nor molest the Indians who are established or living thereon at the present time," the patentee and his grantee, under the law and the terms of the grant, took the fee, subject, at least, to the right of occupancy by the Indians; and those rights are still preserved, unless the Indians forfeited them by failure to present their claims to the board of land commissioners appointed by the act of March 3, 1851.

The nations of Europe, in whose behalf discoveries and settlements were made on this continent, established among themselves by common consent the principle that discovery gave title to the government by whose subject or authority it was made. The relations between the discovering nations and the natives were matters of regulation, but it became the universal rule that, where the lands were in the actual possession of Indians, the ultimate fee (incumbered with the Indian right of occupancy) should be considered to be in the discovering sovereign, and its successors, with the condition attached that the political power alone—the legislative or executive department—might extinguish the Indian right of occupancy, and leave the fee unincumbered to pass to the grantee or patentee of the government. Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. 195; Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. 575. With the question of extinguishment the courts have nothing whatever to do except to inquire whether the right of occupancy has been extinguished by the legislative or executive department. Of course, the dominant powers were not required to recognize any right in the natives to the soil which the former had acquired by conquest. But, while claiming the right to acquire and dispose of the soil, the discoverers recognized the right of occupancy,—a usufructuary right in the natives. They accordingly made grants of land occupied by Indians, and these grants were held to convey a title to the grantees, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy. Buttz v. Railroad Co., 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100; Beecher v. Wetherby, 95 U. S. 517.

Among all the sovereigns who established a foothold on this continent, none manifested so great an interest in the Indians, so great a solicitude for their welfare and happiness, as the Spaniards. The kings of Spain recognized in the Indian an inferior man, committed by Divine Providence to their benevolent charge, and to be elevated by their kindness and instruction to the dignity and condition of a Christian. 2 White, Rec. 40-48. Pueblos or settlements were established for them. They were given the right of possession within them. Full provision for this was made prior to 1815, when the ancestors of these defendants took possession, and of course prior to the adoption of the plan of Iguala. Not only is the law for the establishment of the pueblos older than the title of Mexico, but the actual establishment of the Indians in pueblos and the settlement of the ancestors of the defendants thereon antedated the succession of Mexico. The Mexican nation was bound to respect the rights of the Indians, for under the plan of Iguala "the person and property of every citizen (African or Indian) shall be respected and protected by the government." And that these rights were respected is apparent from the terms of the grant to Estudillo. In the petition of Estudillo to the governor, he promises not to molest the Indian inhabitants. The petition was referred to the prefect for proceedings to be had, inquiring especially as to the wish or desires of the Indians. A return was made that the Indians were "willing that the applicant should settle upon the place, the mentioned Indians offering furthermore that, as soon as the land will be occupied, those of them who are moving about will get together and live contented; that the land, formerly a part of the mission of San Luis Rey, is now vacant;" and in the grant the first condition imposed is that he shall in no way disturb or molest the Indians who are established or living thereon. It is provided: "Fifth. If he contravene these conditions, he will forfeit his right to the land, and it shall be open to denouncement by another party." It must be presumed that all these inquiries and conditions were made in accordance with the principles of existing law, and that the grant in pursuance thereof protected the possession of the Indians as against the proprietary ownership of the grantee. There is nothing in the colonization laws of 1824 or the regulations of 1828 indicative of a purpose by Mexico to depart from the traditional policy of the Spanish government. This grant shows that the same old rights were recognized and adhered to,—the right of Indians to occupy lands upon which they had been placed,—and that the fee should be granted, if at all, subject to such right of occupancy. The grant did not annul the rights of the Indians, or estop them from claiming the same; on the contrary, it by its terms expressly preserves those rights.

From the examination we have been able to give the Spanish and Mexican laws, we think that the statement of William Carey Jones, which we have quoted above, is fully sustained by the authorities. If there has been any act of the legislative or executive department of either the Spanish or Mexican government for the extinguishment of the usufructuary interest of the defendants or their ancestors, we have been unable to find any record of it. The grant, being a part of the Mexican archives, is a public document. Rhodes v. Bell, 2 How. 405; Romeo v. U. S. 1 Wall. 742.

2. It becomes necessary to inquire to what extent, if at all, the confirmation of the Estudillo grant and the United States patent affected the claim of these defendants. The fifteenth section of the act of March 3, 1851, provides that the decrees, or any patent issued under the act, "shall be conclusive between the United States and claimants only, and shall not affect the interests of third persons." Under this clause the rights of the Indians were preserved without presenting their claims. The patentee took the title in fee, subject to the Indian right of occupancy. The rights of the defendants and their ancestors, existing before the change of sovereignty, were preserved to them. The confirmation of the grant to Estudillo was also a confirmation of defendants' rights. Estudillo took all he was entitled to, and no more,—the legal title. That was all the United States could give him. The right which the defendants and their ancestors held, and could have enforced at the time of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo as against a Mexican grantee, passed to Estudillo in trust for them, by the decree of confirmation and the patent. The patent was based upon a Mexican grant. The land never was any part of the public domain of the United States, although held subject to the trust of protecting the interests of claimants under the former sovereign. The patent, therefore, passed the legal title to the patentee burdened with whatever equities existed at the time of the cession of California in favor of third persons. Under the treaty the government of the United States stood in the place of the Mexican government. Its patent confirmed the grant; proclaimed it to be good; neither added to nor detracted from it in any way. It left the title of Estudillo just as it was at the time of the treaty, so far as the Indians were concerned, and it remained thereafter as to them just as it would have remained if the treaty had not been made. If the Indians were entitled to possession before the date of the patent, they were entitled to it afterwards, so long as any of the community remained in actual possession. So far as we have been able to learn, nothing remained for them to do under the laws of Spain or Mexico to complete their right of possession. Neither was there any act or writing required on the part of the government. Their right was therefore complete. Leese v. Clark, 3 Cal. 17; Teschemaker v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 11; Boggs v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 297; Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal. 415; Beard v. Federy, 3 Wall. 489. Furthermore, section 16 of the act of March 3, 1851, provides "that it shall be the duty of the commissioners herein provided for to ascertain and report to the secretary of the interior the tenure by which the Mission lands are held; and those held by civilized Indians, and those who are engaged in agriculture or labor of any kind; also, those which are occupied and cultivated by pueblo or rancheros Indians." This language indicates that Congress did not intend that the rights of the Indians should be cut off by a failure on their part to present their claims, but that it should be the duty of the commissioners to ascertain and report the tenure by which they held their lands; and this is in harmony with the suggestions made in that behalf by Mr. Jones.

Inasmuch as the rights of the Indians were valid rights, existing at the date of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo,—rights which came to them by virtue of the laws of Mexico and of Spain,—the patent was conclusive only as between the United States and the grantee; and in view of the nature of their claim, and the time when their rights attached, we think they are third persons within the meaning of section 15 of the act. Teschemaker v. Thompson, Beard v. Federy, supra; U. S. v. White, 23 How. 253; Adam v. Norris, 103 U. S. 593; Miller v. Dale, 92 U. S. 473. The legal title secured to Estudillo and his grantees must be held by them charged with the right of occupancy by the defendants. Where a claim was held subject to any trust before presentation to the board, the trust was not discharged by a confirmation and subsequent patent. The confirmation inured to the benefit of the confirmer only so far as the legal title was concerned. The confirmation established the legal title in Estudillo, but did not determine the relation between him and third persons. The trust was not stated, but the legal title was none the less subject to the same trust in the hands of the claimant. Townsend v. Greeley, 5 Wall. 335; Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530. The defendants, under our system of pleadings and practice, are permitted to show in ejectment that the plaintiff holds the legal title, burdened with the Indian right of occupancy. Fulton v. Hanlon, 20 Cal. 480.

3. Respondent relies upon the case of Thompson v. Doaksum, 68 Cal. 594, 10 Pac. Rep. 199. That case differs from the one at bar in several respects. No claims whatever was ever presented to the board of land commissioners for confirmation. Section 13 of the act of March 3d provided that "all lands, the claims to which shall not have been presented to the commissioners within two years after the date of the act, shall be deemed, held, and considered as part of the public domain of the United States." The lands claimed by these defendants are within the boundaries of a Mexican grant confirmed by the board of land commissioners to Estudillo, it is true, but, as we have seen, this confirmation relieved the defendants of the necessity of presenting their claims, and conclusively adjudicated the fact that the lands were private property, and no portion of the public domain. The Indians interested in that case were not pueblo or rancheros Indians, and no duty of ascertaining their rights devolved upon the land commission. The Indians therein mentioned were never wards of the government. Furthermore, there was, in that case, a pre-emption claim filed under the land laws of the United States, and the patent purported to convey both the legal and the equitable title against the government and against all the world; and, of course, could not be attacked in a collateral proceeding. The title to the lands in controversy was never in the United States. The patent determined the rights of the government and the patentee, but not the rights of third persons. If there was anything in the nature of a trust before the claim was presented to the board, that trust was not discharged by the action of the land commissioners, or the officers of the land department. There is nothing to show that the Indians referred to in the case of Thompson v. Doaksum were civilized or Christianized. Under the authorities quoted above, to be sure, they had the right of occupancy, but that right continued only so long as it was recognized by the political power, —the executive or legislative departments of the government. Of course, the possession, when abandoned by the Indians, attaches itself to the fee without further grant; and this is true, whether there be any record evidence in favor of the Indians or not. Their right exists only so long as they actually occupy the land. So long as the defendants and their ancestors were in possession of the lands in controversy, there remained nothing to be done by them under the laws of Mexico in order to confirm their right, nor was there anything to be done by the Mexican government, or the officers thereof. The rights of the Indians had been completely established. We think that, upon the facts agreed to in this case, the defendants are entitled to judgment for their costs. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment in favor of defendants for their costs.

EATON v. ROCCA et al. (No. 12,186.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 4, 1888.)

MINES AND MINING—LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—PLEADING AND PROOF.

The complaint alleged that defendant A. was the owner of a mine, and that defendant B. claimed "some interest" therein, and claimed to recover against A. for services as miner, and for board of laborers, contracted by B. as A.'s agent; and sought to establish a lien on the mine. The evidence showed that A. had taken from B. an assignment of a mortgage upon the mine, in satisfaction of a debt, and had bought the mine at foreclosure sale; that A. had agreed that if the mine should be sold B. should have the proceeds above the amount necessary to reimburse A.; that B. was not the agent of A., and contracted the debt individually. Held, that as the evidence showed A. to be the owner, and not a mortgagee, of the mine, that under neither the complaint nor the evidence could there be any recovery against B., and that plaintiff was not entitled to a lien on the mine.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

Eaton, the plaintiff below, appeals from a judgment for defendants, and from an order refusing a new trial.

E. P. Otis and D. F. Nicol, for appellant. Frank W. Street, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff, Eaton, instituted this action against John Rocca and J. B. Richeri, for the purpose of obtaining a judgment against Rocca for money alleged to be due the plaintiff for work and labor performed by him as a miner in and about a mine alleged to be the property of Rocca, and for the value of the board of certain laborers, etc. The complaint further sought to enforce the lien of Eaton as a miner upon the mine mentioned therein as the property of Rocca. It was also alleged in that pleading that Richeri claimed

"some interest" in the mine, and that the debt due to the plaintiff had been contracted with Richeri, as the superintendent of the mine, acting as the duly-empowered agent of Rocca. According to the evidence, the plaintiff had been employed by Richeri, in his individual capacity, to work as a miner, and to board certain laborers, etc. With this contract, and the work done under it, Rocca had nothing whatever to do, and was in no way privy thereto. It was a matter exclusively between Richeri and the plaintiff. The only interest which Richeri had in Rocca's mine was that Rocca had agreed that if the mine should be sold that he, Richeri, should have from the proceeds thereof any balance that was left after Rocca had realized from the sale of his own property what he should be out of pocket by reason of his former advancements to Richeri, by the transfer of certain mortgages upon the mine, which last was bought by Rocca at a foreclosure sale had under and by virtue of those mortgages. The hope that something valuable might be developed in the mine by working it to some extent, seems to have animated Richeri to employ the plaintiff to work it on certain conditions; and it seems to have been Richeri's expectation that in some way the mine might be advantageously sold, Rocca be reimbursed for all that the mine had cost him, and he, Richeri, and the plaintiff get something out of it. But with all this the defendant Rocca had nothing to do; never having known of it, and never having empowered Richeri to act as his superintendent or agent, or held him out as such.

The evidence is conflicting and the findings should not be disturbed. According to them, the allegation in the complaint that Rocca is the owner of the mine, was fully proved. But the allegations that the plaintiff was employed by Richeri as Rocca's duly-authorized agent, and the superintendent of his mine, are not proved, but the contrary is shown; and it is found that the plaintiff made his contract with Richeri, not acting as agent or superintendent aforesaid, but in his own behalf solely, he, Richeri, having no real interest in the mine upon which it is sought to enforce a miner's lien. The plaintiff contends, in one part of his brief, that according to the evidence Richeri was the true owner of the mine, and not Rocca; that Rocca was only a mortgagee of the mine in controversy; and that as the facts show the contract to have been made with Richeri, by Eaton, the work done in and about the mine, and the laborers boarded, and the other things done by the plaintiff at the special instance and request of Richeri, that the court should have so found, and given judgment against Richeri that he pay the debt alleged to be due the plaintiff; and that Eaton's miner's lien therefor be enforced as against the mine described in the complaint. But this contention cannot be sustained. The plaintiff cannot be heard in this court for the first time to urge the rendition of a judgment in his favor in direct contradiction to the allegations of his complaint filed in the trial court. There he informed the defendants, by the allegations in his complaint, that he would prove that Rocca was the owner of the mine, and Richeri his agent and superintendent; that the debt due him, the plaintiff, was from Rocca as the owner of the mine, and that he claimed the right to enforce a miner's lien against Rocca's mine. The only allegation made as to Richeri, attempting to make him responsible as a party defendant, is that he claims some interest in the mine; but it is nowhere alleged that he contracted the debt upon his own account. The court has found upon sufficient proof that Rocca was the owner of the mine, that Richeri was not his agent or superintendent, and that Rocca was in no way responsible to the plaintiff. The evidence that Rocca was the owner of the mine was introduced to some extent by the plaintiff, and the defendants were informed by the plaintiff's pleading that Rocca was such owner. The debt was claimed to be due from Rocca, and not Richeri. Now, as it is alleged and proved that Rocca was the owner of the mine, and as it is not alleged in the complaint that Richeri either contracted for himself or owed the debt, it is difficult to perceive upon what reasonable ground the plaintiff can claim a judgment against Richeri.

The evidence shows that Rocca was the owner of the mine, and not a mortgagee. He had taken, in satisfaction for a debt due him from Richeri, an assignment of two mortgages on the mine in controversy. He bought the mine at a foreclosure sale, and had a sheriff's deed for it. There being no debt due him from Richeri, he had the absolute title to the mine. The fact that he verbally agreed with Richeri that if the mine was sold, that after he, Rocca, had realized sufficient money therefrom to reimburse him fully for all money which he lacked by reason of the advancements he had made to Richeri, he would give Richeri the balance, did not alter in any way the legal title which Rocca held to the mine under the foreclosure sale, for he no longer held any debt against Richeri. Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 28; Manasse v. Dinkelspiel, 68 Cal. 404, 9 Pac. Rep. 547. Rocca was the real owner of the mine, and as he has been found not to have made, through himself or agent, any contract, either express or implied, with the plaintiff, he is neither indebted to the latter, nor can his mine be subjected to the alleged miner's lien. There could be no judgment whatever rendered against Richeri for any debt due to the plaintiff, for no facts are alleged in the complaint which set up any such demand or claim. There could be no enforcement of any lien against the mine, as Richeri's, because it is alleged in the complaint, and shown by the evidence to belong to Rocca.

There is no merit whatever shown in the plaintiff's contention as exhibited here. It is certainly not permissible to frame a complaint and try a cause upon one alleged state of facts, and then to press upon this court the propriety of considering another state of facts, which do not, in fact, exist, as entitling the appellant to a reversal of a judgment, which latter state of facts, as alleged to exist, are contradictory of the allegations of his complaint.

For these reasons the judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SEARS et al., v. STARBIRD. (No. 12,379.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 4, 1888.)

APPEAL—BRIEFS—GROUNDLESS CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE'S MOTIVE.

A judgment roll having been admitted in evidence to prove dissolution of a firm, the judge treated it as also proving other facts. Appellant's brief, commenting on this point, stated that "the court, out of the fullness of his love for a cause, the parties to it, or their counsel, or from an overzealous desire to adjudicate all points, could not, with propriety, patch up" plaintiff's case. Held, to be a groundless charge against the judge's purity of motive, constituting a contempt of court, for which appellant's brief should be stricken from the files, and the submission of the cause set aside.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

Sears and Smith sued Starbird for a claim growing out of a partnership formerly existing between the three. On the trial, plaintiffs introduced in evidence a judgment roll in an action between the same parties, for the purpose of proving dissolution of the firm. The judge treated it as also proving other facts pertinent to the case. Judgment being for plaintiffs, Starbird appealed.

F. D. & G. W. Nicol, for appellant. F. W. Street, for respondents.

¹For a discussion of the subject of contempt of court, see note in Re Cary, 10 Fed. Rep. 629-633.

HAYNE, C. The brief of the counsel for appellant contains the following: "The court, out of the fullness of his love for a cause, the parties to it, or their counsel, or from an overzealous desire to adjudicate 'all matters, points, arguments, and things,' could not, with any degree of propriety, under the law, patch and doctor up the case of the plaintiffs, which perhaps the carelessness of their counsel had left in such a condition as to entitle them to no relief whatever."

Here is a distinct intimation that the judge of the court below did not act from proper motives, but from a love of the parties or their counsel. We see nothing in the record which suggests that such was the case; on the contrary, the action complained of seems to us to have been entirely proper. See Sill v. Reese, 47 Cal. 340. The brief, therefore, contains a groundless charge against the purity of motive of the judge of the court below. This we regard as a grave breach of professional propriety. Every person on his admission to the bar takes an oath to "faithfully discharge the duties of an attorney and counselor." Code Civil Proc. § 278. And among such duties, as defined by statute, is "to maintain the respect due to the courts of justice and judicial officers." Id. § 282. Surely, such a course as was taken in this case is not a compliance with that duty. In Friedlander v. Mining Co., 61 Cal. 117, the court said: "If, unfortunately, counsel in any case shall ever so far forget himself as willfully to employ language manifestly disrespectful to the judge of the superior court,—a thing not to be anticipated,—we shall deem it our duty to treat such conduct as a contempt of this court, and to proceed accordingly;" and the briefs in the case were ordered to be stricken from the files.

We therefore advise that the submission of this case be set aside, and that the brief of counsel for the appellant be stricken from the files; and that, if a proper brief on behalf of appellant be not filed within 30 days from the entry of the order, the appeal stand dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, ordered the submission of the cause is set aside, and brief of counsel for appellant stricken from the files of this court; and if, within 30 days from the filing of this order, a proper brief on the part of appellant be not filed herein, the appeal will be dismissed.

HUGHES v. THOMPSON. (No. 12,214.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 6, 1883.)

APPEAL.—REVIEW.—DEFECTS NOT APPARENT ON THE RECORD.

On appeal from an order of court granting a new trial, where no briefs are presented, and there is nothing to show upon what grounds the court granted the motion, the order will be affirmed.

Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; R. E. ARICK, Judge.

Terry & Terry, for appellant. H. S. Dixon, for respondent.

BY THE COURT. The appeal is from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. No briefs have been filed. There is nothing to show upon what grounds the court below granted the motion. HOUGHTON v. ALLEN et al. (No. 12,047.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 7, 1883.)

MORTGAGES.—MORTGAGEABLE INTEREST.—AGREEMENT FOR PURCHASE OF LAND.

A purchaser made an agreement for the purchase of land, paying part cash, and the balance in deferred payments, agreeing that, if he failed to make either of the payments at the time specified, the owner should be discharged of any claim for the performance of the contract; it also being provided that, upon the failure of the purchaser to make the payments, the owner should sell the lots at auction, and pay the surplus to the purchaser. The purchaser went into possession, and mortgaged the lots, which mortgage was duly recorded. Upon default in the payment, the original owner sold the lots to a third party: the deed reciting the contract, and the assent of the original purchaser to the sale. Held, that the mortgagee could not foreclose his mortgage as against the second purchaser. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Foreclosure proceedings by J. F. Houghton, plaintiff, against Thomas Allen and William Dresbach. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appealed.

Beatty, Denson & Oatman, for appellant. A. P. Catlin, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. After a full consideration of this case in bank, we have reached the conclusion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. The action is brought by plaintiff, Houghton, to foreclose a mortgage executed to him on April 6, 1871, by defendant Allen. The mortgage includes certain land not in contest here; and also lots 6, 7, and 8,—the premises in controversy. The court below rendered judgment foreclosing the mortgage as to the other land, but refused to include lots 6, 7, and 8 in the decree. From the last-named part of the judgment plaintiff appeals.

The complaint is in the usual form, and proceeds upon the theory that Allen was the owner in fee of the lots in question. The averments as to those lots are the same as the averments as to the other property included in the mortgage. If the theory of the complaint had been carried out in the judgment, all right of defendant Dresbach in the said lots would have been foreclosed, and, as against him, the purchaser at the foreclosure sale would have taken an unincumbered fee-simple title. But Allen was not the owner of the lots. On the twenty-second day of August, 1870, these lots were owned in fee by John P. Jackson; and on said day Jackson made a written contract with Allen by which he agreed to convey them to Allen on the twenty-second day of August, 1872, provided Allen would pay him $50 in cash, and $100 on August 22, 1881, and $100 on August 22, 1882,—the two deferred payments to bear interest at 12 per cent. per annum. It was provided that time should be considered as of the essence of the contract; and that, if Allen failed or neglected to make either of the payments, Jackson should be wholly released and discharged of any claim, at law or in equity, for a performance of the contract, etc. Allen paid the $50, and went into possession. While in possession, and on April 6, 1871, he executed to Houghton the mortgage above referred to, which included these lots. But, when the first $100 became due, Allen failed to pay any part of it, and has totally neglected to pay any part of either of the deferred payments. And Houghton never paid, or offered to pay, anything on the contract. On the twelfth day of January, 1872, Jackson, for a consideration of $250, conveyed the lots to the defendant Dresbach. The contract between Jackson and Allen was not recorded until July 9, 1872; but, when Jackson conveyed to Dresbach, Allen, being in default, consented to the conveyance, and to deliver the possession to Dresbach. The deed to Dresbach recited that there had been a contract with Allen, and that the conveyance was made at Allen's request. This was the first notice, so far as it appears, which Dresbach had of the character of Allen's possession.

If there were nothing in the contract more than as above stated, it would be clear that no interest of any kind in the lots in question remained in Allen or Houghton. There was another clause, however, which provided that, upon the failure of Allen to make any payment, "it shall be the duty" of Jackson to sell the lots at public auction for cash, and of the proceeds to retain the amount due him on the contract, with the expenses of sale, etc., and pay the overplus, if any, to Allen. No demand was ever made upon Jackson or Dresback to sell the lots. But it is contended that, as the property was not sold at auction, therefore, in some way or other, the title passed to Allen, and that Houghton can subject it, free from any other claim whatever, to the payment of his demand against Allen; that is, that Houghton can get the lots, by virtue of his mortgage, without paying for them.

Admitting, for the present, that Allen, as against Houghton, could not waive the sale of the lots at auction, and that no demand for such sale was necessary; and admitting, further, that if Houghton had foreclosed whatever interest Allen had in the lots by virtue of the contract, and purchased at the foreclosure sale, he might have maintained an action against Dresbach for the direct purpose of compelling a sale at auction, and the appropriation of the surplus, if any, over the contract debt to Houghton,—still it seems clear that in this present action the title of Dresbach cannot be foreclosed and cut off. The rights only of those who hold or claim under the mortgagor can be determined in an action to foreclose a mortgage; a title claimed adversely to the mortgagor cannot be thus litigated. Croghan v. Spence, 53 Cal. 15; Marlow v. Barlew, Id. 456; San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 465. Dresbach did not hold or claim under the mortgagor, Allen; he held under Jackson, and stood in the latter's shoes. He was therefore not a proper party to the action. Having been made, however, a defendant, under the general averment that he had or claimed some interest in the mortgaged premises, which was "subsequent and subject" to the mortgage, he was forced to answer. His answer set forth the nature of his interest, and denied that it was subject to the mortgage. The court sustained his defense, and we think correctly. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; MCKINSTRY, J.; THORNTON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PATERSON, J.; I dissent. Allen held a mortgageable interest. Section 2947, Civil Code; Jones v. Lapham, 15 Kan. 540; Laughlin v. Braley, 25 Kan. 147; Crane v. Turner, 67 N. Y. 437. He mortgaged that interest to plaintiff for a valuable consideration. The mortgage was recorded April 7, 1871, nearly a year before Dresbach purchased. This record, and Allen's request, while in possession, that Jackson should convey to Dresbach, gave the later full notice of Houghton's claim. He knew that Allen had mortgaged his interest in the property. He saw Allen in possession of the premises, and was bound to know what interest Allen held, and, having notice of the facts, he could not defeat Houghton's lien. Jackson could not have conveyed to Dresbach, so as to deprive Allen of his interest under the contract, without Allen's consent. Allen's interest did not cease upon the failure to pay the installment due August 22, 1872. So long as Jackson was satisfied to allow Allen to remain in possession without payment of the installments, there was no determination of the interest held by Allen. After pledging all the rights he held under the contract to Houghton, as security for the payment of his obligation, Allen could not in equity destroy the effect of that security by a voluntary surrender or waiver, which had neither consent nor consideration to support it, so far as Houghton was concerned. Certainly, the rights of Dresbach could not be enlarged over those of Jackson, under the circumstances, in consequence of the deed from the latter to the former, (Baker v. Bishop Hill Colony, 45 Ill. 264;) and Allen, Jackson, and Dresbach "could not covertly, or without notice to them, (mortgagees,) defeat their mortgage, or, rather, deprive them of their equities," (Sinclair v. Armitage, 12 N. J. Eq. 177.) There can be no question that among the equities secured to Houghton by his mortgage is the right to have the property sold at auction to the highest bidder, and, after payment of the balance due upon the contract, to have the overplus, if any, applied to the satisfaction of his mortgage. Plaintiff had the right to assume that the contract would be carried out in all respects; and the purchaser, not being in default at the time of the execution and delivery of the mortgage, could not, after receiving plaintiff's money ($921.75) upon the faith and security of the contract, stipulate away this right. If Jackson had retained the ownership of the property, he would have been in duty bound to sell the lots at public auction for cash, and out of the proceeds retain the amount due him on the contract, with the expenses of sale; and the overplus, if any, would have been subject, in equity, to the satisfaction of Houghton's lien. Dresbach stands in no better position than Jackson would, under those circumstances; and, if he stands in Allen's shoes, he is not entitled even to be first paid out of the proceeds of the purchase money advanced.

Assuming his rights equal to those of Jackson, the decree should be modified so as to include lots 6, 7, and 8, and to have the proceeds of the sale, or so much as may be necessary, applied to the satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage, after retaining out of the proceeds the amount which was due on the contract at the time of the purchase by Dresbach, together with interest and the expenses of sale. The execution of such a decree would be a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract, and secure the rights of all parties without further litigation.

MALLAGH v. MALLAGH et al. (No. 11,859.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 4, 1888.)

1. TRUSTS—RESULTING TRUSTS—ESTABLISHMENT BY PAROL.

Plaintiff made a deed to her son of real property, with an understanding that he should satisfy her debts, and reconvey the remainder to her. In effecting a compromise with certain parties, the son, in consideration of a deed of certain other of plaintiff's property, procured the property in dispute to be conveyed to him. Civil Code Cal. § 852, enacts that no trust of real property is valid unless created by writing or operation of law. In an action to have the heirs of the son declared trustees, held, that parol evidence was admissible to show the nature of the dealings between plaintiff and her son, and to establish a trust in her favor.¹

2. SAME—LACHES.

Plaintiff had owned the beneficial interest in property, and had been in possession thereof since 1879, and was in possession in 1883, when she brought action to have defendants, who held the naked legal title, declared trustees for her. Held, that the plaintiff was not guilty of laches in asserting her rights.²

SEARLS, C. J., MCKINSTRY and TEMPLE, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

Juana Corrillo de Mallagh brought this action against Isabel Roco de Mallagh and Edna Mallagh, the widow and infant child of her son, David Mallagh, to establish a trust in plaintiff's favor of certain land of which said David Mallagh died seized. Plaintiff, being financially embarrassed, with a view to making a settlement with her creditors, made a conveyance in July, 1877, to her son, said David Mallagh, of property, which was subsequently sold under foreclosure proceedings, and purchased by the trustees of the estate of one Thompson, but plaintiff retained possession. It was claimed that the foreclosure suit was irregular, and that the grantee's under the sheriff's deed acquired no title. A compromise was effected, whereby the purchasers at the foreclosure sale were to convey to the plaintiff the property in dispute, and were to receive a conveyance of certain other of plaintiff's property. Mallagh procured a conveyance to be made to himself of the property plaintiff was to receive under this agreement, but plaintiff did not become aware of it until the month of January, 1882. David Mallagh died in March, 1883, leaving him surviving the defendants, his only heirs at law, and shortly afterwards this action was brought. The judgment of the court below was in plaintiff's favor. Defendants appeal. Civil Code Cal. § 852, referred to in the opinion, reads as follows: "No trust in relation to real property is valid unless created or declared (1) by a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee, or by his agent thereto authorized by writing; (2) by the instrument under which the trustee claims the estate affected; or (3) by operation of law."

Venable & Goodchild and W. H. Spencer, for appellants. Graves, Turner & Graves, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to establish and enforce a trust. It appears that the plaintiff has been divorced from her husband; and being largely in debt, and her property mortgaged, desired to effect some compromise with her creditors whereby she might retain for herself some part of her estate. With that end in view, and acting in perfect good faith, she made to her son, David Mallagh, a deed of the property set out in the complaint herein. This son was a person in whom she reposed the utmost confidence, and she always acted as he advised her to do. Proceeding under his advice, she executed to him a deed to her property, with the understanding and agreement that he should satisfy the claims of her creditors, and, if anything remained after that, he was to reconvey it to her. The creditors sold the property (which had been mortgaged to them) at a foreclosure sale, and purchased it. A dispute arose as to whether or not that sale was good, and gave the purchasers a perfect title to the plaintiff's property. She retaining possession of it, her son, David, effected a compromise and agreement with the purchasers at the foreclosure sale that they should accept from him for his mother a deed to a portion of her property, and should then deed to her the property now in dispute. He deeded that which he had promised to the creditors, but, instead of having them (as had been agreed upon) to convey the property now in dispute to his mother, he took from them a deed of it to himself. His mother remained in ignorance of that fact until a short time prior to his death. Then she, having discovered what he had done, applied to him to make her a conveyance of the property, which he refused to do, and never did so convey it. There is nothing to show that in making the deed to the creditors he either had repudiated, or intended to repudiate, his mother's right. For all that appears to the contrary, he at that time intended to act fairly by her; in other words, that he made the conveyance as her agent. In this sense, what the creditors accepted as the consideration of their deed, came from the plaintiff. The court below decreed that David Mallagh was trustee for his mother, and, being deceased, the defendants, his only heirs at law, in privity with him, held the property in trust for the plaintiff, and that equitably it should be conveyed to her. From that judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

It is argued that parol testimony was not admissible to show the facts surrounding the transaction between the parties thereto. But this view, we think, is untenable, for the reason that all the property which remained after the satisfaction of the creditors' claims was held by David Mallagh in trust for his mother. The only consideration which ever passed to the creditors and purchasers under the foreclosure sale for the deed which they executed to David Mallagh, instead of his mother, to whom they promised to convey it, was that which came from the plaintiff. She originally conveyed it to her son, and agreed that he might compromise her debts, and, when he did so by the deed he made to the trustees of the Thompson estate, it was done by him as the agent and trustee of his mother, who thereby furnished the property thus conveyed as a consideration for the creditors to convey to her the property in dispute, for it is not necessary that money alone should be the consideration in such a matter. Currey v. Allen, 34 Cal. 254. The fact that they conveyed to her agent and trustee did not defeat her equitable right to have the title vested in her, as had been agreed upon.

Under our Code, resulting trusts may arise by operation of law, (section 852, sub. 3, Civil Code,) and such trusts may be established by parol, (Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 119; Bayles v. Baxter, 22 Cal. 575.) Judge Story, in his work upon Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2 (13th Ed.) § 1195, declares that implied trusts include both resulting and constructive trusts. This court has held, in common with many others, that parol evidence is admissible to show an implied trust, whether the same be presumed "from the supposed intention of the parties, and the nature of the transaction, when they are known as 'resulting trusts;' or they are raised independently of any such intention, and forced on the conscience of the trustee by equitable construction and the operation of law; and such are distinguished as 'constructive trusts.' These trusts are expressly exempted from the operation of the statute of frauds." Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 119. Upon examination, we think that the evidence supports the findings.

As to the suggestion made by the respondents' counsel that the plaintiff was guilty of laches in failing to assert her rights, it is only necessary to say she had been in possession of the premises in controversy since 1879 and owned the entire beneficial interest therein. The respondents were out of possession, and held the naked legal title for the plaintiff; hence the latter might with safety rest content until the former took some steps to disturb her in the enjoyment of her rights. Barroilhet v. Anspacher, 68 Cal. 121, 8 Pac. Rep. 804.

No prejudicial error appearing, we are of the opinion that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

SEARLS, C. J., MCKINSTRY and TEMPLE, JJ., did not concur in the opinion.

PEOPLE v. DYE. (No. 20,352.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 11, 1888.)

HOMICIDE—TRIAL—EVIDENCE.

Upon a trial for murder, the prosecution drew out, on cross-examination of witnesses for defendant, that his wife, a witness in his behalf, had had improper relations with a party, and in rebuttal of irrelevant testimony for the defense were allowed to further prove that the wife had stated, in an interview with the party, that defendant had sent her there for the purpose of getting money out of such party, and, having obtained some money, that she wrote defendant to "drop everything; there is no occasion for to make any further trouble." Held, that this evidence was, upon collateral matters, irrelevant, improper as hearsay, and prejudicial to defendant's case, as holding him up to the jury as attempting to make money out of his wife's shame.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. F. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Upon an indictment of Joseph F. Dye, for the murder of Herman Haines, defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of murder in the second degree.

Bicknell & White and H. T. Gage, for appellant. Geo. H. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HAYNE, C. J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree for the killing of one Herman Haines, and was sentenced to 16 years in the state prison. The shooting occurred in the store of one Cohen, in the town of Santa Paula. The evidence tends to show that the two men met in the store, and that Haines bid the defendant "good morning," as he passed him, whereupon the defendant exclaimed: "You dirty scoundrel, how dare you speak to me," and taking him by the throat, slapped his face several times. Cohen, the storekeeper, then threw his arms around the defendant, and held him, doubtless with a view to put an end to the struggle. Haines then ran to the corner of the store, where he had left his rifle on entering the place, and took it up. In the meantime the defendant had got loose from Cohen, and dodging behind the counter, approached Haines in a stooping posture. The evidence tends to show that Haines had got hold of his rifle, and was pointing or endeavoring to point it at the defendant as the latter approached him. The defendant, before reaching Haines, but when quite close to him, fired two shots with his revolver, and on reaching him took the rifle from him or knocked it out of his grasp. Haines then ran into the street. The defendant followed, and fired a shot as Haines was running away. The defendant's version of the affair differs somewhat from the foregoing. He says that Haines jostled him in passing, and that he did not fire when Haines ran away. Three wounds were found upon Haines—one in the shoulder, one in the abdomen, and one in the thigh. According to a physician, either of the two former were sufficient to cause death, but the wound in the thigh was not dangerous. There is some evidence to the effect that the wound in the shoulder was from the first shot, but there is nothing to show the order of the other wounds. Haines died in three or four days after being shot.

The defense was that the shooting was necessary for the defendant's protection. He gave evidence tending to show that Haines had threatened to kill him, and that he had been informed of such threats, and introduced evidence tending to show the following facts: Haines and his son, a boy about 16 years old, were in defendant's employ upon a ranch which he was managing. One day, a short while before the shooting, he intercepted a letter from Haines to his (defendant's) wife. This letter was as follows: "Mrs. Dye, meet me at the barn to-night, or I will tell Joe about that medicine. Answer. H. HAINES." Underneath this, on the same paper, was written: "I return your insult, and I say to you for the last time, never come upon this ranch or speak to me again. G. L. DYE. Aug. 19, '86." This letter was brought to Mrs. Dye by Haines' son. On taking it from the boy the defendant gave him a whipping, and the next day paid off and discharged both him and his father, and wrote to Haines never to speak to him again. This evidence, as a matter of course, was not admissible to justify the taking of Haines' life. But it was admissible in connection with Haines' threats, for the purpose of showing that the threats were not mere idle vaporings, but came from a man who had, or thought he had, a grievance, and were therefore to be heeded.

During his testimony as to the above matters, the defendant stated that after the affair of the letter his wife left the ranch to visit her mother in San Francisco. This seems to us to have been an irrelevant circumstance. We cannot see what the movements of Mrs. Dye, after the difficulty as to the letter, had to do with the defense made. When she came on the stand, and had testified concerning the affair of the letter, the prosecution drew from her on cross-examination the information that she had not gone to visit her mother in San Francisco, but had gone to Los Angeles, and went on to cross-examine her, against the objections of the defense, as to her movements there—eliciting the statements that she staid at Stone's lodging-house, and that on one occasion she had gone to Congress Hall saloon to see the proprietor, one Baker, and had seen one Crow there. She was also cross-examined as to whether her husband had sent her to see Crow, but she denied that he had. This seems to us to have been irrelevant matter, and not proper cross-examination. We are not prepared to say, however, that of itself it had a tendency to injure the defendant. After this cross-examination, the defendant introduced evidence tending to show that, at the time of the affair of the Haines letter, he discovered that his wife had had improper relations with the Crow mentioned in the cross-examination above referred to, and that a correspondence had been kept up between them through the medium of Haines, the letters to her coming under cover to Haines, who thought "it was rather dangerous business, but he would do it, anyhow." We hardly see why the defense should have wanted these facts in evidence. But they were admissible, on behalf of the defendant, upon the same principle that the Haines letter was admissible, viz., in connection with the threats of Haines, and to show that there was a grievance between the two men, and that the threats were in earnest, and therefore to be heeded.

The defendant went on to introduce a letter from his wife to Crow, written about three days after the Haines letter affair, in which she stated that she was in trouble, and asked him to send her $50 by registered letter, under cover to Haines. The prosecution then drew out on cross-examination that at the Congress Hall saloon interview she demanded $1,000 from Crow. Not getting that, she demanded $300. She got $40 or $50. In this connection she testified: "My husband and I had separated at that time." She denied that the defendant had told her to make the demand upon Crow, or to go to see Baker. This was all irrelevant matter. It made not the slightest difference in the case before the court whether the witness had endeavored to get money from Crow or not. In rebuttal, the prosecution was allowed, against the objection of the defendant, to go into the Congress Hall saloon interview, and to prove that Mrs. Dye there stated that the defendant had sent her there for the purpose of getting money out of Crow, and that when she got some money she wrote to the defendant to "drop everything; there is no occasion for to make any further trouble."

We have been thus particular in stating the proceedings in order that it may be seen how far away the court traveled from the issue it was trying, viz., whether the killing of Haines was justifiable. Mrs. Dye's attempt to get money out of Crow had nothing to do with this issue. The fact that the evidence in rebuttal tended to contradict some of the things she said on cross-examination, did not make it proper to extend the investigation, as was done here. A party cannot cross-examine his adversary's witness upon irrelevant matters for the purpose of eliciting something to be contradicted; and if such matters are drawn out, the court should stop the inquiry there. It is well settled that a witness cannot be impeached by contradicting him upon collateral matters. People v. Webb, 70 Cal. 120, 11 Pac. Rep. 509; People v. Furtado, 57 Cal. 346; People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 458. Nor does it make any difference that the subject of the relations of Crow with defendant's wife was commenced by the defense. The defendant's evidence on this point stopped far short of the testimony complained of; and, conceding a great part of it to have been irrelevant, it furnished no justification for the course taken by the prosecution. The introduction of irrelevant evidence by one side does not justify the introduction of further irrelevant evidence by the other. Donnelly v. Curran, 54 Cal. 282. Any other rule would destroy the law of evidence, and make trials interminable.

The irrelevant evidence, so introduced by the prosecution, was very prejudicial to the defendant's case. It held him up to the jury as attempting to make money out of his wife's shame. The prosecution might, with equal propriety, have undertaken to get a verdict by proving that he was a horse-thief or a black-leg, or any other thing calculated to expose him to contempt. In a case which is at all doubtful such a course would be almost certain to produce a conviction from an average jury. It is contrary to the first principles of justice to try a man for one crime and convict him of that, because he may be guilty of another, or because he may be a low specimen of humanity. The fact, therefore, which was sought to be shown was not proper for the consideration of the jury. But if it had been, the mode of showing it was improper. It consisted in proving that, at the time she demanded the money, Mrs. Dye said that her husband had sent her to do so. There was no other evidence of the fact beyond such declaration. But any rogue may use the name of an honest man to facilitate his roguery. It is well settled that the mere declaration of an alleged agent is not evidence of the existence of the agency. Grigsby v. Water Co. 40 Cal. 396; Loan Soc. v. Gerichten, 64 Cal. 521, 2 Pac. Rep. 405; Brigham v. Peters, 1 Gray, 145; Lambert v. People, 76 N. Y. 228, 229; Whart. Crim. Ev. (9th Ed.) § 695.

There are other matters argued which will probably not arise upon a retrial; but we deem it proper to say that it is an exceedingly doubtful matter whether the witness Granger should have been permitted to testify as to the genuineness of the Haines letter. We think also that the following part of the charge is somewhat confused: "The law does not require demonstration in evidence to establish a fact; that is, such a degree of truth as, excluding the probability of error, produces absolute certainty, because such proof is rarely possible. Moral certainty only is required," etc. If "the probability" of error need not be excluded, then evidence is sufficient although it leaves error probable. This hardly amounts to moral certainty or proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The word "possibility" would be better in this connection. So, it was not accurate to tell the jury that the defendant was justified in the killing, "if necessary for his own protection," etc. It would have been better to have said "if actually or apparently necessary," etc. See People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 577; 12 Pac. Rep. 783; People v. Flahave, 58 Cal. 249. So we think it would have been better to have given the instruction on pages 481, 482 of the record referred to on pages 43, 44 of appellant's brief.

We advise that the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.;

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the forgoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

LODTMAN et al. v. SCHULTER. (No. 11,058.)
(Supreme Court of California. September 24, 1886.)

JUDGMENT—BY DEFAULT—SETTING ASIDE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

Where a suit was dismissed for want of prosecution, upon motion of two of the defendants, the discretion vested in the trial court was properly exercised in setting aside the judgment of dismissal, on condition that plaintiffs should pay to defendants $80, upon affidavit by plaintiffs' attorney, showing that his absence on the day set for the hearing was unavoidable, because of prior important professional engagements, of which defendants' attorneys had notice, and that one of the defendants had not been served with process, although due diligence had been used.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Appeal from an order of the superior court setting aside a judgment of dismissal in a suit brought by Ernest Lodtman and others against J. S. Schultzer and others. Defendants appeal.

W. L. Dudley, for appellants. Lesser & Hall, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was dismissed by the court below for want of prosecution, upon the motion of two of the defendants, Barnett and Burt. Thereafter, upon motion made by the plaintiffs, and due notice thereof, the court made and entered an order setting aside and vacating its judgment of dismissal, upon the condition attached that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendants the sum of $80. From the last-mentioned order this appeal is prosecuted.

The affidavit of merits made by the principal attorney for the plaintiffs is as follows:

"J. M. Lesser, being duly sworn, says that he is one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, and has had full, sole, complete, and absolute charge of said action, and the only attorney of plaintiffs who has or ever had any knowledge of the action. That about the seventh day of June, 1884, the affiant received a letter from W. L. Dudley, announcing to him that the trial of said cause was set for June 16, 1884; which said letter is hereto attached, and made a part hereof: " 'STOCKTON, CAL., June 5, 1884.

"J. M. Lesser, Esq., Santa Cruz—DEAR SIR: Am in receipt yours second inst. Last Monday, when the calendar was called in Judge HEWEL's court, our Lodtman-Schulter Case was set for trial, at my request, Monday, sixteenth inst. My clients are insisting upon a trial, and will not consent to any further delay. If they would consent to postponement, I should have no objection to comply with your request, but they will not, and therefore I hope you may arrange your engagements so as to try the case on the 16th.

" 'Truly yours,

W. L. DUDLEY.'

"That affiant is a resident of Santa Cruz county, and in active practice in said county. That the first Monday in June, 1884, was the day on which causes were set for trial in the superior court of Santa Cruz county for the month of June, and on said day a number of cases in which affiant was attorney were set for trial and hearing. That among the cases so set for trial was the case of Ashley v. Ferguson, on which the argument was set for hearing on June 17, 1884. That in said cause of Ashley v. Ferguson a large amount of money was involved, and the same presented very intricate questions of law, and the same was under the sole control and charge of affiant. That in such action was also involved the ownership of some thirty head of horses, which were then, and had been for some time, in the possession of the sheriff, thereby causing great expense to the parties litigant, and the court was anxious and desirous of hearing said cause. That the argument of said cause required careful and extensive preparation, occupying more than four days of affiant's time, and the trial thereof occupied three days, and the affiant's argument one day. That when said action of Ashley v. Ferguson was set for hearing, as aforesaid, affiant had not been informed of the time of the hearing of said action of Lodtman against Schulter, and immediately upon receiving the information he endeavored to displace the case of Ashley v. Ferguson; but the superior judge of Santa Cruz county informed the affiant that it would take its vacation on the twentieth day of June, 1884, and no business would be done in said court until August 1, 1884; that, if said action of Ashley v. Ferguson was not heard on the appointed day, it would not be heard for over two months thereafter. That thereupon, and about one week before the sixteenth day of June, 1884, affiant wrote or telegraphed to W. L. Dudley, Esq., that it would be impossible for affiant to be in Modesto on the sixteenth day of June, 1884, and received no answer to such letter or dispatch, and affiant firmly believed that said cause would not be heard on said day last aforesaid, but that the same would be continued. Affiant also telegraphed to the judge of said superior court of Stanislaus county that it would be impossible for him (affiant) to attend said superior court on said day; and affiant, having taken all those steps, believed that the cause would not be tried in his absence. Affiant never received any notice of motion, or any intimation that said action would be dismissed for want of prosecution. Affiant further states the defendant Schulter has never been served with process in said action; that, after the service on the defendants who have appeared herein, affiant took pains to find out the whereabouts of said Schultzer, and has written, and caused to be written, a large number of letters to find the whereabouts of said Schluter, but to all of them has received answer that Schultzer cannot be found. He has been informed within the last five months that said Schultzer is confined in one of the state insane asylums, and has made inquiries relating thereto, but has not been able to obtain a definite knowledge on the subject, though he has communicated with the authorities of the various insane asylums of the state. Affiant further states that the only information he has had about the setting of said cause for trial is by the letter hereto attached. Affiant further says that plaintiffs are anxious to prosecute said action; that he has informed them and believes that they have a good and substantial cause of action on the merits of the case. J. M. LESSER."

By it such circumstances appear as might at least have warranted the judge in hesitating to deny the motion to vacate the judgment of dismissal for want of prosecution of the action. In such cases this court has held it to be permissible that, upon proper conditions, such a judgment may be set aside. Watson v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 17-21. We do not therefore perceive that, as to the case in hand, the judge below abused the discretion which was vested in him by law. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

BELCHER, C. C., and SEARLS, C., concurred.

BY THE COURT. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

BLISS v. JOHNSON. (No. 11,540.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 10, 1888.)

WATERS AND WATER-COURSES—OBSTRUCTION OF STREAM.

It is no defense to an action by one riparian owner against an upper riparian owner, for obstructing by a dam the flow of water in a natural water-course, that the defendant had erected the dam for the purpose of protecting land from an increase in the volume of the water in such water-course, and the exclusion of evidence tending to show such increase in the volume of water, and the injury that would be caused to the defendant by removing such dam, is not error.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

An action by Bliss, plaintiff, against Johnson, defendant, to restrain the diversion of water from its natural channel. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Brown & Daggett, for appellant. Eugene R. Garber, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. This action was brought to restrain the diversion of the waters of Outside creek, and to have removed from the channel thereof obstructions to the free flow of the waters of said creek. The court below gave judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant appealed. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the order denying the new trial defendant also appeals.

The defendant urges a new trial on account of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision of the court, but as there is a substantial conflict in the evidence on the material issues, we cannot, on such ground, in accordance with the well-settled rule of this court, reverse the order of the court below.

Several points are reserved upon the rulings of the court in regard to the evidence offered, which we proceed to consider. It is urged that the court erred in sustaining the objection of plaintiff to the following question put to a witness, Samuel Fowler: "State to the court, now, what work you did, what the condition of the country was before you commenced work, and what work you did in the shape of digging an artificial channel, if you dug one." The witness had just stated that he knew of and had constructed an artificial channel called the "Fowler Cut." The purpose for which this question was put was to show that by means of the Fowler cut the water which flowed in Johnson's slough was increased, and that such increased quantity of water would overflow and injure defendant's land, if the same was not taken from Johnson's slough by means of an embankment and an artificial cut. It should be remarked here that there was evidence tending to show that Johnson's slough was a branch or affluent of Outside creek, and that the court so found. On this creek plaintiff was a riparian owner. It appeared that there was evidence admitted, subsequently given by the same witness, that by means of the Fowler cut and the People's ditch an increased quantity of water was turned and did flow into Johnson's slough and Outside creek, and therefore the defendant suffered no injury by the rejection of the question. The plaintiff, being an owner of lands on Outside creek, below the dam or obstruction put in by defendant, which was complained of, had a right to the free flow of the water to his land without obstruction. The dam cut off the flow of the water entirely, and granting that the defendant had a right to protect his land from any injury which the additional quantity of water may have produced, still he had no right to resort to a dam, a mode of protection which entirely obstructed and cut off the water of the stream from flowing to plaintiff's land. The defendant might, by embankments or levees on the side of the stream, have fully protected his land from injury, without interfering with the usual flow of water in the channel of the stream. For the damage caused by the additional quantity of water turned in by the means above referred to, defendant has his action against the parties who so turned it in, and could have enjoined them from so doing when it was done. The right claimed by defendant herein goes far beyond this. The claim herein preferred is to obstruct the flow of all the water in the stream, under the pretext of protecting his land from injury by the water added to that which was the normal flow. We see no reason for allowing such claim, and the strongest reasons why it should not be allowed.

For the same reasons the court did not err in sustaining the objection of plaintiff to the following questions put to defendant: "If this dam you speak of and referred to in the complaint is torn out, what will be the effect upon your land?" "Will or will not the removal of this dam, referred to in the complaint and answer, result in turning a large body of water down upon your land, to places where water is not accustomed to run?" "State to the court what the result of pulling out that dam was." The questions were all propounded on the theory that because the water which flowed in the channel of the stream, whether water added by the Fowler cut and People's ditch or not, sometimes injured the defendant's land, that the defendant had a right to obstruct entirely the flow of the stream which resulted, and prevented it from reaching the riparian lands on the stream. This, as we have seen, the law disallows.

We see no relevancy to any issue in the case of the following question put to Johnson: "State whether or not the plaintiff, Bliss, through your license and permission, has cut a channel from the People's ditch, or rather from that portion of Johnson's slough that is used as a part of the People's ditch, for the purpose of carrying water out of the People's ditch into Outside creek." The main issues in the cause were whether Outside creek was a natural water-course, and whether defendant had obstructed the flow of water therein. If the above question had been answered in the affirmative, we cannot see that it would have tended to disprove these issues.

Upon an examination of the photographic views offered and excluded, we cannot see that the defendant was injured by their being ruled out. There was primary evidence as to the ground by witnesses who testified from their personal knowledge of it. The views offered were in the nature of secondary evidence, as to which the best evidence had been offered, viz., that of persons conversant with the topography involved in the inquiry.

We have considered the other questions, and find no error in ruling on them. The judgment and order must be affirmed. So ordered.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; MCKINSTRY, J.

PEOPLE v. RILEY. (No. 20,366.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 6, 1888.)

1. ROBBERY—INDICTMENT—DESCRIPTION OF OFFENSE.

Under Pen. Code Cal. § 211, defining robbery to be the felonious taking of personal property against the will of the person robbed, an indictment charging the defendant with taking, "by means of fraud and force, * * * $160 lawful money of the United States, said money being the property of one M.," is sufficient.¹

2. DEPOSITIONS—OATH BY STENOGRAPHER.

A stenographer appointed in a criminal action, under the authority of Pen. Code Cal. § 869, by the magistrate before whom the examination is had, to take depositions, need not be sworn to faithfully perform his duty, nor need the fact that he was sworn appear in the depositions.

3. SAME—CERTIFICATE OF STENOGRAPHER.

Pen. Code Cal. § 869, sub. 5, provides that a deposition taken down by a stenographer, and written out in long-hand, and certified as being a correct statement of the testimony and proceedings, shall be prima facie evidence thereof. Held, that a certificate that the "foregoing is a correct transcript of the examination in the above-entitled case," is sufficient upon which to admit a deposition in evidence.

4. SAME—WHEN MAY BE READ—WITNESS ABSENT FROM STATE.

Pen. Code Cal. § 1345, provides that a deposition may be read in evidence on the trial of an indictment upon its appearing that the witness is unable to attend by reason of death, insanity, sickness, or infirmity, or continued absence from the state. Where it appears that a witness, whose testimony was taken and reduced to writing at the examination before the magistrate, has been sought in several counties and cities of the state, and there is no direct evidence that he is in the state, or that any facts have come to the knowledge of those desiring to use the deposition tending to show the whereabouts of the witness that have not been acted upon in good faith, or that he had gone to any county to which a subpoena had not been sent, the court is justified in finding that the witness could not, with due diligence, be found within the state.

5. SAME—OBJECTION TO QUESTIONS—GROUNDS.

Pen. Code Cal. § 869, sub. 3, provides that in taking depositions to be used in a criminal action, if a question put be objected to and overruled, that fact, with the ground on which the question was overruled, must be stated. Held, that the ground of objection is sufficiently shown if it appear that the question was overruled as being "immaterial and irrelevant."

6. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—EVIDENCE—IDENTITY OF PERSON.

On the trial of an indictment a deposition was read in evidence in which the defendant was referred to by name, without further description. The court charged the jury that "identity of person is presumed from identity of name." Held that, as no evidence was introduced to overcome the presumption, the giving of the instruction was error without prejudice.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; H. M. WILLIS, Judge.

James Riley was indicted for robbery. On the trial the testimony of the prosecuting witness, which, at the examination before the magistrate, had been reduced to writing by a stenographer, was introduced in evidence. The defendant was therein referred to by name, without further description. The court instructed the jury that "identity of person is presumed from identity of name," to which instruction defendant excepted. The other facts sufficiently appear from the opinion. There was a verdict of guilty, and defendant appeals.

Baker & Blair and Zue G. Peck, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. The defendant was convicted of robbery, in San Bernardino county, and has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. It is contended the motion in arrest of judgment should have been granted because the information does not aver that the $160, lawful money of the United States, "said money being then and there the property of one Christian Meyers," was "personal" property. The point is not well taken. The information charges that the defendant, on a day named, etc., did "unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously, and by means of fraud and force, take from the person, possession," etc. It is claimed the judgment should have been arrested because the information is fatally defective, in that it omits the statutory words, "and against his will." Pen. Code, § 211. But the information is sufficient. Pen. Code, § 960. A robbery "accomplished by means of force and fear" must have been accomplished "against the will" of the person robbed.

It is urged as error that the court below charged: "Identity of person is presumed from identity of name." Identity of person is a deduction which the law expressly directs shall be made from identity of name, (Code Civil Proc. §§ 1959, 1963, subd. 25;) and while, under our constitution, which prohibits the courts from charging upon matter of fact, a court cannot instruct a jury that any fact is an "inference" from another fact,—as an inference is defined by section 1960, Code Civil Proc.,—the court is authorized to declare a presumption of law. It is true that a presumption of identity of person from identity of name is a disputable presumption which may be controverted by other evidence, (Code Civil Proc. 1963;) but the defendant introduced no evidence to overcome it, and no injury could have accrued to him by the omission of the court to add that identity of name only created the presumption prima facie.

At the trial, the prosecution offered in evidence the deposition of Christian Meyers, (prosecuting witness,) taken at the examination before the committing magistrate. The deposition was admitted over the objections of the defendant. To the deposition the defendant objected that it does not show the "grounds or reasons" on which the magistrate sustained an objection to a question put to the witness on cross-examination; but the objection to the question was that it was "irrelevant and immaterial," and the objection, as made, was sustained. It would be difficult to state more clearly "the ground on which the question was overruled." Pen. Code, § 869, subd. 3. As to the alleged refusal of the witness to answer questions, the magistrate, in one instance, directed him to answer, and in others the recalcitration of the witness was waived. Besides, the "ground" on which the witness declined to answer questions does appear in the deposition, from the statement of the witness itself.

Appellant further objects that it was not made affirmatively to appear that Joseph E. Rich, whose certificate, as stenographer, is attached to the deposition, was sworn faithfully to discharge his duty. The defendant proved by Rich that he was appointed to take the testimony by the magistrate. The statute neither requires that the short-hand reporter shall be sworn, nor that the fact that he was sworn shall appear in the deposition; and the testimony, as written out in long-hand by the short-hand reporter, is only evidence prima facie of its correctness. Pen. Code, § 869. The deposition is certified: "State of California, County of San Bernardino: I hereby certify the foregoing to be a correct transcript of the examination in the above-entitled case. [Signed] JOSEPH E. RICH, Stenographer." The statute provides: "When written out in long-hand, and certified as being a correct statement of such testimony and proceedings in the case shall be prima facie," etc. Pen. Code, § 869, sub. 5. It is, of course, always better to follow the language of the statute, but we think the certificate substantially complies with the law. In People v. Morine, 54 Cal. 575,—referred to by counsel,—there was no certificate.

Defendant also objected to the deposition on the ground that the preliminary evidence was not sufficient to show that the witness, Christian Meyers, was either dead, insane, or absent from the state. Subpoenas were sent to different counties for service. One Neil, an acquaintance of Meyers, gave information that he was at a certain place in San Diego county; but he could not be found there. There was evidence that he had been sought for "pretty much all over" San Bernardino and San Diego counties; that inquiries had been made for him in Sacramento, San Francisco, Stockton, San Jose, Lathrop, Woodland, Oakland, and "at all those places along the line of the S. P. R." There was no direct evidence that he was in the state, nor any evidence that facts had come to the knowledge of the prosecution tending to prove the whereabouts of the witness, which had not been acted upon in good faith, or evidence indicating that the witness had gone to any county to which subpoena was not sent for service. The court was fully justified in finding that the witness could not, with due diligence, be found within the state, and, as an inference, that he was not in the state. People v. Gannon, 61 Cal. 476. Judgment and order affirmed.

AUSTIN v. ANDREWS. (No. 11,216.)

(Supreme Court of California. September 24, 1886.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A new trial on the ground of insufficient testimony will not be granted on appeal, where the record shows evidence tending to establish the findings of the court below.

2. SAME—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

Testimony objected to at the trial, but to which no exception was taken, will not be reviewed on appeal.

3. BOUNDARIES—EVIDENCE—DECLARATION OF GRANTOR.

Declarations made by the owner of land to a purchaser at the time he sold as to the boundary lines thereof, are admissible in evidence against a person claiming title from such purchaser.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Austin brought ejectment against Andrews, and was defeated on the merits. He then moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he appealed.

J. A. Louttit and Woods & Levinsky, for appellant. W. L. Dudley and S. A. Booker, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action of ejectment, to recover possession of a small piece of land situate in San Joaquin county. The case was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appealed. The court found that the plaintiff was not the owner of the land when the action was commenced, nor when it was tried, and that the defendant was the owner of it, and entitled to its possession.

There was testimony tending to support the findings, and, under the well-established rule in this court, we cannot say that a new trial should have been granted for insufficiency of evidence.

There was no error in admitting in evidence the deed dated December 4, 1872, from Marrow to Groves and the defendant. That deed conveyed to the grantees named a section of land, with the exception of a piece lying in the south-west corner of the south-west quarter of the section on which was situated the village of Farmington, and which had been previously deeded away. The land in controversy was within the west half of the section, and, according to the undisputed testimony of the defendant and Groves, was not within the village of Farmington. There was also no error in admitting in evidence the deed of October 1, 1874, from Groves to the defendant. That deed conveyed to the defendant all the interest in the section of land referred to, acquired by Groves under the deed from Marrow. The defendant offered in evidence several tax receipts showing that he had paid taxes on all the west half of the section referred to, except the lands in the town of Farmington. The plaintiff objected to these receipts being received in evidence, and his objections were overruled; but he took no exception to the rulings, and therefore cannot now be heard to complain of them as erroneous. There is nothing in the point that the court erred in permitting McCulloch to testify as to what Witham said in reference to the lot in controversy prior to his purchase of it. The plaintiff claimed title through deeds from McCulloch to Witham, and Witham to himself. McCulloch was called as a witness for defendant, and was asked to state if, at the time he sold to Witham, Witham said anything to him about the northern boundary of the lot. He answered that when Witham came to see him about trading for the place, he asked how far the lot extended north, and witness replied that it extended to a certain fence, which he pointed out. In this question we see nothing objectionable. Any statement made by McCulloch, while an owner, as to the boundaries claimed by him, was admissible, and it was proper to show how the statement came to be made. The facts in the case of Sheils v. Haley, 61 Cal. 157, upon which appellant relies, are not like the facts in this case. There the court found "that, by mutual mistake, defendant had been in possession, without claim or right of title thereto," of the property in question. Here there is no such finding, and no evidence to warrant such a one.

The appeal from the judgment, it having been taken more than a year after the judgment was entered, should be dismissed, and the order denying the motion for new trial should be affirmed.

SEARLS, C., and FOOTE, C., concurred.

PER CURIAM. For reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order is affirmed.

SCOTT et al v. SUPERIOR COURT OF YOLO CO. (No. 12,422.

(Supreme Court of California. February 11, 1888.)

MANDAMUS—TO COURTS—TO COMPEL THE ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

A mandamus will not be granted to compel the superior court to reverse its ruling as to the admissibility of offered evidence, especially after the cause has been tried and judgment rendered.

In bank. Original proceeding in mandamus.

Application for mandamus, by H. H. Scott and others, to compel the superior court of Yolo county to admit certain matters in evidence.

J. Lambert, for petitioners.

McFARLAND, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus, commenced in this court. An alternative writ (by some inadvertence) was issued. The petition shows that one Hays obtained judgment against petitioners in a justice's court for $57.50 and costs; that Hays appealed to the superior court, where, on a trial with a jury, he obtained a judgment against petitioners for $70 and costs; that in the superior court petitioners filed a supplemental answer, showing that they had paid the amount of the judgment rendered in the justice's court, and that the superior court (respondent herein) refused to admit evidence tending to prove such payment. The prayer is that said superior court be commanded to permit petitioners to introduce such evidence.

All this simply means that this court should, by a writ of mandate, compel a superior court to reverse its ruling on a question involving the admissibility of certain offered evidence; and this, too, in a case where the superior court is the highest appellate court. Such a question, of course, cannot be reached by a writ of mandate, though it be stretched beyond the point to which the most extreme case has ever carried it. And it is difficult to understand what benefit petitioners could expect to derive from the writ in this case, even if it should be granted. After a case has been tried, a verdict rendered, and judgment entered, there is nothing upon which such a writ could operate. The prayer of petitioners is denied and the proceeding dismissed.

KNESS v. HERSHEY. (No. 12,240.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 14, 1888.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—ERRORS NOT APPARENT ON RECORD.

The decision of the trial court, on a motion for new trial on the ground of errors of law and insufficiency of evidence, will not be reviewed on appeal, where the statement filed with the motion in the trial court contains no specification of particular errors, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 659, subd. 3.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

D. N. Hershey sued A. Kness, constable of Grafton township, in Yolo county, for the recovery of the possession of a certain quantity of cheese and clover seed, of the aggregate value of $463.31, levied upon and seized by the defendant under an attachment issued out of the justice's court of said township, in a suit therein pending wherein one Silvas was plaintiff, and one J. N. Elliott defendant. By consent of parties, the cause was tried by the court, which found for the plaintiff, and entered judgment accordingly. Defendant gave notice of motion for a new trial on the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence and errors of law arising on the trial. The statement made by the court upon the hearing of the motion, pursuant to Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 659, subd. 3, contained no specification of the particulars in which the evidence was insufficient, or of the errors of law upon which defendant would rely. The motion was overruled, and defendant appealed. An assignment of errors by defendant's counsel was printed as part of the statement in the record of the cause sent up to appellate court, but, upon motion, was stricken out as an interpolation.

R. Clark, for appellant. Hudson Grant, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. All the appellant's specifications were stricken from the transcript for the reason that they were mere interpolations, and not a part of the statement as settled by the judge of the court below. This took away all right to be heard on the motion for new trial. The appellant's objections to the sufficiency of the complaint are without merit. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

HUTSON v. WOODBRIDGE PROTECTION DIST. et al. (No. 12,842.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 14, 1888.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—SUMMARY PROCESS FOR COLLECTION OF TAX.

The California act of April 15, 1880, providing for the protection of lands from overflow, provides for the establishment of districts and appointment of trustees; that the county supervisors shall appoint three commissioners resident of the district to view and assess on each tract of land a sum in proportion to the benefit to be derived from the protection; that upon the filing of their report the supervisors shall give notice when they will meet and review and adopt the report; that at that meeting the sums stated in the reports shall be adopted as the basis of the assessments; that the trustees shall take such basis and levy their assessment and file the lists with the county treasurer; and that from and after such filing the assessment shall be a lien on the land; that the treasurer shall give notice that the assessment has been filed, and if the assessments are not paid within a specified time, the treasurer shall turn them over to the collector, who shall proceed to collect them, and may do so by sale. Held that, as the act provides no opportunity for the owner to be heard as to the validity of the assessment, and provides a summary process for collection by sale, it is a taking of property without due process of law, and void.¹

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Hutson brought action to quiet his title to land, and to remove the cloud created by a certificate of tax sale, and joined as defendants the purchaser and also the taxing officers, basing his claim on the unconstitutionality of act Cal. April 15, 1880, under which they had proceeded. He obtained judgment in the court below, and defendants appealed therefrom.

Joseph H. Budd, for appellant. J. B. Hall, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. This action involves the constitutionality of certain provisions of the act of April 15, 1880, entitled "An act to provide for the protection of lands from overflow other than lands recognized as swamp lands." See St. 1880, p. 55. The work to be done under the act for protecting land from overflow is to be paid for by assessments on the lands included within a certain district, to be constituted in the mode provided for in the first, second, and third sections of the act. Three trustees of the district are to be elected, who are to be notified of their election. See third section. The act further provides that within 20 days after the trustees are notified of their election, they shall meet and organize as a board by the election from their number of a chairman and secretary, and enter upon the discharge of their duties. This board is to have charge of all the works of protection, and shall superintend the construction or repair of the same, and shall have power to do all other acts necessary for the accomplishment of the objects for which the district was organized. The board is empowered to employ competent engineers, and is required to proceed to survey, mark out, and locate the necessary work of protection for the district; to provide plans and specifications for the same and estimates of the cost of construction, and submit the same to the board of supervisors, by whom the district was formed, for their approval, modification, or rejection. See fourth section.

The fifth and sixth sections are as follows: "Sec. 5. Upon the adoption of a plan of protection, said board of supervisors shall appoint three disinterested persons, residing in any county in which some part of the district is situated, as commissioners, who shall, on being notified in writing of their appointment by the clerk of the board of supervisors, proceed to view each 40-acre tract, or fraction thereof, and each town lot or parcel of land within the district, and levy and fix against each such sum for protection purposes in proportion to the whole expense and to the benefits to be derived from such proposed works of protection, in gold coin of the United States, and report to said board of supervisors as follows: First. A description by the smallest legal subdivisions or natural boundaries of each tract, and number and block of each town lot in the district. Second. The number of acres in each tract or parcel of land, and the size of each town lot. Third. The names of the owners of each tract or lot, if known; and if not, as unknown. Fourth. The sum levied or fixed against each tract, parcel of land, or town lot.' Said commissioners shall be entitled to receive a sum not to exceed $5 per day each while performing said duties, to be paid out of the proper protection fund. Sec. 6. Upon the filing of the report of the commissioners, as aforesaid, with the clerk of the board of supervisors, said board shall give notice in some newspaper printed in the county, that they will, upon a day named in such notice, which day shall not be less than five days from the date of publication, meet and review, correct, and adopt said report; and upon the day thus fixed, the board of supervisors shall meet, review, correct, and adopt said report; and their decisions in the premises shall be final. The sums thus fixed against each tract, parcel of land, or town lot in said report, as adopted, shall be the basis of all assessments within the district for a term of ten years thereafter, unless legally changed as hereinafter provided. The words 'tract' or 'parcel of land' shall include all railroad beds within the district."

It will be observed that the action of the commissioners under the fifth, and the board of supervisors under the sixth, section, is to prepare, not an assessment, but the basis of an assessment, which basis may continue as such for the term of 10 years. The levy of the assessments is to be made under the seventh section by the board of trustees of the district. The section just mentioned is as follows: "Sec. 7. The board of trustees of any protection district formed under this act shall have power to levy assessments on or against each tract or parcel of land or town lot in the approved report of the commissioners for such district. On making such assessment, said trustees shall make a list of the sums assessed against each tract or parcel of land or town lot in the district, and file the same with the county treasurer of the county in which the district was organized; and from and after the filing thereof, the charges against any tract or parcel of land or town lot contained therein shall become a lien thereon; provided, that if any such land be situated in different counties, the trustees shall cause the same to be filed in each county where the land is situated." The list of assessments thus levied by the board of trustees under section 8, when prepared and filed with the county treasurer, is to remain in the office of the treasurer for 30 days, or longer, if so ordered by the board of trustees, and during this period any person may pay the charges so assessed to the officer last named. When the list is filed in the office of the treasurer, he is to give notice, by publication in a newspaper printed in the county, that the assessment has been filed in his office, with the date of the filing; that the amounts entered thereon are due and payable; and that if not paid on or before the first Monday of January next ensuing, the same will become delinquent, and will be turned over to the tax collector for collection. The treasurer is to note on the lists all assessments paid, and shall, on the day above named, turn said list over to the tax collector of the county, who shall proceed to collect the assessments which are delinquent, and may collect by sale of the assessed lands.

It is argued that the owner of the land assessed has no opportunity under the act to be heard in regard to the assessment, and that on non-payment his land will be sold without any opportunity to be heard as to this charge, which is declared to be a lien on his land, and that he will thus be deprived of his property without due process of law. We think the point well taken. No provision is made anywhere in the statute for any hearing by the land-owner whose land is to be charged. No notice is to be given him when the board of trustees is to levy the assessment, and if he appears when such assessment is to be levied by the board of trustees, no hearing by the board is provided for in the act. The collection provided for is summary and without suit brought at which the property owner can be heard. The assessment is by the terms of the act made an absolute lien on his property, without any provision or opportunity allowed him to show its illegality or unconstitutionality. For these reasons, we are of opinion, according to well-settled rules, that the act is unconstitutional, and the assessment and sale under it cannot be valid.

The judgment and order must be affirmed. So ordered.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

NOTE.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW. In a proceeding at common law, a citizen of the United States cannot be divested of his property except by verdict of a jury, under due process of law, in a proceeding in which he is in some manner a party, having opportunity to be heard, and having a day in court. The J. W. French, 13 Fed. Rep. 916. A statute authorizing the judge to commit to jail a party who refuses to obey an order, in proceedings auxiliary to execution, directing him to turn over property in his possession to the court, held not to be a violation of the provisions of the Iowa constitution, which provide for the right of trial by jury, and that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Eikenbury v. Edwards, (Iowa,) 25 N. W. Rep. 892. The right of trial by jury in chancery cases not being guaranteed by any constitutional provision, and the courts of chancery in Iowa having had, prior to the enactment of the statute regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, a well-settled jurisdiction of suits to abate nuisances, that statute is not unconstitutional because it denounces the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors as a nuisance, and provides for its abatement by proceedings in chancery; nor is it unconstitutional as depriving the guilty person of his property without due process of law,—the proper and orderly proceedings of a court of chancery being “due process of law,” within the meaning of the constitutional guaranty. State v. Jordan, (Iowa,) 34 N. W. Rep. 285. A statute regarding the forfeiture of liquors unlawfully kept is not unconstitutional in giving to district courts power to condemn prohibited liquors, whatever their value may be, because the right of trial by jury is not invaded; the act reserving a right of appeal to the court of common pleas. State v. Fitzpatrick, (R. I.) 11 Atl. Rep. 773. One who instigates a criminal prosecution maliciously, and without probable cause, and who is committed to jail until he pays the costs of the prosecution, by order of the municipal judge, under a statute authorizing such order, cannot complain that the proceeding is without due process of law, or that trial by jury has been denied him. State v. Smith, (Wis.) 26 N. W. Rep. 258. The fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, which provides that a state shall not “deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law,” does not preclude a state from giving jurisdiction to a court of equity of a suit brought by the owner of an equitable interest in land to establish a trust in the holder of the legal title, because it deprives the latter of a right to trial by jury, which he would have in a suit at law. Church v. Kelsey, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 897.

PEOPLE v. KELLEHER. (No. 20,328.)

(Supreme Court of California. December 1, 1887.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Defendant, being convicted of an offense, filed, in a motion for a new trial, the affidavits of himself and two others to the effect that he was in a certain saloon when the alleged offense was committed, that another person had admitted that he did the act, and that defendant did not know of such evidence until after the trial. Held, that a new trial was improperly refused.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

This was an information against Cornelius Kelleher for an assault with intent to commit rape on the person of Kate Halpin. Defendant was convicted, and moved for a new trial, on the ground of after-discovered evidence; and in support thereof filed the affidavits of himself and two others alleging that defendant was in the saloon of John Lyons, waiting upon customers, when the alleged offense was committed; that one Lucey had admitted that he had taken hold of the woman at the time alleged in the information, and that she screamed, whereupon he ran away; and that defendant was not aware of the existence of such evidence until after the trial. The motion was overruled, and defendant appeals.

E. R. Chase and T. R. Whitcomb, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. As stated by the attorney general upon the argument, the evidence upon which a conviction was had in this case is very weak, although there is sufficient to prevent this court from setting aside the verdict. In view of the testimony in the case, however, we think that the affidavits filed in support of the motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence were sufficient to entitle the defendant to a new trial. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

CHIN KEM YOU v. AH JOAN. (No. 11,042.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 16, 1888.)

ACTION—BY WHOM MAINTAINABLE—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Where it does not appear that one whose business is that of loaning money for a loan company is acting in the capacity of trustee, or that he has any interest in the money loaned, he cannot maintain an action in his own name for the recovery thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by Chin Kem You for the recovery of money loaned the defendant, Ah Joan. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

D. L. Smoot, for appellant. Frank M. Stone, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit. The action was brought to recover the sum of $500, with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per month from the fifteenth day of June, 1883, till paid. The complaint alleges that the principal sum was loaned by plaintiff to defendant on the fifteenth day of December, 1882, and that it was then and there agreed between the parties that the money should bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per month, payable monthly, and should be repaid three months after the date of the loan. The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint. The material facts proved by plaintiff at the trial are as follows: The plaintiff was a Chinaman, and kept a pawnbroker's shop in the city of San Francisco; the defendant was a Chinawoman, and lived in that city. There was a Chinese society in the city, known as "Hong Fook Tong." It does not appear how the society was formed, or who were its members, but its business was to receive and loan out money. The plaintiff acted as the agent of the society, or, as one of the witnesses said, "as trustee;" and "the money of the society was under his control and in his custody." In reference to the loan the plaintiff, after stating that defendant applied to him at his shop for a loan of $500, and after stating the conversation that ensued about the security and the rate of interest, testified as follows: "She asked for the money on December 14, 1882, and I paid it to her on December 15, 1882. I went in company with Chin Suey Tung, and carried the money to her. I wrote out the contract, and when we went up I read it to her. She also got Chin Suey Tung to read it to her. She said: 'That is the contract.' She signed the contract there by putting her finger in the ink and touching it to the paper. That is the contract in the book. That is the spot which she made with her finger near her name. There is in this book a contract as to other money which she borrowed from me signed by her in the same way. After she signed the paper the money was paid to her in gold coin. * * * The contract was written in my store; it was signed at Ah Joan's house. Ah Joan's name was written at her house. She brought out an ink-box and a pen—a Chinese pen. The money belonged to the Hong Fook Tong."

Chin Suey Tung was a witness, and testified: "On December 15, 1882, Chin Kem You came to my store and said that Ah Joan had asked him for a loan of $500. The money was to come from the Hong Fook Tong. I had an interest in it. He said: 'Ah Joan wants $500, and if you have time we will give it to her.' * * * I went with Kem You up to Ah Joan's house. I asked Joan: 'Do you want to borrow some of the Hong Fook Tong money?' She said 'Yes.' * * * When it [the contract] was written, Chin Kem You paid Ah Joan $500, in $20 gold pieces. The writing is Chinese. The book and writing are the records of borrowed money. This particular writing is the account of money. Chin Kem You read it to Ah Joan. She said that it would do. As she said she could not write she signed by dipping her finger in ink, and therewith making a spot mark near her name. That is the Chinese method of signing when the party cannot write. * * * I had an interest in the society, and an interest in the $500. The money belonged to the Hong Fook Tong Society, and Chin Kem You attended to their accounts, and lent out their money for them." The contract referred to by the witness, when translated, reads as follows: "Chinese Quong Suey, eighth year, eleventh month, seventh day. Ah Joan borrowed from Hong Fook Tong, $500. At the term of three months the money must be paid in full with the interest. For every hundred dollars four dollars of interest must be paid each month." Afterwards the plaintiff loaned to defendant $100 of his own money, and the memorandum of that loan is in the same book, and signed in the same way as the other, and is translated to read as follows: "Quong Suey, eighth year, twelfth month, twenty-fifth day. Ah Joan borrowed $100 from Chin Kem You. Each month, $4 interest." Of this loan the plaintiff testified: "The $500 was not due when I loaned her the $100. It is a heavier penalty for a person to sign with the finger and not repay the money. Under this contract, signed in this way, I could have anything which Ah Joan possessed to satisfy the debt." It was further proved that the defendant stated in the presence of two of the witnesses that she owed the plaintiff $600, and that she subsequently repaid the $100 loan, with the interest thereon, and paid $120, being six months' interest on the $500 loan.

One of the grounds upon which the nonsuit was asked and granted was that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and so was not authorized to bring the suit in his own name; that the cause of action, if any existed, was in favor of the Hong Fook Tong Society, and not the plaintiff. It is argued for the appellant that he was authorized to bring the action in his own name because he had a personal interest in the money loaned, and, besides, was the trustee of an express trust. After carefully examining the record, we are unable to find any evidence that the plaintiff had any personal interest in the money, or was a member of the "Hong Fook Tong" Society. It is true, the witness Chin Suey Tung, speaking of the writing made at the time of the loan, said: "My name and that of the plaintiff appear in this writing." But how they appeared there he does not say. He seems to have translated the writing, and, as translated, it does not sustain his assertion. If he meant to say that he and the plaintiff were members of the society, he should have so stated in language which could be understood. We are also unable to find any evidence that the plaintiff made the loan as the trustee of an express trust. "A person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, is a trustee of an express trust, and may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted." Section 369, Code Civil Proc. The plaintiff had charge of the Hong Fook Tong Society's money, and loaned it to defendant, but he made the loan in the name of the society, and not in his own name. This is clearly shown by the writing which he drew up and required the defendant to sign, as an acknowledgment that she had received the money and was to repay it at a fixed time, with large interest. The plaintiff seems to us, in his dealings with the defendant, to have acted simply as the agent of the society. The Code says: "An agent is one who represents another, called the principal, in dealings with third persons." Section 2295, Civil Code. But an agent who has loaned out the money of his principal in the name of the principal cannot himself sue to recover it back. Swift v. Swift, 46 Cal. 269. We do not consider the statements of defendant that she owed the money to the plaintiff material.

The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

HILLIKER v. KUHN. (No. 11,571.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 28, 1886.)

PLEDGE—LIEN—CHANGE OF POSSESSION—POSSESSION OF PLEDGE HOLDER.

A threshing-machine, with its appurtenances, having been pledged for a loan, was kept for some time by the pledgeor. It was then given to a third person, who agreed to run it, and pay the net proceeds to the pledgee on account of his claim; the pledgeor agreeing to furnish the necessary labor and supplies, and to obtain work for the machine, and the pledgee reserving the right to resume possession at his pleasure. The pledge-holder not running the machine properly, the pledgeor, without pledgee's knowledge, assisted him at various times. Afterwards the machine was delivered to another pledge-holder, under a similar arrangement. With the possession of this party the pledgeor did not interfere, but the machine was forcibly taken from him by the laborers employed to run it, on account of non-payment of their wages, and then seized on attachment by other creditors of the pledgeor. Held, that there had been a sufficient delivery and continued change of possession to sustain pledgee's lien, as against these creditors; the same rule applying to a pledge as to a sale of personal property.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

This is an action by L. W. Hilliker against H. Kuhn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

George P. Harding and J. W. Goin, for appellant.

The pledge was not accompanied by a continuous change of possession sufficient to preserve the lien of the pledgee against the creditors of the pledgeor.

FOOTE, C. Hilliker brought an action against Kuhn, as constable, claiming that the latter was unlawfully about to sell under execution, upon judgments obtained against one Locke, certain property which the plaintiff claimed to have had in the possession of a pledge-holder, to secure an indebtedness due from Locke to him, (the plaintiff.) He prayed for a perpetual injunction to restrain Kuhn from selling said property, and for damages. He obtained judgment enjoining its sale, and for costs. From an order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant has appealed. He claims that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the findings. There was certainly some conflict in the evidence, but for that reason alone the findings should not be disturbed. They are as follows:

"That all the allegations contained in the complaint are true, except: (1) The allegation that plaintiff is the legal owner of the property described therein is not true; and in relation thereto the court finds that one H. F. Locke, the person named in said complaint as pledgeor, was at all times mentioned therein the owner of said property. (2) The allegation thereof that, prior to the commencement of said action, plaintiff had been damaged by the acts and threatened acts of defendant in the sum of fifty dollars, and in the further sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, expenses incurred for counsel fees, is not true. The allegation in the answer that on June 18, 1884, said Locke was in the actual possession of all said property, and that he thereafter continued at all times in such possession of all said property until the same was seized by defendant, and taken possession of by him, under and by virtue of attachments issued in the suits referred to in said answer, is not true; nor is it true that Locke had possession of any of said property during any of said time. That the allegation in said answer that the persons designated as creditors in said actions were creditors of said Locke, while he was in possession of the property described in the amended complaint, is not true. It was stipulated and agreed by defendant, on the trial of this cause, that if there was such a delivery of the property described in said complaint to the plaintiff, or to the pledgeholder to hold for security of plaintiff's debt against Locke, and such a continuous possession by plaintiff or his pledge-holder as the law requires, in order to preserve the lien of a pledgee of personal property, as against the creditors of the pledgeor, then in that case plaintiff is entitled to a decree making the injunction perpetual. In reference to the alleged delivery to and subsequent possession of said personal property by the plaintiff, the court finds the following to be the facts, to-wit: In August, 1883, plaintiff loaned H. F. Locke the sum of four hundred dollars, taking his note therefor, due, with interest, six months after date. That, at the time of such loan and execution of said note, said Locke, being the owner and in possession of said personal property, delivered the whole thereof to plaintiff to secure the payment of said note. That plaintiff thereupon took possession of said property, and deposited it in his own name in a warehouse in the town of Woodland, in said county, taking the warehouseman's receipt therefor. That the delivery of said property, and change of possession from Locke to Hilliker, the plaintiff herein, was open and notorious, and plaintiff kept the same continuously in his exclusive possession in said warehouse until the nineteenth day of June, 1884. That at the date last aforesaid, at the request of said Locke, plaintiff loaned him a further sum of money, which, added to the amount then due upon said note, increased the indebtedness of Locke to plaintiff to the sum of $761.75. That at the time of such subsequent loan said Locke proposed to plaintiff that said property, which consisted of a threshing-machine, engine, and threshing outfit, should be run during the threshing season of 1884, then about to commence, and, to induce plaintiff to consent that said property be used during said threshing season, represented to him that he (Locke) would furnish the labor and supplies necessary to run the machine, and do the work of looking up jobs of threshing, and notify the person in charge of said property of the place where such jobs were engaged.

"The court further finds that, to enable said Locke to pay his debt without a sale of said property, the plaintiff, upon the aforesaid representation of Locke, entered into an additional agreement in writing with him, by the terms of which plaintiff and Locke agreed to appoint, and did appoint, one W. S. Lafferty to take possession of said property as a pledge-holder, and to hold the same in his exclusive possession in pledge to secure the indebtedness of Locke to plaintiff until such indebtedness was paid; the plaintiff, however, reserving the right to retake the property from such pledge-holder at any time. It was further agreed by the terms of said writing between plaintiff, Locke, and said pledge-holder that said pledge-holder should take exclusive charge of said property; that he should run and operate the same during the threshing season until Locke's debt to plaintiff was fully paid from the earnings thereof, unless plaintiff should exercise his right to retake said property prior to such payment, and pay to plaintiff the net earnings of said machine until his debt and interest were fully paid. That, pursuant to said agreement, said plaintiff, on the nineteenth day of June, 1884, delivered all of said property to said W. S. Lafferty, the pledge-holder aforesaid, who took and held the same, and thereafter, on the twelfth day of July, 1884, commenced threshing, said Locke having furnished him necessary laborers to assist in running said machinery; and said Lafferty continued to run and operate said machinery, and in the possession thereof, until the eighteenth day of August, 1884. That, during the time said Lafferty was running said machinery Locke was frequently at the places where the same was being run, and from his observations concluded that said Lafferty was not sufficiently experienced to manage and run said machinery successfully; whereupon, on occasions when said Locke was present at the places where said machinery was being run, he frequently assisted said Lafferty in moving and setting said machinery, and by directions and advice, as to the details of managing the same. That plaintiff resides at a distance from the places where said machinery was being run, and had no knowledge of such or any interference on the part of Locke. That about the eighteenth day of August, 1884, Locke reported to plaintiff that the pledge-holder, Lafferty, was not, in his judgment, sufficiently experienced to operate said machinery successfully; whereupon plaintiff and said Locke appointed one A. B. Nordyke to take the possession of said property, and to hold and run the same, pursuant to the agreement between plaintiff and Locke when Lafferty was appointed pledge-holder. That at the date last mentioned Nordyke went to the machine, when Lafferty there delivered to him the possession of all the property described in the complaint, and said Nordyke took the same as pledge-holder, and run and used the same in threshing grain during the balance of the time the same was so used, to-wit, until the ninth day of September, 1884; and during the time said Nordyke had the same in possession said Locke exercised no control in the details of moving or running and operating said machinery, the said Nordyke having the exclusive management thereof, and the control and direction of all laborers employed about the same. That he notified the persons with whom he transacted business that he was in possession of said property as pledge-holder. That at the date last mentioned, September 9, 1884, a portion of the laborers who were employed to work about said machinery forcibly took the same from said Nordyke, and hauled it from the field, where it was being used in threshing, to a public highway contiguous thereto, commenced suits for wages alleged to be due them, and sued out attachments against the property of plaintiff and said Locke, which attachments were placed in the hands of defendant, and by him levied on the tenth day of September, 1884, by seizure of the property described in the complaint, and taking possession thereof; which suits were the same referred to in the complaint as brought against plaintiff and said Locke. That while the property was so in the hands of said defendant, under said attachments, the judgment creditors referred to in the complaint—to satisfy whose judgment the property was about to be sold at the commencement of this action—began their actions against said Locke and caused said property to be attached by defendant, in their respective suits, as the property of said Locke. That during all the time said property was in the hands of said pledge-holders, or either of them, there was no concealment, or attempt at concealment, on the part of plaintiff or said pledge-holders as to the status or condition of said property. That, while the property was so in the hands of said pledge-holders, plaintiff told, among other persons, some of the judgment creditors mentioned in said complaint, that the same was being held in pledge to secure Locke's debt to him. That said Locke on one occasion, a short time prior to the levy of said attachments, told one of his creditors (not one of the judgment creditors mentioned in the complaint) that said property had not been pledged by him, but that such statement was false, and made without the knowledge or assent of plaintiff, and in his absence; and that plaintiff did not know until after the commencement of the suits, and the attachment by the judgment creditors named in the complaint, that said Locke had ever at any time made such a statement denying the pledge of said property. That the pledge-holder Nordyke was paid by plaintiff for his services as such pledge-holder at the rate of four dollars per day. That all the acts and transactions of plaintiff were open, fair, and were made and done in good faith. That the indebtedness of Locke to the said judgment creditors mentioned in the complaint was contracted subsequently to June 19, 1884."

The contention of the appellant that, under the findings, the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction, should not prevail, because, in the first place, it was stipulated between the parties in the court below, upon the trial, that if there was such a delivery of the property described in said complaint to the plaintiff, or to the pledge-holder to hold for the security of plaintiff's debt against Locke, and such a continuous possession by plaintiff or pledge-holder as the law requires in order to preserve the lien of a pledgee of personal property, as against the creditors of the pledgeor, then in that case plaintiff is entitled to a decree making the injunction perpetual; and because, secondly, the findings show that "the delivery and continuous change of possession required by law" were sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to preserve his lien aforesaid. For the mere fact that Locke, after the delivery of possession to pledge-holder, either with, or, as appears most probable, without, the knowledge or consent of Hilliker, had for a time taken charge of the property in the manner he did, would not necessarily render the holding of it as a pledge void as to creditors, (Goldstein v. Nunan, 66 Cal. 542, 6 Pac. Rep. 451;) the same rule being applicable, in such a case, with regard to delivery and change of possession, as that which is required on a sale of personal property, (Woods v. Bugbey, 29 Cal. 466.) The order should be affirmed.

BELCHER, C. C., and SEARLS, C., concurred.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed

TIDE LAND RECLAMATION CO. v. CUNNINGHAM. (No. 11,030.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 28, 1886.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

When the trial court has granted a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, its action will not be reviewed in the supreme court.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action brought by Tide Land Reclamation Company, a corporation, against Thomas Cunningham, sheriff of San Joaquin county, for the conversion of certain stock. Verdict for defendant. New trial granted, and defendant appeals from the order.

W. L. Dudley, for appellant. Terry & McKinne, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover damages for the unlawful taking and conversion of certain horses, mules, and colts. Defendant had a verdict, which was, on motion of plaintiff, set aside, and a new trial granted. Defendant appeals from the order granting a new trial. The plaintiff is a corporation. Defendant was sheriff of the county of San Joaquin, and justified taking the property under and by virtue of a writ of attachment issued out of the district court of the Fifth judicial district in and for the county of San Joaquin, in a certain action wherein B. W. Owens and E. Moore were plaintiffs, and S. L. Ganow was defendant. The answer sets up that the animals belonged to said Ganow, and were seized under said writ of attachment, as his property; that, after such seizure, the said Owens and Moore obtained judgment against said Ganow, and thereupon the defendant herein, under and by virtue of an execution issued thereon, levied upon and sold a part of the property to satisfy said judgment. The order in the case does not show upon what ground the motion for a new trial was granted. The evidence as to the ownership of the animals was conflicting, and as every intendment must be indulged in favor of the action of the court below, we are authorized to presume that the motion was granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Irving v. Cunningham, 58 Cal. 306. The court below, who has the witnesses before it, with an opportunity to judge from their manner and appearance, and mode of testifying, as to the credit to be given to their statements, is in a much better position to judge of the facts than we are. It is therefore eminently proper that a wide discretion be given to the judge who presided at the trial, in granting and refusing new trials in cases involving a substantial conflict of evidence. In the present case we see no cause to infer an abuse of the discretion vested in the court. Savage v. Sweeney, 63 Cal. 340; Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 99.

The order of the court below should be affirmed.

BELCHER, C. C., and FOOTE, C., concurred.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

71 Cal. 223

SHEPHERD v. JONES. (No. 11,483.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 28, 1886.)

1. APPEALS—TIME OF TAKING—FROM JUDGMENT.

In California, appeals taken more than one year after rendition of the judgment appealed from will be dismissed.

2. SAME—RECORD—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.

An assignment of error in these words: "The court erred in ordering judgment for the plaintiff on the findings,"—is too general to warrant the appellate court to review the judgment.

3. SAME—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the trial judge supplements a special verdict by certain special findings of his own, such findings, not having been excepted to at the time by either party, will be presumed to have been adopted by both.

4. SAME.

Defendant resisted payment of a note, claiming its execution was fraudulently obtained from him, and asked the court to charge that "fraudulent representations" might consist in acts as well as words, and if said note was fraudulently obtained the verdict should be for him. Held, such request correctly stated the law, and, having been refused, such refusal would be presumed to have been for lack of evidence tending to support it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

The action was brought on a promissory note. The defendant in his answer denied the allegations of the complaint, and pleaded in avoidance of the note: (1) Want of consideration; (2) fraud in procuring the execution of the note; and (3) rescission by agreement of the parties, and the return to the payee of certain stock for which the note had been given. The further facts are stated in the opinion.

J. C. Campbell and D. S. Ferry, for appellant. J. A. Louittet and Joseph H. Budd, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action upon a promissory note given for the purchase of stock in a mining company, and the appeal is from a judgment entered against the defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The appeal from the judgment cannot be considered, for the reason that it was taken more than a year after the judgment was entered. The motion for a new trial was properly denied. The case was tried before a jury upon special issues, and the court then, after argument, found certain other facts, and upon the verdict and findings rendered the judgment. Conceding that this method of procedure was irregular, still no objection appears to have been taken to it by either side, and we must presume it was adopted by consent. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury, in effect, that fraudulent representations may be made by acts as well as by words, and that if the note was obtained from defendant by false and fraudulent representations, then the verdict should be in favor of defendant. The court refused to instruct as requested, and the refusal is assigned as error. The instructions stated correct propositions of law, and were refused, doubtless, because there was no evidence to support them. If so, the refusal was proper. Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154; Mendelsohn v. Lighter Co., 40 Cal. 657. The jury found that the defendant was not induced to execute the note by any false and fraudulent representations; and after carefully going over the record, we are unable to find any testimony tending to show that he was. It is true that shortly before the giving of the note the defendant, with the secretary and two of the directors of the company, went to the mine, and, while they were standing on the surface of it, the secretary picked up a small piece of gold, and one of the directors picked up another piece, and at another time the secretary showed the defendant some gold filings which, as he represented, had been washed out of the mine, and that defendant was thereby so impressed with the value of the mine that he concluded to take the stock, and give his note. But there is no testimony to show that the small pieces of gold were not honestly found and picked up, or that the gold filings did not come from the mine as represented.

Within a month after his purchase of the stock, the defendant became dissatisfied with his bargain, and sought to rescind the contract. He returned the certificate which he had received to the secretary, and demanded back his note. The secretary took the certificate, and subsequently promised to get and return the note, but never did so. The court finds that before the promise to return was made, the note had been, for a valuable consideration, and by a resolution passed by the directors of the company, transferred and assigned to the plaintiff, and that he was then the owner and holder of it. It is objected that this finding is not supported by, but is directly contrary to, the evidence. Conceding this to be so, we cannot consider the objection, for the reason that there is no specification in the statement on which it can be rested. The attempted specification, that "the court erred in ordering judgment for the plaintiff on the findings," is not sufficient for any purpose.

On the whole, we find no error in the record of which the defendant can be heard to complain. The appeal from the judgment should therefore be dismissed, and the order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

SEARLS and FOOTE, CC., concurred.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial affirmed. Hearing in bank denied.

75 Cal. 134

JOHNSTON et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO SAV. UNION. (No. 12,075.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 18, 1888.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—RIGHTS OF HEIRS—DEBTS OF SURVIVOR—QUIETING TITLE.

A surviving husband mortgaged community land to secure a community debt, and also a debt contracted after his wife's death, and the mortgagee purchased the land on foreclosure. Some of the wife's heirs who were minors at the time of the foreclosure, and were not brought into court in that action, sued to quiet the title to their share of the land. Held, under Act Cal. 1850, relating to community property, that, before obtaining a decree, they must pay their proportionate share of the community debt secured by the mortgage, less the amount due them for their share of the rents and profits of the land accruing while the mortgagor held it, but that they need not pay any part of the debt incurred after the wife's death; the mortgagor having no power to bind their interest in the community property for any except community debts.

2. SAME—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

The respective rights of surviving husband and children in community property are governed by the law in force at the time of the wife's death.

JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—DEFENDANT SUED BY FICTITIOUS NAME—WAIVER OF IRREGULARITIES.

In a foreclosure suit, an adult not named as a party defendant, or served with summons, appeared and answered, reciting that he had been sued by a fictitious name, and setting up a claim to the land. Judgment was rendered against him by his true name, though the complaint was not amended. Held, that the judgment was conclusive against him on collateral attack, whether his claim was adverse to the mortgagor or not; he having submitted both his person and his cause to the jurisdiction of the court.

4. SAME—RENDITION AND ENTRY—JUDGE'S MEMORANDUM.

A judgment is not void although the court filed first a memorandum of opinion, and then a set of formal findings, whichever instrument be considered the basis of the judgment, since the question whether the findings support the judgment cannot be raised upon a collateral proceeding.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

This was an action brought by James Johnston, John F. Johnston, and Francis T. Johnston against the San Francisco Savings Union to quiet title to certain land. The court granted the decree upon conditions, and both parties appeal.

Eugene R. Garber and George C. Ross, for appellants. A. & H. C. Campbell, (Cope & Boyd, of counsel,) for respondents.

HAYNE, C. An action to quiet title. In 1859 the property in controversy was the community property of James Johnston, Sr., and Petra Jara, his wife. In that year Johnston was indebted to J. and William M. Morris in the sum of $17,000, secured by mortgage upon the property, and "which said indebtedness was a debt contracted during the life-time of said Petra, and after her intermarriage with said James Johnston, Sr., and was a debt of said marital community." Petra Jara died on April 30, 1861, leaving the three plaintiffs, her surviving children. Prior to her death, the debt had been reduced by payments, and subsequently there were many changes in the form of the indebtedness. In this regard the court finds: "That said debt was never paid, but that said James Johnston, Sr., at different times, renewed and extended such debt, and the security therefor, which indebtedness and security were held by other persons than said J. and Wm. M. Morris, but that it always existed and continued, increased by the accumulation of interest at said rate; and that new mortgages were by said James Johnston, Sr., substituted for the old from time to time as they fell due. That the loan made by the defendant herein, and the mortgage given therefor, * * * was one of such renewals and substitutions; and to the extent of $9,150, with interest thereon from April 1, 1864, was a survival of the said debt of the marital community of said James Johnston, Sr., and Petra Jara." In November, 1875, the defendant herein commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage mentioned in the finding quoted. The three children of Petra Jara (two of whom were then minors) were not parties defendant by name; but they came in and filed answers, reciting that they were sued by fictitious names, and setting up substantially the facts upon which they found their present claim. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff in said suit, and the property was sold, the plaintiff in said suit (defendant herein) becoming the purchaser, and, in due time, receiving the sheriff's deed. The court below decided against the plaintiff James Johnston, but quieted the title of the other two plaintiffs upon condition of their paying to the defendant their proportion of the community debt of $9,150, with interest from April 1, 1864. Each side appeals.

1. It is contended that the court in the foreclosure suit filed a second set of findings, and that, this being unauthorized, the decree was void. It is plain, however, that what is termed the "first set of findings" is merely the opinion of the court. The learned judge who wrote it calls it a "memorandum." But if it had amounted to formal findings, and if the consequence had been that the second set of findings was unauthorized, as contended, the result would simply be that the document first filed would do duty as the findings in the case, and it would not matter whether it supported the judgment or not; for the question whether the findings support the judgment—in other words, whether the judgment is erroneous—cannot be raised in a collateral action. If there were no findings at all, a waiver would have to be presumed, even on appeal in the cause, and, a fortiori, in a subsequent action. It has even been held that a judgment ordered without a trial cannot be attacked collaterally. Ex parte Bennett, 44 Cal. 87.

2. The plaintiff James Johnston, Jr., was of age at the time of the commencement of the foreclosure suit. As above stated, he was not named as a party defendant, nor was he served with summons under a fictitious name. But he came in and answered, reciting that he was sued by the fictitious name of John Doe, and setting up the substance of his claim in the present suit. The complaint was not amended by inserting his true name, but judgment was entered against him by his true name. The fact that he was not served with summons is immaterial. Service of summons is waived by appearance, (except in case of a minor;) and we think this rule applies where the party is sued by a fictitious name, as this party appears from his own recital to have been. Nor is it material that his true name was not afterwards inserted in the complaint. That irregularity does not render the judgment void. Campbell v. Adams, 50 Cal. 203. But it is argued for this plaintiff that his interest was adverse to that of the mortgagor, and therefore that it could not have been litigated in the foreclosure suit, and that the decree is void as to him for that reason. Conceding, for the purpose of the case, that his interest was adverse, within the meaning of the rule invoked, and that therefore it could not properly have been tried and determined in that suit, the fact remains that it was there tried and determined. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person; and, this being the case, we fail to perceive how the circumstance that the issues tried were improperly mixed up with other issues can render the judgment void. If that were the rule, it would follow that questions as to misjoinder of causes of action and defense could be made on a collateral attack, which it is hardly necessary to say is not the case. If the party did not desire to have his interest passed upon in the foreclosure suit, and was right in his position with respect to it, he should have taken steps to present the question in that suit; or, if he wished a jury trial, he should have asked for it there. The case of McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 418, 12 Pac. Rep. 347, is not in conflict with the foregoing. There the judgment of foreclosure against the party in question was by default. He did not set up his adverse interest, and the decision simply was that he was not required to do so. The other cases cited have no application. In San Francisco

v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 472; Croghan v. Minor, 53 Cal. 15; and Marlow v. Barlow, Id. 456,—the question was made on appeal in the foreclosure suit. In Fulton v. Hanlow, 20 Cal. 450, and Flandreau v. Downey, 23 Cal. 354, the actions were not actions of foreclosure.

3. The other plaintiffs here, viz., John F. Johnston and Francis T. Johnston, were minors at the time of the foreclosure suit. And it was held upon the former appeal (63 Cal. 554) that the court did not acquire jurisdiction of their persons in that suit. It is now argued for the defendant here that the surviving husband represented the community, and that therefore the children were not necessary parties; and Carter v. Conner, 60 Tex. 52, is cited. But that matter was decided upon the former appeal. The court there said: "As to the legal title of an undivided moiety of the lands, descent was cast upon them on the death of their mother. The object of the suit was to sell and transfer their title, as well as that of their father. They had an interest to protect it; to deny the existence of the mortgage, or to reduce the amount alleged to be secured by it; to prove that there were no community debts, or that they were less than the advance made by the mortgagee, and that the mortgagee had notice of the facts with reference to such indebtedness; that their father had exceeded his limited authority, and that the mortgagee knew it was not a mortgage in 'good faith.' As they were necessary parties to the foreclosure suit, the decree therein was void with respect to one-half the lands mortgaged, unless the court acquired jurisdiction of the infants." Johnston v. Savings Union, 63 Cal. 560, 561.

This decision has become the law of the case, and the question as to the effect of the decree upon the interest of these two plaintiffs is no longer open. Upon the retrial the court below so held. But it also held that, the present action being equitable in its nature, these plaintiffs would be granted relief only upon condition of their paying to the defendant here two-sixths of the sum of $9,150, and interest. Each side appeals from this decision. The two plaintiffs urge that no condition should have been imposed upon them, and that, if it be imposed, the rents and profits should be set off against it. The defendant contends that the condition should have been extended to a proportion of the whole sum found due in the foreclosure suit. We will examine these positions separately.

(a) The wife having died while the act of 1850 was in force, that act must govern the case. The construction which it received was that the death of the wife did not release any portion of the property from liability to be taken for community debts, and that her descendants took it subject to the payment of such debts; that no probate administration of the estate of the deceased wife was necessary, but that the husband had control of the property, as survivor of the marital partnership, for the purpose of settling up its affairs. See Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 536; Ord v. De la Guerra, 18 Cal. 67; Cook v. Norman, 50 Cal. 637. At the time of the death, there was a community debt, which was secured by mortgage upon the property. This debt (or a portion of it) was kept alive by the surviving husband by renewals, extensions, and substitutions, as stated in the finding above quoted. If he had the power so to keep it alive, we think it must be regarded as the same debt; for a court of equity will look beneath the mere form of the transaction, and regard its substance only. We think he had the power. If he could have conveyed the whole property in satisfaction of the debt, as was held in Cook v. Norman, above cited, it is hard to see why he could not attempt to save some of it for those interested by putting off the day of payment. Rusk v. Warren, 25 La. Ann. 314. The children were not personally liable for the debt, and could not lose, but might have gained, by the course taken. At the time of the foreclosure suit, therefore, the interests of these children were bound by the mortgage for a portion of the debt. Their interests escaped from the operation of the decree by a mere slip in the foreclosure proceedings.

And, while it must be held that they did so escape, yet, when the owners of such interests come into equity for relief against the cloud arising from the very same foreclosure proceedings, they must be prepared to do equity; and we think it is equity that they should pay such proportion of the community debt as their share bears to the whole property, viz., two-sixths. See Kellogg v. Duralde, 26 La. Ann. 234. The court below, therefore, was right in imposing the condition upon the plaintiffs.

(b) We think it was also right in not extending the condition to a proportion of the whole sum found due in the foreclosure suit. The equity to which effect is given by the condition depends upon whether, at the time of the foreclosure suit, the interests of the plaintiffs were bound by the mortgage. As above stated, we think their interests were bound by the mortgage for so much of the debt as was a survival of the original debt contracted during the existence of the community. This was fixed by the findings at $9,150, with interest as specified; and, after a careful examination, we cannot say from the record that this finding was not justified by the evidence. The remainder of the $60,000, then, was a debt contracted after the dissolution of the community. The question, therefore, is whether the surviving husband had the power to bind the interests of the children for the payment of this portion of the debt. The position that he had such power appears to us to rest upon the idea that, notwithstanding the death of the wife, the "community" continued, or might continue, with reference to the children's interest. So far as we are advised, that was the case in the Spanish law. In the argument of the case of Packard v. Arellanes, Mr. Lies (who was well versed in Spanish law) said: "By whatever shadowy designation of feigned dominion or defeasible right the Spanish jurists call the mother's title, her heirs knew that the property must descend to them, and that their father managed it as their senior partner." 17 Cal. 536. And in Ord v. De la Guerra, BALDWIN, J., delivering the opinion, said: "It is, moreover, held by the civil law, that, when the husband keeps undivided the common property after the death of the wife, it is presumed to be done with the acquiescence of the heirs, and the effect is to continue the partnership. See Escriche, Dict. verb. 'Bienes Gananciales,' 368." But this doctrine of the Spanish law (if such it be) did not obtain a foothold in our law. Under the act of 1850, the wife's interest vested in her descendants. "They take title of the same nature, and to the same extent, as that which vests in the survivor." Broad v. Broad, 40 Cal. 496; and see Broad v. Murray, 44 Cal. 228; Johnston v. Bush, 49 Cal. 201. The property remained subject to the community debts, and the duty of settling such debts was upon the husband. But he took as surviving partner, (Packard v. Arellanes; Ord v. De la Guerra), not as a continuing partner. The partnership was dissolved by the death, and his duty was to settle up its affairs; not to proceed to impose new burdens upon the property in the prosecution of new enterprises. In Cook v. Norman, in reasoning to the conclusion that the surviving husband had power to convey the property in satisfaction of a community debt, the court said: "The authority to sell the property of the community belongs to him as the survivor of the community, and is the same in its nature as was his power to do so during the existence of the community." It is to be observed that this case proceeds upon the assumption that the debt in question was a community debt, and the decision was merely that a conveyance by the surviving husband was one of the modes in which the property could be made to satisfy the liability for such debts, which liability was admitted to exist. This is widely different from saying that the property is liable for debts which are not community debts; that is, for debts contracted after the dissolution of the community. The statement quoted was not necessary to the decision, and seems rather vague. It is to be observed, however, that what the court was speaking of was the power to convey, and that what it said of this power was that it was the same "in its nature" as before the dissolution of the community. It was not said that this power was the same in extent as before the dissolution, and it is impossible that the court should have meant this; for that would be to say that the children's interests could be taken for non-community debts, or, in other words, that the power of the husband was unrestrained. We do not regard the case as conflicting with the views above expressed. In Packard v. Arellanes the court said that the debts for which the property was liable to be taken included all debts of the community contracted for the common benefit, "whether by the deceased or by the survivor." This remark was not necessary to the decision, which was merely that no probate administration upon the estate of the wife was necessary. There can be little doubt that such expenditures as are necessary to preserve the property in statu quo may be made by the surviving husband, and would be allowed upon a settlement of his accounts. But the case here is manifestly not of that character. The interests of the children, therefore, were not bound for the debt contracted after the dissolution of the community, and there is no equity in imposing a condition as to such debt.

(c) We do not see why the rents and profits of the shares of these two children should not be set off against the amount of the condition imposed upon them. This does not refer to the rents and profits received by James Johnston, Sr. The defendant here is not James Johnston, Sr., and cannot be charged with rents and profits which it did not receive; but, after it went into possession under the sheriff's sale, it received the rents and profits of all the land, except a small portion in possession of the plaintiffs. It had no right to the rents and profits of the plaintiffs' share, and should be charged therewith. It is probably true that the parties, being tenants in common, could not be made to account to each other in an independent action; but, in imposing a condition, the court must take into consideration all the circumstances, in order to arrive at the justice of the case.

The other positions do not require special notice. We therefore advise that the cause be remanded, with directions to the court below to find, from such additional evidence as may be introduced, the value of the rents and profits of the entire property since the defendant has been in possession, and also the value of the rents and profits since said time of the portion in possession of the said two plaintiffs, and, after deducting the latter amount from the former, to set off the remainder against the amount of the condition imposed upon said plaintiffs; that in all other respects the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed. The said two plaintiffs to recover their costs of appeal.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to find, from such additional evidence as may be introduced, the value of the rents and profits of the entire property since the defendant has been in possession, and also the value of the rents and profits since said time of the portion in possession of the said two plaintiffs, and, after deducting the latter amount from the former, to set off two-sixths of the remainder against the amount of the condition imposed upon said plaintiffs; and in all other respects the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed. The said two plaintiffs to recover their costs of appeal.

75 Cal. 147

FRASER v. ALEXANDER. (No. 11,564.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 20, 1888.)

1. OFFICE AND OFFICER—REMOVAL FOR MISCONDUCT—STATUTES—REPEAL BY CONSTITUTION.

Under Const. Cal. 1879, art. 22, § 1, providing that no law inconsistent with the constitution should remain in existence after July 1, 1880, the act of March 30, 1874, (St. Cal. 1873-74, p. 911,) providing for the removal of civil officers for violation of official duties, ceased to exist on July 1, 1880, such act specifying that the officers should be removed by decree of the district court, which court ceased to exist when the constitution went into effect.

2. SAME—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

The act of March 30, 1874, (St. Cal. 1873-74, p. 911,) imposing upon civil officers who violate their official duties a fine for the benefit of the informer, is inconsistent with the act of March 14, 1883, (St. Cal. 1883, p. 299,) imposing in such cases a fine for the benefit of the county, and is therefore repealed by the latter act.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; RODNEY M. HUDSON, Judge.

This is an action by J. K. Fraser against David Alexander. Plaintiff obtained judgment, and defendant appeals.

E. W. Britt and Fox & Kellogg, for appellant. Oliver P. Evans and Ben. P. Tabor, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff in his individual capacity against the defendant, as supervisor of the county of Lake, state of California, to recover $100, and to remove the defendant from his office as supervisor for a willful violation of official duty, pursuant to an act of the legislature of the state of California, approved March 30, 1874, entitled "An act providing for the removal of civil officers for a violation of official duties," (St. 1873-74, p. 911; Deering's C. C. P., following § 810.) Plaintiff had judgment as prayed for in his complaint, from which judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. The complaint was filed January 7, 1886, is verified, and shows that a claim for $74.55, in favor of one G. W. Rawson, on account of bridge lumber furnished to the county of Lake, was presented to the board of supervisors of said county for allowance. The gravamen of the charge against the defendant is: (1) "That said claim was not verified as required by law." (2) That on the 20th day of July, 1885, the defendant, as a supervisor, "willfully, and in violation of his official duty as a supervisor of said county of Lake, did cast his vote as such supervisor in favor of the allowance and payment of said claim for the full amount thereof, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statutes in such cases made and provided." (3) That the claim was allowed; and ordered paid; that defendant voted in favor of such allowance and payment; and that in so doing he became guilty of a willful violation of his official duty. A copy of the bill, as presented and allowed, is attached to the complaint as an exhibit. It is in the usual form of an itemized account, the dates, etc., being given, and is only verified and certified as follows:

"Subscribed to this 18th July, 1885.

G. W. RAWSON.

"D. Poston, Supervisor District 1."

Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds (1) that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue. The demurrer was overruled, and this action is assigned as error. Defendant urges that the demurrer should have been sustained for the reasons: (a) The statute of March 30, 1874, so far as it could apply to the case of the supervisor, has been superseded and repealed by sections 55 and 184 of the act known as the "County Government Act," (St. 1883, p. 299.) (b) Conceding the act of March 30, 1874, to be in full force, the complaint is yet bad for the want of sufficient statement of essential facts.

The act of 1874 provides that any member of certain boards, among which are supervisors, "who shall be guilty of a willful violation of any of the provisions of the statute under which he or they were or may be hereafter elected or appointed, or of any other statute or statutes of this state prescribing or defining their duties and powers, or passed for their government or control, or who shall be guilty of any other willful violation of official duty, shall be deprived of his office and otherwise punished, in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of this act." Section 2 provides for a complaint, duly verified, setting forth the facts constituting a violation of duty, to be filed in the district court, for a citation to the party charged, and requires the court to proceed to hear in a summary manner the complaint and evidence offered in support of the same, and the evidence offered by the party charged, and, if it shall appear that the charge or charges contained in the complaint are sustained, requires the court to enter a decree depriving the party charged of his office, and to enter judgment for $100 in favor of complainant, and for costs. Section 3 provides that the act shall not repeal or impair the provisions of any other act; but shall be construed to be a cumulative remedy for the enforcement of official duty. The laws in force and providing for the removal of civil officers, otherwise than by impeachment, at the time of the passage of the cumulative act of 1874, were: (1) Upon an accusation in writing presented to the grand jury, as provided by section 758, Pen. Code. The sections immediately following defined the proceedings to be had, the mode of trial, and judgment to be rendered. (2) Section 772 of the same Code (Pen. Code 1872) provided a process for the removal of public officers by summary proceedings before the district courts, for charging illegal fees, or for refusal or neglect to perform the official duties pertaining to their offices. In this class of cases a complaint could be presented by an individual, and, in case of guilt, judgment of removal from office followed, and also a judgment for $500 in favor of the informer. This section was amended in 1880 so as to authorize the proceeding to be had in the superior court; but in other respects the section was not changed. Pen. Code, § 772. Thus stood the statutes when, on the 14th of March, 1883, an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments" was approved. Section 55 of this last act is as follows: "Any supervisor who neglects or refuses to perform any duty imposed on him, without just cause therefor, or who willfully violates any law provided for his government as such officer, or fraudulently or corruptly performs any duty imposed on him, or willfully, fraudulently, or corruptly attempts to perform an act as supervisor unauthorized by law, in addition to the penalty provided in the Penal Code, forfeits to the county $500 for every such act, to be recovered on his official bond, and is further liable on his official bond to any person injured thereby for all damages sustained." Section 231 of the same act (county government act) repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith. The manifest object of the county government act was to provide a comprehensive system of government for counties and townships. It provides for a board of supervisors, fixes and defines their powers, regulates the manner of their exercise, etc. The board exercises judicial functions, in examining and passing upon claims against the county; legislative powers, in the enactment of ordinances; and executive authority, in a variety of matters confided to its supervision. For willful, fraudulent, or corrupt acts of omission or commission, by the fifty-fifth section of the act, they forfeit to the county $500, to be recovered on their official bonds, and for damages or hurt to individuals by such acts or omissions, they are severally liable on such bonds. Coupled with the provisions of the Penal Code, under which they may be removed from office for malfeasance, it would seem the legislature has so hedged the supervisors around, as to protect alike the public and the individual.

It was said in City and County of Sacramento v. Bird, 15 Cal. 295: "Every statute must be considered according to what appears to have been the intention of the legislature, and even though two statutes relating to the same subject be not in terms repugnant or inconsistent, if the latter statute was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule which should govern in the case provided for, it will be construed as repealing the original act." Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 124. As was said in State v. Conkling, 19 Cal. 512:

"When the legislature makes a revision of particular statutes, and frames a general statute upon the subject-matter, and from the frame-work of the act it is apparent that the legislature designed a complete scheme for this matter, this is a legislative declaration that whatever is embraced in the new law shall prevail, and whatever is excluded is ignored." In Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. 429, it was held that where, under an act of congress, a penalty was given to an individual for certain violations of the act, a subsequent act, which did not in terms repeal the former, but which imposed a fine and imprisonment for a like violation of the law, upon a prosecution by the United States, the effect of the latter statute was to repeal the former, so far as the penalty was concerned. We think it may be stated as a general rule that acts of the legislature prohibiting the same offenses and injuries as former acts, but imposing different penalties or giving different remedies, repeal, so far, such former acts. Rex v. Cator, 4 Burrow, 2026; Nichols v. Squire, 5 Pick. 168; Com. v. Kimball, 21 Pick. 373; State v. Whitworth, 8 Port. (Ala.) 434. A comparison of section 55 of the county government act with the statute of 1874, shows that while the latter is somewhat more specific and comprehensive than the former, yet it covers the same unlawful acts, and provides a different mode of punishment, with different penalties.

Again, the act of 1874 provided for a prosecution in the district court. By section 1, art. 22, Const. 1879, it was provided that "the provisions of all laws which are inconsistent with this constitution shall cease upon the adoption thereof, except that all laws which are inconsistent with such provisions of this constitution as require legislation to enforce them shall remain in full force until the 1st day of July, 1880, unless sooner altered or repealed by the legislature." Sections 2 and 3 of the same article conferred upon the courts created by the new constitution jurisdiction in all actions and proceedings pending upon its adoption, and for offenses committed before such adoption. The legislature of 1880 amended the provisions of the Penal Code relating to the removal of civil officers, to conform to the new constitution, by giving jurisdiction of the proceedings to the superior court, where it had been before in the district court. No change was, however, ever made in the act of 1874, conforming it to the new constitution. As it stood, it required legislation to conform it to the new order of things. It provided for prosecutions in courts which ceased to exist when the new constitution went into effect, and not having been amended prior to July, 1880, ceased at that date to have any force or effect.

We are of opinion, therefore — First, that the act of March 30, 1874, (St. 1873-74, p. 911,) ceased to exist as a law on the 1st day of July, 1880; second, that, waiving the first proposition, such act of 1874 is inconsistent with the county government act, and is therefore repealed by the 184th section thereof. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to sustain the demurrer, and dismiss the action. Ordered accordingly.

BROWN v. STARR et al. (No. 12,313.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 20, 1888.)

APPEAL—WHEN LIES—FINAL JUDGMENT—APPLICATION TO DIVIDE HOMESTEAD.

One of several judgment defendants appealed from an order of court directing a division of his homestead to satisfy such judgment, and also from a refusal of the court to remand the appraisalment of his homestead to the appraisers for a report as to the value of his life-estate therein. Held, that neither the order nor the refusal, under Civil Code Cal. § 1245, providing that the application of the creditor is to be "to the superior court of the county in which the property is situated," is a proceeding in the original judgment action, nor such final judgment in a special proceeding as to entitle defendant to an appeal.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Wicks & Ward, for appellant. C. N. Wilson, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. The plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendants, and caused execution to be levied upon the homestead of the defendant T. C. Alexander. Upon petition of the plaintiff, the court appointed appraisers to appraise the value of such homestead. They reported that the value of the homestead was $15,000, and that it could "be subdivided without the necessity of sale." The plaintiff thereupon moved the court for an order directing the appraisers to proceed to make the division. The defendant T. C. Alexander moved the court "to remand the appraisal of his homestead to the appraisers for further report as to the value of his life-estate in the property covered by such homestead; suggesting, at the same time, that the interest of T. C. Alexander in the property covered by such homestead was only a life-estate, or else a mere personal right of occupancy during declarant's life-time, and that such interest only was homesteaded." He also asked to be allowed to introduce evidence in support of these statements. The court denied the motion of the defendant, and granted the motion of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

We do not think the orders are appealable. The statute provides that the application of the creditor is to be "to the superior court of the county in which the property is situated." Civil Code, § 1245. It is not necessarily to be made to the court which rendered the judgment; therefore it is not to be a proceeding in the action. It is to be an independent proceeding; a special proceeding. At least, it must be so where the homestead is situated in a different county from that in which the judgment was rendered; and we do not think that the meaning of the statute is that such applications are to be held to be of different natures according to the place in which they may happen to be made. Taking it to be an independent proceeding, the orders complained of cannot be held to be "special orders made after final judgment;" for such orders must be in the cause in which the judgment was rendered.

Nor do we think that either order appealed from can be held to be a final judgment in a special proceeding. The order on defendant's motion was simply a refusal to remand the matter to the appraisers for a report of a certain character; or, in other words, with certain instructions. But, inasmuch as the matter was remanded with other instructions, the order on defendant's motion simply amounts to a refusal to give the appraisers certain instructions. This certainly is not a final judgment.

The order on plaintiff's motion was that the matter be remanded to the appraisers for the purpose of making a division of the property. This order does not seem to be final in its nature. Something remained to be done before the matter could be ended. The natural course would be for the appraisers to make the division, and report their action to the court, and for the court thereupon (if satisfied with the result) to confirm the report. The order of confirmation would be the final judgment in the proceeding. The only difficulty about this view is that there is no express provision of statute requiring that the report be confirmed, or that there be any report upon the second reference. The statute provides that if the first report shows an excess of value, and that the property can be divided without material injury, the matter must again be referred to the appraisers for the purpose of making the division, (Civil Code, § 1253,) but is silent in regard to further proceedings. But we think it must be assumed that the intention was that the action of the appraisers is to be subject to the control of the court, and evidenced by some matter of record. And, if the Civil Code is to be considered as containing no implication upon the subject, we think it is a proper case for the court to supply the necessary machinery under section 187, Code Civil Proc., and that the proper course is for the appraisers to report their action as to the division, and for such report, after reasonable notice, to be confirmed, if satisfactory to the court, and, if not satisfactory, a third reference to be ordered, and so on until a report is obtained which is confirmed, in which case the order of confirmation is to be considered as the final judgment in the proceeding.

We therefore advise that the attempted appeals be dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the attempted appeals are dismissed.

QUINN v. DRESBACH et al. (No. 11,684.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 20, 1888.)

1. NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PAYMENT—TO AGENT—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

A party who in good faith makes payments upon a promissory note to one whom he has reason to believe is the authorized agent of the holder thereof, and whose acts in receiving such payments have come to the knowledge of the holder, and have not been repudiated by him, cannot be held for the money so paid to the agent.¹

2. SAME.

The fact that the note was not in the possession of the agent at the time a payment to the agent was made thereon, but in the hands of a third person, to whom the payer had made direct payments, is not conclusive as to the agent's want of authority to receive such payment, but only a circumstance to be considered.

3. SAME—TRANSFER OF NOTE AFTER MATURITY WITHOUT NOTICE TO MAKER.

A holder of a note who transfers it after maturity, without notice to the maker thereof, cannot hold such maker for payments to his authorized agent, made subsequent to the transfer.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Action by Isaac Quinn against William Dresbach, John P. Medan, Carl Haneke, and Jason Watkins to restrain the sale of certain land under a deed of trust given to secure the payment of a promissory note.

Add. Hinkson and J. C. Ball, for appellant. A. Morgenthal, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. Action to enjoin a sale by defendants under a deed of trust given to secure the payment of a promissory note. The plaintiff paid the amount of the note to one Treadwell, who appropriated the money to his own use, and the question is whether Treadwell was the agent of the payee.

Treadwell was not the actual agent of the payee in the matter. It is true that the plaintiff testifies that he was instructed by the payee to pay to Treadwell. But the payee denies this, and, in view of the rule in cases of a substantial conflict in the evidence, it must be assumed that there was no actual agency. Then, was there an ostensible agency? The facts as shown by uncontradicted evidence are as follows: The land which is the subject of the deed of trust was sold by the defendant Haneke to the plaintiff. The plaintiff gave his promissory note for $800, and assumed the payment of an outstanding indebtedness secured upon the property. Neither of these obligations having been met, the defendant Haneke placed the matter in the hands of Treadwell, who was an attorney at law, residing in Yolo county, where the property is situated, and where the plaintiff resided. The result of Treadwell's operations was the advance by Haneke of money to pay off the outstanding indebtedness, and the taking of a new note from plaintiff covering the amount of the former note and the amount advanced by Haneke. So far, there is no kind of doubt but that Treadwell was the agent of Haneke for the collection of the principal and interest of the first note. This agency, however, terminated with the giving of the second note. This note was, by its terms, payable at the Bank of California in San Francisco, and the note was given to the bank for collection. The plaintiff seems to have known of this fact. He fell into the habit, however, of paying his interest to Treadwell, who assumed still to be the agent of Haneke. At least six payments of interest were made in this way. Treadwell sent the money to the bank, and the receipts therefor were forwarded to him, and by him delivered to the plaintiff. On some occasions, however, the plaintiff sent the interest to the bank through one R. W. Pendergast, who had no connection with Treadwell. Not only was interest paid to Treadwell, as above stated, but on one occasion a part payment of the principal was made to him. This payment was sent by Treadwell to the bank with the following letter:

"WOODLAND, December 24, 1881.

"Thomas Brown, Esq., Cashier Bank of California: Herewith I send you check for $437.50 on the part of Isaac Quinn, being $400 principal and $37.50 interest on note favor of Carl Haneke. I also send receipt of tax of Carl Haneke on mortgage given to secure said note, amounting to $36, which was paid by Mr. Quinn. This makes up the amount of $73.50 interest due December 27th. Please acknowledge receipt.

"Yours,

W. B. TREADWELL."

This payment of the principal was properly credited on the note. There can be no doubt but that the plaintiff believed in good faith that Treadwell remained the agent of Haneke for the collection of the principal and interest after the giving of the second note; and this belief was justified by the conduct of Haneke. Plaintiff had made one payment of principal to Treadwell, and this payment had not been repudiated by Haneke, but was credited upon the note. Ostensible authority may be conferred by the recognition of a single act of the agent, if sufficiently unequivocal. Wilcox v. Railroad Co., 24 Minn. 270. It was negligence in Haneke to have allowed the plaintiff to act under the belief that Treadwell was authorized to receive the money. Haneke was chargeable with knowledge that Treadwell continued to act in some way in the matter. He was chargeable with this knowledge, because the bank knew it, and the bank was his agent for the collection of the debt. See Bierce v. Hotel Co., 31 Cal. 166. Now, if Haneke knew that Treadwell was continuing to act in the matter at all, the only inference which he was entitled to draw, and the one which he ought to have drawn, was that he was continuing to act as he had commenced, viz., as his (Haneke's) agent. It was not a natural inference that Treadwell had changed his position in the matter, and was acting for the other side. The presumption was that he was assuming to act for Haneke; and we think that this was what nine out of ten business men would have thought. This being the case, Haneke ought to have repudiated the assumed agency, and not have suffered the matter to stand as it did. The Civil Code provides that "ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess." Civil Code, § 2319. And this is the embodiment of a well-established principle of the common law, which has been called "the foundation of the law of agency." 1 Pars. Cont. *44; Kasson v. Nollner, 43 Wis. 650.

Nor does the fact that the note was not in the possession of Treadwell change the result. The want of possession of the note is a circumstance to be considered in determining the question of authority, but is not conclusive. The fact that the bank held the note for collection would not prevent the owner from collecting it himself. Flanagan v. Brown, 70 Cal. 254, 11 Pac. Rep. 706.

The circumstance that Haneke had assigned the note to his daughter, and that it was owned by her at the time of the final payment to Treadwell, is not material, because the transfer was after the maturity of the note, and no notice was given to the plaintiff. Bank v. Jones, 65 Cal. 437, 4 Pac. Rep. 418; and compare Preston v. Grayson Co., 30 Grat. 497; Gibson v. Pew, 3 J. J. Marsh. 222.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the interesting question as to the power of the court below to change its findings.

We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

MEEKER v. DALTON. (No. 11,066.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 20, 1888.)

1. EJECTMENT—DEFENSES—EQUITABLE TITLE.

Plaintiff in ejectment had been agent for the owner of the land in controversy, and, as such, had sold the same and other lands to defendant's grantor, received payment therefor, and delivered the deed, which, however, accidentally omitted one of the lots paid for. Defendant, without notice of such omission, bought, took possession of, and improved said lot. Plaintiff discovered such omission, took to himself a deed from said original owner, and brought ejectment. Held, that defendant's equitable title, coupled with his actual possession, was a complete defense to the action.

2. SAME—PLEADING—ANSWER—CHARACTER OF PLEADING.

An answer in ejectment denying generally all material allegations of the complaint, and after using the words "further answering, by way of cross-complaint," setting up matters constituting an equitable defense, is good on general demurrer; the character of the pleading being determined by the court, by the facts alleged, and not by what it might be called by the pleader.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; BUCKLEY, Judge.

J. C. Byers and L. W. Elliott, for appellant. Stanton L. Carter, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The action is ejectment to recover possession of a lot of land in the town of Lodi. The complaint is in the form usual in such actions. The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint, and alleges that defendant is the owner of the land sued for, and entitled to the possession thereof, and has been such owner, and so entitled to possession, since the 1st day of December, 1881; and then, "further answering said complaint, and by way of cross-complaint," alleges certain facts which show an equitable defense. The plaintiff demurred to all that part of the "answer called a 'cross-complaint,' upon the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to said action;" and his demurrer was overruled. The case was tried before a jury upon special issues, and answers were returned to all the questions submitted. The court adopted the findings of the jury, and made certain other findings, and, among others, that, while the plaintiff had the legal title to the property sued for, he was not entitled to recover the possession thereof, but defendant was entitled to maintain his possession.

Judgment was thereupon entered that defendant recover from plaintiff his costs of suit; and from that judgment the plaintiff appealed, the case coming here on the judgment roll.

It is objected for appellant that that part of defendant's pleading which follows the words "by way of cross-complaint" must be treated as only a cross-complaint, seeking affirmative relief, and cannot be used as an answer; that, as a cross-complaint, or as a defense, it is insufficient, because it contains no allegation that defendant did not buy the land for less than its true value on account of the situation, or that he paid anything for it, or that he was imposed upon as to what he was buying; that the part of the pleading which precedes the words quoted is insufficient, because it contains no averments showing an equitable defense; and, in short, that each part of the pleading must be treated as separate and distinct from the other, and must stand or fall on its own merits. It is also further objected that the findings are contradictory and inconsistent.

We do not think these objections can be maintained. The so-called cross-complaint is preceded by the words, "further answering said complaint." The plaintiff demurred to it, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense; and at the trial it appears to have been treated as a part of the answer. Having been so treated there, it is too late to raise the question here. Erkins v. Ayer, 58 Cal. 313. We think the words "and by way of cross-complaint" may be treated as surplusage, and disregarded. "It is immaterial what the defendant called his pleading; whether he designated it an answer or cross-complaint. Its character will be determined by the court. It is the facts set up in the pleading which make it an answer or cross-complaint." Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 311. Taken as a whole, the pleading seems to us sufficient; certainly, when tested by a general demurrer.

We have carefully examined the findings, and are unable to see wherein they are contradictory or inconsistent. The material facts as shown by the findings are as follows: Plaintiff was agent for the owner of certain lands in the town of Lodi, and was authorized to sell the same, and receive payment therefor. Acting as such agent, plaintiff on the 1st of January, 1881, sold to one George Ringer the lot in controversy, with other adjacent land, and received from him the full purchase price agreed upon for all the land sold. On the 18th day of the same month plaintiff delivered to Ringer a deed, duly executed by the owner of the land; and both plaintiff and Ringer then supposed that the lot in controversy was included in the premises conveyed thereby. Ringer entered into possession of the property so bought by him, inclosed it all with a fence, and placed valuable improvements upon the lot in question. He remained in possession until the 1st of December, 1881, when he sold to the defendant. The defendant purchased in good faith, and paid a valuable consideration for the property, believing that Ringer had the legal title to the premises so inclosed and improved by him. He entered into possession, erected improvements, and has remained in possession ever since. By some mistake, the lot in controversy was not included in the deed to Ringer, nor in that from Ringer to the defendant. Plaintiff discovered this mistake, and in the month of November, 1882, procured a deed of the lot from the former owner to himself; knowing at the time that, as agent for the former owner, he had sold the lot to Ringer, and received full value therefor. Assuming, then, as we must, that the evidence was sufficient to justify the findings, it is apparent that, when Ringer purchased and went into possession of the lot in controversy, he became the equitable owner of it; and, when he sold to the defendant, the latter succeeded to all his rights. It is also apparent that, when the plaintiff received his deed to the lot, he took only such right as his grantor had, and that was the naked legal title.

The defendant, then, having the equitable title, coupled with possession, the question is, could he set up that title as a defense to an action of eject-ment brought against him by the holder of the legal title? In New York it has been held that, in an action of ejectment, defendant can set up as a defense that the land in question was intended to be conveyed to him by a deed from plaintiff, but, by a mistake in the description, was not included. A reformation of the deed is not necessary, but the same facts which will entitle defendant thereto will establish his equitable right to possession, and constitute a defense as effectual as the legal title. Hoppough v. Stouble, 60 N. Y. 430. The same rule obtains in this state. In Arguello v. Bours, 67 Cal. 450, 8 Pac. Rep. 49, it is said "that, under our system of practice, a defendant may plead, as a defense to 'ejectment,' that he is in possession under a contract of purchase, the conditions whereof have been fully performed on his part; in other words, that he is in possession under a contract which gave him the right of possession, and that he is entitled to retain the possession as against the bare, naked title of his vendor, which the vendor holds disconnected from any real interest. A perfect equity united to the possession is, under our system, equivalent for all purposes of defense to a legal title. Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 494, 73 Amer. Dec. 593. A vendee in possession under an executory contract, the conditions of which have been performed on his part, may avail himself of his equitable title as a defense to an action of ejectment brought against him by the holder of the legal title. Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 547. A mere equitable title to land, if of such a character as in equity entitles the holder to the possession, is a sufficient defense to an action for the possession brought by the holder of the legal title. Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 607." We consider the foregoing cases decisive of the case in hand, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

tain real property in the city of Los Angeles. The complaint alleges that Briswalter in his life-time purchased the property in controversy from Pio Pico for the sum of $1,000; that the defendant was employed by him, as his agent, to negotiate the purchase, and as such agent did negotiate the purchase for and on account of his principal; that the property was conveyed by Pico to defendant, who agreed to take and hold the same in his own name for the use and benefit of Briswalter; and that the purchase money was paid by Briswalter. The answer denies that Briswalter purchased the property and alleges that "said Briswalter desired to purchase the property mentioned in the complaint, but the personal relations between Pio Pico and said Briswalter were such that said Briswalter did not believe he could accomplish such purchase without the intervention of some third party. This defendant, knowing that said Briswalter desired to purchase said property, and being himself friendly with said Pico, said Pico came to defendant and stated to him that he would not sell said property to said Briswalter, but would sell it to this defendant. This defendant thereupon bought said property in his own name and paid for it with his own money, but afterwards said consideration was paid to him from and out of the funds of said Briswalter, it being then and there the intention of said Briswalter and of this defendant, that this defendant should, if said Briswalter desired, convey to him (said Briswalter) said property so purchased from said Pico." The answer then further alleges that before his death Briswalter made a gift of the property to the defendant, "whereupon this defendant accepted such gift, and has since retained the title of the same, and is now the owner thereof, free from any charge or trust in favor of said Briswalter, or his estate, or said plaintiffs, or either thereof." The court below found that all the allegations of the complaint were true; that the defendant "was employed by Briswalter, and undertook for him to negotiate with and purchase from the said Pico for him (the said Briswalter) the said property;" and that the defendant, "as the agent and friend of said Briswalter, and not otherwise, bought said property and paid the said Pico for it out of his (the defendant's) own money; but the money so paid was at all times considered and intended by him as a loan of said money to the said Briswalter, and thereafter, to-wit, on April 13, 1885, the full consideration and all of said moneys were repaid to him out of the funds of said Briswalter." The court further found that "it was never the intention of said Briswalter to give said property to the defendant, nor did he ever relinquish to the defendant any right or title to any part thereof; nor did the defendant ever accept any gift thereof." Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

"Appellant's theory," as stated in the brief filed in his behalf, "is and has been that there is no trust relation existing between him and Briswalter's representatives, and that, while there may be a cause of action against him for the $1,000 delivered to him by Briswalter, he cannot be compelled to deed to the executors the land which he bought from Pico." And it is said: "If there is any trust shown by the evidence, it must arise from the mere fact that Messmer made a bargain with Pico, after a previous verbal understanding, to which Pico was not a party, that the property conveyed should be held in trust for the deceased. It is not pretended that any money was paid by Briswalter to Pico for the land, or that Pico knew anything about Briswalter's connection with the purchase. It is conceded that the consideration paid was Messmer's money, and while it is true that the latter had promised that he would negotiate the trade and deliver its fruits to Briswalter, yet this was merely a promise to convey lands, and was void under subdivision 5, § 1624, Civil Code." Whether this theory can be maintained or not, is the question for decision. The rule is well settled that when real property is purchased, and one party pays the purchase money and another takes the title, a resulting trust arises in favor of the former, and the latter holds title as his trustee. But the trust must result, if at all, at the time the deed is taken. No oral agreements and no payments made after the title is taken will create a resulting trust. The party claiming the benefit of the trust must show that the money was paid before or at the time of the execution of the conveyance. Case v. Coddington, 38 Cal. 191; Botsford v. Burr, 2 Johns. Ch. 404; Pinnock v. Clough, 16 Vt. 500. It is not, however, necessary that the money should have been actually paid by the party setting up the trust. It may have been paid by the party who took the title, but advanced as a loan to the other party, and, if so, a trust results. Hidden v. Jordan, 21 Cal. 92; Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 140, 142; Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 481; Boyd v. McLean, 1 Johns. Ch. 582; Page v. Page, 8 N. H. 187. Perry, in his work on Trusts, (section 133,) states the rule as follows: "If one should advance the purchase money and take the title to himself, but should do this wholly upon the account and credit of the other, he would hold the estate upon a resulting trust for the other." And our Civil Code (section 853) declares the same rule in the following words: "When a transfer of real property is made to one person, and the consideration thereof is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made."

Was, then, the purchase money for the land in controversy advanced by Messmer "wholly upon the account and credit of" Briswalter? The court below found that it was, and we think the finding sustained by the evidence. It is clear from the evidence that Messmer was the friend and agent of Briswalter, and had been so for a considerable time. He collected Briswalter's rents and paid his bills. He made the purchase for and at the request of Briswalter. He drew his own check for the purchase money, but collected the money back from Briswalter. To collect the money he had his son draw a check in Briswalter's name, and as soon as he received the money on the check he reported the fact to Briswalter, who said, "All right." Shortly after he received the deed he offered to re deed to Briswalter, but the latter asked him to hold the papers for a while. After Briswalter's death he admitted before several of the witnesses that he bought and held the property for Briswalter. In his testimony, speaking of his son's drawing the check for the repayment to him of the money, he said: "My son drew checks in Andres' name when he wanted money. My son drew checks for Andres to pay taxes for him. He never drew a check in Andres' name for my benefit before. He drew this because Andres owed it to me." But how did Briswalter owe him the money, if it had not been advanced by him as a loan? These facts seem to us to bring the case within the rule above stated. No point is now made in regard to the alleged gift.

The complaint was sufficient, the demurrer was properly overruled, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PETERSON v. WEISSBEIN et al. (No. 12,218.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 21, 1888.)

1. JUDGMENT—ON DEMURRER—RES ADJUDICATA—PRIVIES IN ESTATE MAY SET UP.

G. bought real property at an execution sale upon a justice's judgment against plaintiff. Thereafter plaintiff brought an action against G. and others to have such judgment and sale set aside, on the ground that the complaint was filed on a legal holiday, and judgment was rendered against plaintiff on a general demurrer to his complaint. In this action to recover possession of the same premises, defendants claim under G., and set up the judgment in the former action. Held, that such judgment was available to defendants, and was properly admitted in evidence.

2. EXECUTION—CONSTABLE'S DEED—WHEN ADMISSIBLE IN EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover possession of real property claimed by defendant under an execution sale, it is error to admit in evidence the constable's deed without proof of the judgment and execution under which the constable acted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Action by A. G. Peterson against Joseph Weissbein and Jacob Weissbein to recover possession of real property. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a new trial.

Cross & Simonds and Gaylord & Searls, for appellant. A. Burrows, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to recover possession of 240 acres of land situate in Nevada county. The complaint alleged the plaintiff's ownership of the demanded premises, and his ouster therefrom by the defendants in September, 1885. The answer denied the plaintiff's ownership, admitted the defendants' possession, and then set up a further defense as follows: "Defendants allege that ever since the 26th day of December, 1883, they have been the owners of the said premises, and entitled to the possession thereof; that up to November, 1882, plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to the possession, of said premises; that on said date said premises were duly attached in a suit against this plaintiff from the justice's court of Grass Valley township; that thereafter, in said suit, judgment was duly given and made against plaintiff herein, (Peterson,) and by virtue thereof execution duly issued to the constable of said township, and the said premises were duly sold thereunder to one Goldberg, who on November 26, 1883, duly received the constable's deed therefor, and thereupon transferred said premises to these defendants; that in February, 1883, said Peterson began suit in this court to set aside said justice's court judgment, and said constable's sale, because the complaint was filed on a holiday, etc.; that plaintiff therein had judgment, from which judgment defendants therein appealed to the supreme court, who reversed the same, in the case entitled Peterson v. Weissbein, 2 Pac. Rep. 730, and thereafter said superior court duly gave and rendered judgment in favor of defendants therein, affirming the validity of said justice's court judgment, and the said execution sale thereunder; * * * and that said judgments were duly given and made, and estop the plaintiff from again contesting the validity thereof, and defendants hereby plead them as estoppel." At the trial the plaintiff introduced evidence showing that he acquired the title to a portion of the demanded premises in 1874, and to the balance thereof in 1875, and rested. Thereupon the defendants, to maintain the issues on their part, offered in evidence the judgment roll in the case referred to in their answer, and promised to show that it related to the premises in dispute, and that defendants had succeeded to the interests of Goldberg therein. The plaintiff objected to the judgment roll being received in evidence, on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial, and not pertinent to any issue involved in the case; that the parties to that action were not the same as in this case, and it was therefore not admissible by way of estoppel. The court overruled the objection, and the plaintiff reserved an exception. The defendants then offered in evidence a constable's deed, in proper form and duly executed, dated November 26, 1883, conveying the demanded premises to William Goldberg, and a deed from Goldberg, dated February 1, 1884, conveying the same premises to defendants. The plaintiff objected to the constable's deed, on the ground that the judgment and proceedings in the justice's court of Grass Valley township, upon which the deed purported to be based, had not been introduced in evidence; and further objected to both deeds, on the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The court overruled the objections, and the plaintiff reserved exceptions. In rebuttal, the plaintiff proved that September 9, 1882, had been appointed and proclaimed by the governor of the state as a legal holiday. The court found that the plaintiff was not the owner, or entitled to the possession, of the premises in dispute, and further found to be true all the facts set up in that part of defendants' answer hereinbefore quoted. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants; and from that, and an order denying him a new trial, the plaintiff appealed.

1. It is insisted for the appellant that the judgment roll was not admissible in evidence, but we see no prejudicial error in the ruling complained of. The action was brought to obtain a decree declaring the judgment in the justice's court case, and the constable's sale thereunder, null and void, because the complaint was filed with the justice on a legal holiday. Goldberg was the purchaser at the sale, and was a party to the action. The plaintiff obtained a judgment at first, but that judgment was reversed by this court, and the case remanded. Peterson v. Weissbein, 65 Cal. 42, 2 Pac. Rep. 730. An amended complaint was then filed, to which a general demurrer was interposed and sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to further amend, final judgment was entered in favor of defendants. In due time Goldberg obtained a constable's deed, and thereafter conveyed the property to the defendants here. It is true the judgment was entered on demurrer, but "a judgment on demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint is conclusive of everything necessarily determined by such judgment." Freem. Judgm. § 267. The point was involved, and necessarily determined, that the justice's court judgment was not void for the reason assigned. And, as res adjudicata, a judgment is conclusive between the parties thereto, and their successors in interest. Section 1908, Code Civil Proc.; McCreery v. Fuller, 63 Cal. 30. The defendants were the successors in interest of Goldberg, and had therefore the same right to avail themselves of the judgment roll that he would have had if he had not conveyed the property, and had been made the defendant.

2. It is also insisted that the constable's deed was not admissible in evidence without proof of the judgment and execution which authorized the sale, and in pursuance of which it was made. The rule undoubtedly is that, when one seeks to obtain or hold possession of real property under a sheriff's deed, he must prove the judgment and execution under which the sheriff acted in making the sale. Freem. Ex'ns, § 350. The title of the purchaser, in such a case, rests upon the judgment, execution, sale, and deed. The law upon this subject is stated in Hihn v. Peck, 30 Cal. 288, as follows: "The judgment and execution go to the sheriff's power to sell, and to his power to recite a sale, and to his power to give a deed also; and therefore the recitals are not admissible to prove the sheriff's authority to sell, or his authority to recite a sale. The power to sell, to recite, and to deed, having its origin in the judgment and execution, must be proved by a production of both, under the rule of best evidence; but, when the power has been so proved, the sheriff becomes, so to speak, the accredited historian of his acts under it." See, also, People v. Doe, 31 Cal. 220; Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 649. Under the law as announced in the foregoing cases, we think it was necessary for the defendants to produce and introduce in evidence the judgment of the justice's court, and the execution issued thereon, and that the court erred in admitting the constable's deed in evidence without such proof.

The judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: FOOTE, C.

I concur in the conclusion: HAYNE, C.

MODOC CO. v. CHURCHILL. (No. 12,137.)
(Supreme Court of California. February 21, 1888.)

1. TAXATION—COLLECTION BY SUIT—EVIDENCE—ASSESSMENT ROLL.

In an action brought by a county to recover the taxes assessed against a property owner, the assessment roll is prima facie evidence of the plaintiff's right to recover.

2. SAME—DEFENSES—FAILURE OF EQUALIZATION BOARD TO MEET AT APPOINTED TIME.

Where a property owner fails to return under oath, to the assessor, a statement of his property as required by Pol. Code Cal. § 3633, and the assessor makes a valuation thereof, such person cannot plead, in an action to collect the tax, that the assessment and levy were illegal for the reason that the board of county supervisors did not meet on the proper day to equalize the assessment, as in any event he could not have the assessor's valuation reduced by the board.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. F. HARRIS, Judge.

This was an action brought by Modoc county against Jerome Churchill, to recover taxes due. Judgment having been rendered for the plaintiff, defendant moved for a new trial, which being refused, he appeals.

E. M. Barnes, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and J. H. Stewart, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. The examination of this case has been rendered more difficult by the form of the findings, but the court did find the real estate assessed, its valuation by the assessor, and that it was assessed in tracts not to exceed 640 acres in each. Finding 9. The defendant did not except to the sufficiency of that finding. And the court also found that all the personal property returned in the list furnished by the defendant, and none other, was duly assessed at the sum of $20,226. Finding 7. This is, in effect, a finding that the assessor made up his assessment of personal property by taking the list furnished by the defendant and affixing values to the same. The defendant did not except to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain finding 7.

The evidence sustained the first finding. It is contended the only evidence to sustain the finding of an assessment was "the assessment list, wherein no values to the real estate were set out, and the assessment roll, wherein the form was as is prescribed by law for assessment rolls." But the assessment roll, in the form prescribed by law, is prima facie evidence of the plaintiff's right to recover. St. 1880, p. 136.

The court below found "that the county board of equalization duly met and convened on the 21st day of July, 1884, pursuant to and in accordance with an order of the state board of equalization, which was duly made, extending the time for the completion and the delivery to the clerk of the board of supervisors of said county by said assessor of the assessment book of said county, to examine the assessment book and equalize the assessment of property in the county, and that the defendant did not appear before said county board, nor at all." The appellant contends that finding 3 was not sustained by the evidence; that the county board of equalization is required to meet on the first Monday of July, (Pol. Code, § 3672,) which was prior to July 21, 1884; and even if they can meet subsequently, it is only by virtue of section 3707, Pol. Code; and that it appears from the bill of exceptions that no order of the state board of equalization was certified to the county auditor, providing that the time of meeting of the county board be postponed; that, by reason of the fact that the county board did not meet on the first Monday of July, the defendant was deprived of an opportunity of applying for a reduction of his assessment. But the rights of the defendant were not affected by an irregularity, if any, in the actions of the supervisors. The defendant, after demand by the assessor, having refused to give under oath a statement of his assessable property, could not have had the valuations of the assessor reduced by the county board of equalization. Pol. Code, § 3633. Judgment and order affirmed.

WILSON et al. v. STURGIS. (No. 9,878.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 28, 1886.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—REAL-ESTATE AGENTS—COMMISSIONS.

Defendant placed his ranch in plaintiffs' hands to sell on commission within a specified time. They found a purchaser, who paid defendant part of the purchase money, and tendered the balance in checks, which defendant refused. After the time specified had expired, defendant, without returning the partial payment, conveyed the ranch to his father, who conveyed it to the purchaser on payment of the balance of the agreed price; defendant saying at the time that he did not intend to pay plaintiffs any commission. Held, that plaintiffs were entitled to their commission; the sale being made to their purchaser, and defendant never having repudiated the original contract of sale by returning the money paid upon it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county.

Action by John M. Wilson and others against T. W. Sturgis to recover commissions for the sale of real estate. Plaintiffs obtained judgment, and defendant appeals.

Mills & Jones, for appellant. Eli R. Chase and W. S. Tinning, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover the sum of $846, as commissions, alleged to be due plaintiffs, copartners, as real-estate brokers, upon the sale of defendant's ranch, situate in Contra Costa county. Plaintiffs had judgment as prayed for in their complaint. From the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals. On the 10th day of May,

1883, defendant entered into a written contract with the plaintiffs, by the terms of which he authorized the latter to "sell and take deposits" upon his ranch, situate in Contra Costa county, consisting of 268 acres, for the sum of \$40 per acre; terms cash, (or \$11,440;) the authorization to be in full force until September 1, 1883. In case plaintiffs were instrumental in effecting a sale of the property, or finding a customer for the same, defendant agreed to pay $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. commission, and all over they might realize. On or about May 21, 1883, plaintiffs found a purchaser for the property in one P. F. Cox, to whom they agreed to sell for \$12,000; payment to be made and deed delivered on or before September 1, 1883. Cox paid plaintiffs 10 per cent. of the purchase price, (\$1,200,) which they paid over to defendant. There was an understanding between the parties that the payment should be made and the deed delivered on the 1st day of September at the Bank of Martinez. On the last-mentioned day the parties met at the bank, and Cox offered checks in payment of the sum due, which defendant declined to receive. Defendant then deposited a deed of the property in escrow with the officers of the bank, to be delivered to Cox upon payment of the money due (\$10,800) at any time prior to September 5, 1883. On the 5th day of September, Cox called at the bank, deposited the \$10,800 to the credit of defendant, and demanded the deed, which was refused, upon the ground that the time for payment had expired. Defendant caused the sum of \$10,800 to be transferred in the bank to the credit of Cox; but did not return, or offer to return, the \$1,200 paid to him. A few days later, and before the 10th day of September, defendant conveyed the property to his father, Josiah Sturgis, and the latter conveyed to Cox, receiving payment of the residue of \$10,800 due on the original contract. There was testimony tending to show that defendant professed to have been misled by the clause of his contract with plaintiffs under which they claimed as compensation, in addition to the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the amount for which the land sold over \$11,440, viz., \$560; and, as defendant declared "he did not calculate to pay any commissions to plaintiffs," we may properly conclude the plan adopted by him in conveying the property to Cox, through his father, was an instrumentality to that end. The testimony of Cox is as follows: "The deed I have of the ranch is from Josiah Sturgis, father of defendant. He gave it to me himself. Nothing in particular said by him. At the time I came down he handed me the deed, and said he had the place. I paid him twelve thousand dollars less the twelve hundred dollars I had paid defendant, and received the deed. * * * I have stated all the bargain with Josiah Sturgis. I had no understanding with him about it, except that I was paying the balance of my money, and getting a good title for the place. I don't recollect that defendant said anything about why he had conveyed to his father, except saying that he did not calculate to pay any commissions to plaintiffs."

1. Defendant, in order to the exercise of his right to rescind the contract for non-payment of the purchase money on the 4th day of September, should have returned, or offered to return, the $1,200 which he had received on account of such contract. Civil Code, § 1691; Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 535; Henderson v. Hicks, 58 Cal. 364; Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 402; Morrison v. Lods, 39 Cal. 381.

2. A real-estate broker is not entitled to commissions for making a sale of real estate for his principal unless he strictly performs the services required of him, according to the authority conferred upon him. Neilson v. Lee, 60 Cal. 565. In the case at bar, the plaintiffs, as brokers, produced a purchaser, to whom the defendant in fact sold, although not in the precise manner, and not upon the precise day, agreed upon. The defendant having thus had the benefit of the services of the plaintiffs, pursuant to their agreement therefor, cannot evade his liability under the agreement. Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 306, Blood v. Shannon, 29 Cal. 393. The case of Fultz v. Wimer, 9 Pac.

Rep. 316, relied upon by counsel for appellant, differs materially in its facts from this case. There, the purchaser produced by the broker did not purchase within the time limited in the agreement between the latter and the owner. He did subsequently purchase the property, not for cash, but payable in installments at considerable intervals. The court held that, the owner not having caused the delay in the sale, and not having been guilty of any negligence, fraud, or fault, no recovery could be had against him.

3. We think there was sufficient evidence to fully warrant the findings of the court below, and that the interpretation placed upon the contract under which plaintiffs recovered the sum for which the property sold in excess of $11,440, was the only one by which force and effect could be given to all the provisions contained in such contract.

Upon the whole record as presented, we are of opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

FOOTE, C., and BELCHER, C. C., concurred.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re TRAYLOR'S ESTATE. (No. 12,173.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 25, 1888.)

WILL—BEQUEST—"ORNAMENTS"—JEWELRY.

A will contained the following provisions: "To my niece Louise E. Matthews * * I give * * * my finger-rings, * * * and so many of my books, pictures, and ornaments (not otherwise bequeathed specifically) as she shall choose to take." Held, that the word "ornaments," as used in the will, was intended to include articles of jewelry, such as breastpins, bracelets, ear-rings, brooches, lockets, chains, etc., and also many articles not classified under the head of jewelry.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

D. Wm. Douthitt, for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The deceased, Mrs. Elizabeth D. Traylor, left an estate worth about $155,000. Her will contains (among other bequests) the following: "To my niece, Louise E. Matthews, of this city, I give $10,000, my piano, sewing-machine, finger-rings, (save the diamond ring I habitually wear,) and so many of my books, pictures, and ornaments (not otherwise bequeathed specifically) as she shall choose to take." The said Louise appears to be as near a relative as any other person named in the will. The court below entered a decree of partial distribution, in which there was distributed to said Louise E. Matthews (now Louise M. Overacker) certain personal property set forth in Exhibit A, which forms part of the record. From this decree, and from an order denying a new trial, Elizabeth H. Siddall, admitted to be the heir at law, appeals, upon the ground that the personal property so distributed was not intended by the testatrix to be bequeathed to said Louise. And the question to be determined is whether or not the court below erred in holding that the things distributed were "ornaments" within the meaning of that word as used in the will. Exhibit A contains a number of articles not classified under the head of "jewelry;" and we think that the court was right in holding them to be ornaments. About the character of a few of them, of small value, there may be some room for doubt; but we think the ruling of the court below concerning them was not erroneous. Exhibit A, however, contains a list of articles scheduled under the head of "jewelry," and about these the main question arises. They consist of breastpins, bracelets, ear-rings, lace-pins, sleeve-buttons, glove-buttons, brooches, lockets, chains, etc., made of various jewels and gold,—such as women usually wear for personal decoration. We have no doubt that the word “ornaments,” in its general signification, and freed from any modification that might come from association in particular instances with other language, includes “jewelry” worn by women for the purpose of adding grace or beauty to their persons, or for the purpose of complying with the usages of society. Such is its meaning both in classic English and in common language. In Webster’s Dictionary an illustration is given from Sir Thomas Browne, as follows: “Some think it it most ornamental to wear their bracelets on their wrists; others about their ankles.” And the Jenkins of the present day in his descriptions of the costumes of ladies at evening parties writes, “ornaments, diamonds.” But it is contended that as the word “ornament,” as used in the will, immediately follows the words “books” and “pictures,” it must, therefore, be restricted to things resembling (that is ejusdem generis with) books and pictures. There is certainly force in this suggestion; but the words, “not otherwise specifically bequeathed,” which immediately follow “ornaments,” must also be considered. And when we look at the few things which have been otherwise specifically bequeathed, we find that nearly every one of them that could, in any sense, be called an ornament, is an article of jewelry. The words, “as she shall choose to take,” also indicate that liberality of construction in favor of the legatee should be indulged in. The discovery of the real intention of the testatrix in this case is no doubt a difficult matter, but as the word “ornaments,” in its general and ordinary sense includes the property in contest, and as the other language of the will, taken all together, does not clearly indicate that the word was used in a special or limited sense, we conclude that the view taken of the question by the learned judge of the court below is more satisfactory than the opposite view taken by appellant. Judgment and order affirmed.

MOALLISTER v. CLEMENT et al. (No. 9,874.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 25, 1888.)

NOTARY PUBLIC—NEGLIGENCE IN TAKING ACKNOWLEDGMENT—INJURIA SINE DAMNUM.

In an action against a notary public for misconduct and neglect in taking the acknowledgment to a mortgage, it appeared that the mortgage, if it had been properly acknowledged, would not have secured the debt, in that the crop which it purported to secure was wholly valueless. Held that, in such case, the mortgagee, having suffered no injury by the neglect of the notary, could not, under the Code, recover even nominal damages.

Commissioners’ decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; S. M. SWINNERTON, Judge pro tem.

Action by A. McAllister against C. H. Clement, a notary public, and J. P. Andrews and E. W. Steele, his sureties, to recover damages for the alleged official misconduct and neglect of such notary. The court found that if there was misconduct, the plaintiff had suffered no injury thereby, and was entitled to no damages. Plaintiff appeals.

J. M. Wilcoxson and Ernest Graves, for appellant. J. R. Patton and C. H. Clement, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged official misconduct or neglect of a notary public. The material facts of the case are as follows: In 1883, the defendant, C. H. Clement, was a notary public for San Luis Obispo county, and the other defendants were the sureties on his official bond. On the 14th day of April of that year, one W. A. Cook made to the plaintiff his promissory note for $600, payable six months after date, with interest; and on the same day, to secure the payment of the note, executed to plaintiff a mortgage upon a crop of wheat, barley, and oats then growing in the county of San Luis Obispo. The mortgage was properly sworn to by the mortgagor and mortgagee, and was acknowledged by the mortgagor before the defendant Clement. The certificate of acknowledgment, which was attached to the mortgage, reads as follows:

"State of California, County of San Luis Obispo—ss.: On this 14th day of April, 1880, before me personally appeared W. A. Cook, known to me to be the person whose name is subscribed to the within instrument, and he acknowledged to me that he executed the same. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my official seal, at my office in the county of San Luis Obispo, on the day and year in this certificate first above written. [Seal.]

"C. H. CLEMENT, Notary Public."

In this condition the mortgage was recorded on the 19th day of May, 1883. Before the note became due, Cook was adjudged to be an insolvent debtor, and his assignee in insolvency took possession of all his property, including the mortgaged crop. The plaintiff made no effort to foreclose his mortgage, or to subject the mortgaged property to the payment of his debt. The note has never been paid, and Cook is insolvent and unable to pay it. It is alleged in the complaint that the failure to state correctly in the certificate the year when the acknowledgment was taken, and to insert in the body of the certificate "the name and quality of the officer" who made it, destroyed the lien of the mortgage as against the assignee, and left the mortgaged crop free and clear of all claim thereto by the plaintiff. It is further alleged that but for these defects in the certificate the mortgage "would have been a good and valid lien upon a valuable growing crop, and would have amply secured the said promissory note." The court below found the facts to be substantially as above stated, but further found "that said mortgage would not have secured said note; that said crop was not valuable, and was and is wholly valueless;" and, as a conclusion of law, "that plaintiff has not suffered any damage or loss by reason of the act or acts of defendants, or any of them." Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and from that judgment the plaintiff appealed; the case coming here on the judgment roll.

We do not think it necessary to consider the question principally discussed by counsel, namely, as to the sufficiency of the certificate of acknowledgment. The Code declares that, "for the official misconduct or neglect of a notary public, he and the sureties on his official bond are liable to the parties injured thereby for all the damages sustained." Pol. Code, § 801. But it is clear that no action will lie to recover damages if no damages have been sustained. The findings are responsive to the issues, and must be presumed to have been justified by the evidence. It is urged, however, that the plaintiff was at least entitled to recover nominal damages. But why should he have nominal damages if he suffered no actual damage? The Code does not seem to justify this contention, and, at any rate, we think it is a case where in this court the maxim de minimis non curat lex should be applied. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur. FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL v. BOARD SUP'RS. (No. 12,276.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 25, 1888.)

INJUNCTION—TO RESTRAIN PUBLICATION OF RESULT OF ELECTION—REMOVAL OF COUNTY-SEAT.

Under the "County Government Act," (Deering's Pol. Code, p. 841,) a petition was presented to the board of supervisors asking the submission of the question of removing the county-seat to the voters of the county. The supervisors, believing that the petition was legally presented, in good faith ordered the election, which was held, the returns received, compared, and result ascertained by the board; and it only remained for them to announce the result, and give notice thereof, as required by statute. Held that, whether the order for holding the election was legal or not, the supervisors having acted in good faith, the publication of the result of such election cannot be restrained by injunction; such publication being within the inhibition of Civil Code Cal. § 3423, subd. 4, providing that no injunction shall issue to "prevent the execution of a public statute by officers of the law for the public benefit."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; CHARLES T. BRAYNARD, Judge.

A. C. Adams and Jackson Hatch, for appellants. Edward Sweeney, Clay W. Taylor, and Chipman & Garter, for appellees.

FOOTE, C. In this action an injunction is prayed for enjoining the defendants, as a board of supervisors, from declaring the result of an election, and from giving notice thereof, under section 3981, Pol. Code, held by their order upon the question of a removal of the county-seat of Shasta county. It is alleged that the election was illegally ordered by the board, when they had no jurisdiction so to do, and therefore that they should be enjoined from making known and publishing the result of such election. The court below, by its judgment, denied the writ of injunction, and dismissed the bill filed in the action. From that this appeal is taken.

We do not deem it necessary to go into the matter as to whether the board of supervisors did or did not legally order the election to be held. The question which meets us upon the threshold is, did or did not the court below have any right to grant an injunction to prevent the board of supervisors from announcing and publishing the result of an election? The statutes bearing upon the question are as follows: "Whenever there shall be presented to the board of supervisors of any county a petition signed by the qualified electors of such county, in number equal to a majority of the votes cast at the preceding general election, praying for the submission of the question of the removal of the county-seat of such county, it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors, by due proclamation, to submit the question of such removal of the county-seat at the next general election to the qualified electors of such county. The election shall be conducted and the returns canvassed in all respects as provided by law for the conducting general elections, and canvassing the returns thereof; but a proposition of removal of a county-seat shall not be submitted in the same county more than once in four years." Section 12, County Government Act, approved March 14, 1883, (Deering's Pol. Code, p. 841.) Section 3981, Pol. Code, which prescribes the duties of the board with reference to announcing the result of such an election, is as follows: "When the returns have been received and compared, and the results ascertained by the board, if two-thirds of the legal votes cast by those voting on the proposition are in favor of any particular place, the board must give notice of the result by posting notices thereof in all the election precincts in the county." In this case the board of supervisors acted on what appeared to them a legal petition as prescribed by law. They ascertained to their satisfaction that the requisite number of qualified electors had signed that petition, which they believed to have been duly and legally presented to them for their action. They took action thereon as petitioned, and ordered the election. The election was then held in due form of law, and two-thirds of the legal voters of the county voting on the proposition voted in favor of removing the county-seat. No objection was made to anything pertaining to the whole matter until after the election had been thus held. The returns have been received and compared, and the results ascertained by the board, and now the effort is made to prevent them from announcing the result, and giving notice thereof, as required by the statutes. The board of supervisors, whose good faith is nowhere questioned, believe they legally ordered the election. It was held under all the requisite forms of law; but the appellants seek to enjoin them from announcing the result of such election, which was ordered and held in good faith, and to do this they seek, in effect, to have determined the question as to whether the old county-seat is to remain such, or another place has been duly elected to be such county-seat. In this case we do not think that an injunction would lie. Section 3423, subd. 4, Civil Code, is as follows: "An injunction cannot be granted * * * (sub. 4) to prevent the execution of a public statute by officers of the law for the public benefit." The board of supervisors are simply endeavoring to perform a duty enjoined on them by law,—to announce the result of an election which in good faith they believe to have been duly ordered and legally held; and we think it would be a most dangerous interference by the courts to prevent them from performing a legal duty, and, in effect, to determine the result of a contested election, in this action for an injunction. Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 261. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE TO RECOVER FROM FRAUDULENT PURCHASER—DEMAND.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 3439, a sale or transfer made with intent to delay or defraud creditors is void, and passes no title; and a demand for possession by an assignee in insolvency is not necessary to support his action of claim and delivery against such fraudulent purchaser.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Louis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

Joseph R. Brandon and J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellants. McD. R. Venable and C. W. Goodchild, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This is an action of claim and delivery. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and from an order refusing the defendants a new trial. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because, as they say, no demand was alleged to have been made for the possession of the property before suit were brought. If the facts set out in the pleading objected to were true, and for the present purpose they must be so treated, the defendants were never lawfully in possession of the property in dispute; the sale to them was absolutely void, being in contravention of section 55 of the insolvent act of 1880, and section 3439 of the Civil Code. The defendants were inhibited by law from making the purchase, the insolvent could have no right to sell, and the plaintiff in this action (the assignee in insolvency) is, as against them, the lawful owner of the property, and derives his right to it from the act participated in by the defendants and the insolvent, whereby they violated the law. The defendants did not obtain a lawful possession of the property. They purchased it from those who had no right to sell it, in view of the relative situation of the parties to the transaction, and the defendants, in taking possession of it under the attempted and void sale, converted it to their own use unlawfully. No demand was necessary, and the demurrer was properly overruled. Bull v. Houghton, 65 Cal. 422, 4 Pac. Rep. 529; Surles v. Sweeney, 11 Or. 21, 4 Pac. Rep. 469. Besides, the defendants do not seem to have relied upon their demurrer, as if they were willing to yield up possession if a demand therefor had been made by the assignee in insolvency. In their answer they claim title in themselves adverse to the plaintiff, and give no countenance anywhere in the record to the belief that a demand, if made, would have been of any avail. Having contested the case upon the merits, on a claim of superior right to the property, it would seem as if a demand would have been useless, and that the case in hand comes within that class where no demand is necessary. Lamping v. Keenan, 9 Colo. 390, 12 Pac. Rep. 434. We cannot say that the verdict of the jury was contrary to the evidence. It was for them to determine the credibility of witnesses, the weight of testimony, and the force of all the circumstances adduced in evidence. They have done so, and we see no reason to disturb their verdict upon the special issues submitted to them. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

KAHN v. EDWARDS et al. (No. 12,256.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 29, 1888.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—ORAL STATEMENT OF ACCOUNT.

Defendants were indebted upon open account to a partnership, the assets of which plaintiff owned at the time suit was brought. Before the statute of limitations barred that account, the parties orally agreed upon the balance due, which defendants promised to pay. Plaintiff brought his action on account stated for such balance within two years after the agreement. Held, that the statute of limitations of two years (Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 339 subd. 1,) was not a bar to such action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Hudson Grant, for appellant. G. P. Harding, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This is an action upon an account stated. Both of the defendants pleaded the statute of limitations of two years under section 339, subd. 1, Code Civil Proc. One of them, Goodin, further pleaded, in bar of the action, that he by agreement had been absolved from paying the account sued on. The trial court found that the amount of the account was correct; that no such agreement as Goodin claimed had in fact existed, but held that the cause of action as to both defendants was barred by the statute of limitations. From the judgment roll, it appears that the defendants were indebted upon an open account to a partnership, of whose effects the plaintiff was the sole owner at the time of the institution of this suit. Before the statute of limitations had barred any portion of that account, the parties met, and agreed orally upon the balance that was due from the defendants to the plaintiff. In other words, an accounting was had between the parties; and the balance which the plaintiff claimed to be due from the defendants they then and there orally admitted to be due, as he claimed, and agreed to pay. At the time when this action upon the "account stated" was instituted, two years had not elapsed since the agreement had been made to pay the ascertained balance due on the original account. Therefore the cause of action upon which this suit is based was not barred, and the plaintiff should have had judgment upon the findings. "An open account already barred by the statute of limitations cannot be relieved from the bar of such statute by an oral statement of such account. * * * Where, however, the demand is not barred at the date of the account stated, although the statement is verbal, the statute begins to run upon the new cause of action thus brought into existence from the date of the settlement and new promise arising thereunder, and, if verbal, an action may, under subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civil Proc., be brought within two years after such settlement." Auzerais v. Naglee, 15 Pac. Rep. 371. The judgment, therefore, should be reversed, and the court below directed to render judgment upon the findings for the plaintiff.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to render judgment upon the findings for the plaintiff.

CHICAGO Q. M. CO. v. OLIVER. (No. 12,090.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 29, 1888.)

PUBLIC LANDS—RAILROAD GRANTS—"MINERAL LANDS" EXCEPTED FROM.

In an action to quiet title defendant claimed under a patent issued to the C. P. R. Co. in pursuance of the act of congress approved July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean," and the amendatory act approved July 2, 1862. The original act excepted from the grant all "mineral lands," and the amendatory act excludes them. Defendant's patent also excluded and excepted "all mineral lands," should any such be found to exist in the tracts described therein. Held, that such patent is not conclusive that the land was properly included in the grant, and that, upon evidence of its being "mineral land," plaintiff is entitled to relief. SEARLS, C. J., and McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

This was an action brought by the Chicago Quartz Mining Company against John Oliver, to quiet title to land. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Gaylord & Searls, H. V. Rearden, and Wm. Singer, Jr., for appellant. A. Burrows, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an action to quiet title. The plaintiff claims under a mining patent issued August 16, 1883; defendant under a patent issued to the C. P. R. Co., dated April 18, 1870. The only question is whether the title to the premises in controversy vested in the railroad company under the act of congress entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean," etc., approved July 1, 1862, and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1862. The land is within the boundaries of one of the sections covered by that grant, and, if not reserved or excepted from it, undoubtedly vested in the railroad company. So that the question is: Was the land reserved or excepted from the grant to the railroad company? In the original act there is a proviso that all mineral lands shall be excepted from its operation, and, in the amendatory act, that the grant shall not include any mineral lands. And the Revised Statutes provide that "No act passed at the first session of the thirty-eighth congress granting lands to states or corporations to aid in the construction of roads or for other purposes, or to extend the time of grants made prior to the 30th day of January, 1865, shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases are reserved exclusively to the United States, unless otherwise officially provided in the act or acts making the grant." Rev. St. U. S. § 2346. The patent under which defendant claims contains this clause: "Excluding and excepting from the transfer by these presents 'all mineral lands,' should any be found to exist in the tracts described in the foregoing." The court found "that all the land described in said complaint as the 'Chicago Quartz Mine' is valuable gold-bearing mineral land, and has been notoriously known and frequently worked as such ever since 1861." This finding is justified by the evidence, and is not assailed by appellant. But, while conceding the fact to be as found, he contends that the title to the land, nevertheless, vested by the patent in the railroad company. As stated by appellant's counsel, his contention is that "mineral land did not pass by the grant, (to the railroad company,) and the officers of the land department had no authority to designate by the patent any land which was mineral in character. The law required them to designate only such land as was non-mineral in character, and the issuance of the patent under the law, aided by the presumption which the law attaches to the performance of all official acts, was a conclusive determination that the land designated in the patent was non-mineral, and the reservation in the patent was meaningless." The act of congress making the grant does not in express terms require any officer or officers of the government to identify and exclude from the patent mineral lands lying within the alternate sections granted to aid in the construction of the road. In the original act all mineral lands are expressly excepted from its operation, and in the amendatory act it is enacted that the grant shall not include mineral lands or any lands returned and denominated as mineral lands. "Whatever is included in the exception is excluded from the grant; and it therefore often becomes important to ascertain what is excepted in order to determine what is granted." Railroad Co. v. U. S., 92 U. S. 733. It is not claimed that the officers on whom was devolved the duty of issuing patents for the lands granted could add anything to the grant, but it is claimed the patent is conclusive evidence that the grant included all the land covered by the patent. The supreme court of the United States has said: "A patent may be collaterally impeached in any action, and its operation as a conveyance defeated, by showing that it had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands; that is, that the law did not provide for selling them, or that they had been reserved for sale or dedicated to special purposes, or had been previously transferred to others." Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636. This is quoted approvingly in the opinion of the court, delivered by FIELD, J., in Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 985. In McLaughlin v. Powell, 50 Cal. 64, the plaintiff in ejectment introduced a patent to the W. P. R. Co., from which he deraigned title to the demanded premises, similar to that relied on by appellant in this case, and rested. "The defendant then offered to prove that the land was mineral land, containing large quantities of cinnabar and quicksilver, and that he had held the land as a mining claim since October, 1866, under the rules and regulations and customs of miners in the district where the land was situated. The plaintiff objected to the testimony as irrelevant, and the court sustained the objection. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appealed from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial." This court said: "The exception contained in the patent introduced by the plaintiff is part of the description, and is equivalent to an exception of all the subdivisions of land mentioned which were 'mineral' lands. In other words, the patent grants all of the tracts named in it which are not mineral lands. * * * We think the defendant should have been allowed to prove that the demanded premises were mineral lands." The judgment and order were reversed. The doctrine laid down in that case, if applied to the case now in hand, is decisive of it; and we think it in harmony with the cases decided by the supreme court of the United States. It has not been overruled in any reported case in this state, although it is claimed to have been in the unreported case of Railroad Co. v. Leavenworth. No opinion was filed in that case, and we are unable to determine from the record that this question was passed on in that case. Those portions of finding 3 which are alleged to be unsupported by the evidence, are, in our opinion, immaterial. It is therefore unnecessary to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to justify them. The material facts found are supported by the evidence. Judgment and order affirmed.

ROBERTS v. DUNSMUIR et al. (No. 12,162.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1888.)

COURTS—STATE COURTS—JURISDICTION—RESIDENTS OF FOREIGN COUNTRY.

The dismissal, for want of jurisdiction, of an action brought to recover damages for injuries received while employed in defendants' coal mine in a foreign country, where it appears that personal service of the summons was had on one of the defendants, even though plaintiff and the defendant served are both subjects of a foreign country, is error.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Action by Henry Roberts against R. Dunsmuir, James Dunsmuir, and A. Dunsmuir, to recover damages for injuries received while working in defendants' mine. The court dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction. Plaintiff appeals.

John I. Caldwell and Geo. D. Buckley, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. The plaintiff is a subject of Great Britain, and brings this suit against these defendants, who are also subjects of Great Britain, to recover damages for injuries received while employed by them in their coal mines in British Columbia. At the time of bringing the suit the plaintiff and one of the defendants were actually residing in this state, and the plaintiff had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. But one of the defendants was served with summons. He answered denying the alleged partnership, or that he was ever owner of the mine, which he averred was wholly owned by the defendant, who resided in British Columbia.

On motion of the defendant, the court below dismissed the action, on the ground that the courts of this state have no jurisdiction. In this it is plain the court erred. Johnson v. Dalton, 1 Cow. 543; Gardner v. Thomas, 14 Johns. 134; Smith v. Bull, 17 Wend. 323. The action is transitory, and the defendant may be sued wherever found; otherwise, a person might in some cases escape such liability by simply going into another state. The defendants R. Dunsmuir and James Dunsmuir were not personally served, and are not residents of this state. The court had no jurisdiction as to them, if they have not voluntarily appeared in the action. It is claimed they did that by filing a petition asking to have the cause removed to the circuit court of the United States, and by procuring an extension of time to answer after such appearance. The plaintiff at the trial asked to have their default entered, and thereupon read the petition for the removal of the cause; and offered to prove that, after such petition was filed, the defendants R. and James Dunsmuir applied to the circuit court for and obtained several extensions of the time in which to plead. The court rejected this last evidence of its own motion, saying that it was immaterial, as the court had no jurisdiction of the action. In other words, the court refused to act at all upon the motion for a default, believing it had no jurisdiction of the case. The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, and for further proceedings.

ASHE v. BOARD SUP'RS. (No. 11,481.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 29, 1886.)

REVIEW, WRIT OF—USE OF HIGHWAY FOR RAILROAD—PARTY BENEFICIALLY INTERESTED.

The affidavit for a writ of review to an order of the board of supervisors granting the right to use a highway for the purpose of a railroad alleged that affiant, in common with others living along the highway, would be damaged by the maintenance of such railroad. Held, that the application was not made by "the party beneficially interested," as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1069.

In bank. Motion to quash a writ of review.

Motion to quash a writ of review issued on the petition of one W. Ashe to an order of the board of supervisors of Colusa county granting to certain persons the right to appropriate a highway for the purpose of constructing a railroad. The petitioner alleged in his affidavit that he was a citizen and taxpayer of the county lying upon such highway, and that he and all other citizens living along the line of the same would suffer damage from the maintenance of the railroad in question.

A. L. Hart, for petitioner. Stabler & Bayne, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The motion to quash the writ of review heretofore issued in this proceeding must be granted. It does not appear that the application for the writ was made on the affidavit of the party beneficially interested. The Code requires that "the application must be made on affidavit by the person beneficially interested." Code Civil Proc. § 1069. It does not appear by the petition in this case that the petitioner has any other or greater right in the public highway mentioned therein than any other citizen of the state. The requirement that the application must be made by "the party beneficially interested" has been construed to mean "that, in an application made by a private party, his interest must be of a nature which is distinguishable from that of the mass of the community." Linden v. Alameda Co., 45 Cal. 7. Writ quashed, and proceeding dismissed.

McLAUGHLIN v. DEL RE et al. (No. 11,165.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 29, 1886.)

MINES AND MINING—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

In an action to recover damages for dumping the tailings in hydraulic mining on plaintiff's land, and for an injunction to restrain the continuance of such injury, a judgment for the plaintiff is supported by the finding that the plaintiff had for more than 10 years been in open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession of the land in controversy, though it was originally claimed for a dumping ground, under miners' laws, by the defendants' grantors.¹

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county.

John McLaughlin brought this action against Henry Del Re et al. to restrain them from dumping placer tailings on his ground. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

C. V. Grey, J. B. Reddick, and W. T. Lewis, for appellants. Ira H. Reed, for appellee.

FOOTE, C. The complaint in this action alleged that the plaintiff, being the owner of a certain placer mining claim, appropriated, for the purpose of working the same, the waters of a certain creek or gulch, by means of a ditch and flumes, and that, while in the use and possession of said ditch, the defendants began mining by the hydraulic process on the hill-side sloping into the gulch, whereby large quantities of earth and debris were washed down, and deposited in the gulch, and ran into and filled up the plaintiff's ditch; and prayed that the defendants be perpetually enjoined from continuing the acts complained of, and for damages which such acts had already occasioned to the plaintiff's property. Upon the other hand, the defendants, by their answer, claimed that for more than 20 years they had possessed and worked their mining claim, and had used the creek or gulch as a tail-race and receptacle for tailings and debris caused by the working of their mine by said hydraulic process; and that the plaintiff had, at his own risk and peril, entered upon their said claim while defendants were working it, and constructed his ditch and flumes. Upon the former hearing of the case before this court, it appeared that it was an action in equity, and that the court below had granted the injunction as prayed for, and rendered judgment for damages upon the verdict of a jury, without having made or filed any findings of fact; whereupon the judgment and an order denying to the defendants a new trial was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to find the facts upon the testimony already taken, and such further testimony as might be thereafter taken, and to enter an appropriate judgment thereon. 64 Cal. 473, 2 Pac. Rep. 244. In compliance with such direction, the court below proceeded to take further testimony; and upon it, and that which had been formerly taken, and upon the verdict of the jury, awarding $470 for damages inflicted on the plaintiff's property by the defendants, filed findings of fact and conclusions of law based thereon, and granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from continuing the acts complained of against them; besides rendering judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of money awarded by the verdict of the jury. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial the defendants have appealed. The findings are as follows: "(1) That, in the year 1862, Patrick Kelly, James Grider, and Michael Carroll were the owners of, and in the possession of, that certain gravel mining claim described in defendants' answer, and which claim is in the hill, and is situated and commences a short distance above the bed of the gulch known as 'Old Gulch,' in Calaveras county, and extending into the hill about eight hundred feet, more or less. (2) That on the date last aforesaid the said Kelly, Grider, and ¹See note at end of case.

Carroll claimed a portion of said Old Gulch, four hundred feet in length and one hundred feet in width, as a deposit for tailings, dirt, gravel, and debris taken out of said claim while working and mining the same. That on the 23d day of January, 1862, said last-named parties caused a notice of intention to claim said land as a dump or deposit for said tailings to be recorded in the mining records of the Old Gulch mining district. A copy of said notice is as follows:

"We, the undersigned, claim the Old Gulch, from the small gulch in which McDermott turns his waste-water in from his reservoir, up the said Old Gulch four hundred (400) feet, for the purpose of depositing our tailings in, and one hundred feet wide.

[Signed]

JAMES GRIDER.

"PATRICK KELLY.

"MICHAEL CARROLL.

"Old Gulch, January 23, 1862."

"(3) That the said Kelly, Grider, and Carroll thereafter worked said claim, and deposited the tailings therefrom in said gulch claimed by them until the year 1863 or 1864, when they sold and conveyed by bill of sale their interests in said claim and said dump in said gulch to Cyprian J. Agostini. (4) That said claim thereafter was worked and mined by the said Cyprian J. Agostini and other parties to whom he sold some interest therein, and said dump in said gulch was used as a place of deposit for the tailings from said claim until some time in the year 1867, when the said Cyprian J. Agostini and Francis Agostini became the owners of said claim and said dump, by purchase from their copartners, and received from them written bills of sale therefor, and that thereafter they worked said claim, and deposited the tailings in said gulch, until the 26th day of October, 1878. (5) That at and prior to the year 1868 plaintiff was, and ever since has been, the owner of, and in the possession of, a certain gold placer mining claim, situated in French gulch, in said Calaveras county. That, for the purpose of conveying water to work said claim, plaintiff constructed the ditch and flume mentioned in said complaint, of sufficient capacity to carry three hundred inches of water under a four-inch pressure, and in length over one and one-half miles, at a cost of two thousand five hundred dollars. (6) That said ditch and flume traverses in its course the hill-side opposite to the hill in which defendants' claim is situated, along said Old Gulch, and is about ten feet in a perpendicular line, and about fifteen feet on the slope of said hill-side, above the bed of said Old Gulch, and that the width of the bed of said gulch is about eighty feet where plaintiff's ditch and flume traverses the land in controversy. (7) That from the time of the construction of said ditch and flume in the month of November, 1868, and down to the acts of defendants hereinafter stated, the plaintiff was in the actual, open, and notorious occupation and possession of the land in controversy, upon which said ditch and flume is situated, using and maintaining the same to convey water to his said mining claim. That during all of said time the plaintiff held, used, and maintained said ditch, for the purposes aforesaid, continuously and uninterruptedly under a claim of title adversely to the said C. Agostini and F. Agostini, the grantors of the defendants herein. (8) That at the time of the construction of said ditch upon the land in controversy the said Cyprian Agostini, one of the grantors of defendants, knew of the construction of the same, and made no objection to its construction thereon; and that neither the said Cyprian Agostini, nor his said copartner, the said F. Agostini, at any time thereafter, objected to the use of said land upon which said ditch was constructed by the said plaintiff, and never interfered with the use of said ditch over the land in controversy by the plaintiff at any time while they were the owners of said claim, and never deposited, or attempted to deposit, tailings from said claim upon the land occupied by said ditch at any time. (9) That on the 26th day of October, 1878, the said Cyprian and F. Agostini, by deed, sold and conveyed to the defendants all their right, title, and interest in and to said gravel gold-mining claim, and extending into the hill eight hundred feet, and being in width about five hundred feet and about seven hundred feet of the gulch into which to run the tailings from the claim. (10) That defendants, in working said claim, caused great quantities of tailings, dirt, gravel, bowlders, and debris to be deposited in said gulch, filling up the same up to and into plaintiff's ditch, filling up the said ditch, and preventing him from using the same in April, 1879. That, subsequent thereto, the said defendants continued said mining operations and continued to deposit the tailings from the working of said claim in and upon plaintiff's said ditch, and in and upon his flume, filling up said ditch and breaking down said flume; thereby preventing plaintiff from running water therein to work his said mining claim, and preventing him from working said claim. (11) That the plaintiff has sustained damages by reason of the acts of said defendants filling up said ditch up to the month of October, 1880, and in breaking down said flume by the means and manner aforesaid, in the sum of $470. (12) That the distance is less than one hundred feet from the point where said ditch is filled up, and said flume broken down by said tailings, to the limit of the bed of said gulch on the opposite side of said gulch. (13) That in the month of April, 1858, at a meeting of the miners residing in Old Gulch, they organized a mining district, known as 'Old Gulch Mining District,' and established and defined the boundaries thereof, and adopted a code of laws regulating the mode of locating and holding the possession of mining claims therein, and elected a mining recorder of said district. (14) That on the fourteenth day of January, 1867, the following local law was adopted and passed: 'Art. 14. All miners shall hold their tailings, and the ground necessary to hold the same, provided they are mining in good faith.' (15) That at and prior to the year 1862 there was a custom in force in said Old Gulch mining district permitting the owner of mining claims therein to hold ground necessary for the deposit of tailings from their claims."

After a careful examination of the whole record, we are of opinion that the evidence, although conflicting, warranted the findings, and that the latter support the judgment, and are sufficiently intelligible. It also appears evident, as we think, that the court found upon all the material issues made by the pleadings. As the defendants have suffered from no prejudicial error, the judgment and order should be affirmed.

BELCHER, C. C., and SEARLS, C., concurred.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

NOTE.

ADVERSE POSSESSION—WHAT CONSTITUTES. The occupancy necessary to give title by adverse possession must be adverse to the claim of all others, and accompanied by an actual possession, exclusive in its character. Richards v. Smith, (Tex.) 4 S. W. Rep. 571. The statute of limitations will not run in favor of an occupant of real estate, unless the occupancy and possession are adverse to the true owner, and with the intent and purpose of the occupant to assert his ownership of the property. His possession must be as owner, and adverse to every other person. Colvin v. Land Ass'n, (Neb.) 36 N. W. 861. Exercising that dominion over the thing, and taking that use and profit which it is capable of yielding, is a possession. When such acts are so repeated as to show that they are done in the character of owner, and not of an occasional trespasser, the possession is adverse. Baum v. Club, (N. C.) 2 S. E. Rep. 673. Actual occupancy by residence, cultivation, or inclosure, or the erection of permanent improvements, is not required in order to establish title by adverse possession, and that whether, in any case, title has been acquired by length of possession, and to what extent, and within what limits, must be determined by the actual facts. Cooper v. Morris, (N. J.) 7 Atl. Rep. 427; Murray v. Hudson, (Mich.) 32 N. W. Rep. 889; Murphy v. Doyle, (Minn.) 33 N. W. Rep. 220. Defendant had been for the statutory period of limitation exercising acts of ownership and possession of parts of a certain strip of land, the title to which was in plaintiff. The evidence showed that for the same period plaintiff had been in actual, continuous possession and use of other parts of such strip. Held, that such possession by defendant was no defense to plaintiff's action of ejectment. Railway Co. v. Maffit, (Mo.) 6 S. W. Rep. 600. When a mortgage is in law as well as in equity simply a lien on the land it covers, and it gives no right of possession of the land, the mortgagor's possession during the period allowed by the statute for instituting a suit of foreclosure is not adverse to the rights of the mortgagee, but is subordinate thereto; and the same is true as to the possession of the mortgagor's grantee, although such grantee hold under covenants warranting the title. Gordan v. Sayre, (Fla.) 3 South. Rep. 329. See, also, as to the character of the occupancy necessary to constitute adverse possession, Hyne v. Osborn, (Mich.) 23 N. W. Rep. 521, and note; Scott v. PEOPLE v. O'LEARY. (No. 20,358.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 29, 1888.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—PLEAS—FORMER ACQUITTAL.

Deering's Pen. Code Cal. § 1017, provides that a plea must be entered upon the minutes of the court in substantially the following form: "(3) If he plead a former conviction or acquittal: 'The defendant pleads that he has already been convicted [or acquitted] of the offense charged by the judgment of the court of,' etc. "(4) If he plead once in jeopardy: 'The defendant pleads that he has been once in jeopardy for the offense charged, [specifying the time, place, and court.]" Defendant asked to have entered, as a plea of former acquittal: "Defendant pleads that he has already been acquitted of the offense charged by the judgment of this court, rendered at this court-room on the 14th day of February, 1887, when defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's information was sustained by the court, and said court then and there or at any time failed to render its opinion that the objection to said demurrer could ever be cured by filing a new information." Held a sufficient plea of former acquittal.

2. SAME—FORMER JEOPARDY.

Defendant asked to have entered, as a plea of once in jeopardy: "Pleads, further, that he has been once in jeopardy, he having on the ——— day of January, 1887, been placed on trial for the offense now alleged in the information before the justice court of Cache Creek township and a jury, which court was a competent court, and which jury was a competent jury; and witnesses against defendant were sworn before said jury, and, before the final submission of said matter to said jury, the jury was discharged, against the objection of the defendant." Held a sufficient plea of once in jeopardy.

3. SAME—FAILURE OF CLERK TO ENTER PLEA PROPERLY.

Held, further, that the failure of the clerk to make the entry as fully as he ought to have done, could not prejudice defendant.

4. SAME—VERDICT—NOT RESPONSIVE TO PLEAS.

Defendant entered three pleas: First, not guilty; second, a former acquittal; third, once in jeopardy. The jury found only on the first. Held, that there could be no conviction without a verdict on each plea.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Information against Arthur O'Leary for practicing medicine without a certificate. Defendant was convicted, and appeals.

R. Clark, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BELCHER, C. C. The information filed against the defendant charged him with practicing medicine at a time when he had not obtained a certificate authorizing him to do so, as required by the "Act to regulate the practice of medicine in the state of California," (Deering's Pen. Code, pp. 625-629.) The defendant demurred to the information, and his demurrer was overruled. We see no error in this ruling. The information charged the offense in language sufficiently full and explicit. The defendant then pleaded not guilty, and asked to have further pleas entered as follows: "Further pleading to said information, defendant pleads that he has already been acquitted of the offense charged by the judgment of this court, rendered at this court-room on the 14th day of February, 1887, when defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's information was sustained by the court, and said court then and there or at any time failed to render its opinion that the objection to said demurrer could ever be cured by filing a new information. Pleads, further, that he has been once in jeopardy, he having, on the ——— day of January, 1887, been placed on trial for the offense now alleged in the information before the justice court of Cache Creek township and a jury, which court was a competent court, and which jury was a competent jury; and witnesses against defendant were sworn before said jury, and, before the final submission of said matter to said jury, the jury was discharged, against the objection of the defendant." The court refused to allow these pleas to be entered, on the ground that they were not pleas recognized by the statutes, and the defendant excepted to the ruling. As entered upon the minutes of the court, the pleas were as follows: "First, defendant pleads not guilty of the offense charged; second, a former acquittal; third, once in jeopardy." The jury found the defendant guilty, but did not find on the issues of former acquittal and once in jeopardy. Judgment was entered that defendant pay a fine of $500, and, in default of payment, be imprisoned in the county jail for the term of 500 days, or at the rate of one day for each dollar of the fine, and from that judgment he has appealed.

The rule is well settled in this state that if, in a criminal case, there be a plea of not guilty, and also a plea of former conviction or acquittal, the defendant is entitled to a verdict on each plea, and until there is such a verdict there can be no judgment of conviction. People v. Kinsey, 51 Cal. 279; People v. Helbing, 59 Cal. 567; People v. Fuqua, 61 Cal. 377. The attorney general, while admitting the correctness of the decisions referred to, urges that defendant's pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy, as entered by the clerk, did not meet the requirements of section 1017, Pen. Code, and for that reason he was not entitled to any findings upon them. That section provides as follows: "Every plea must be oral, and entered upon the minutes of the court, in substantially the following form: * * * (3) If he plead a former conviction or acquittal: 'The defendant pleads that he has already been convicted [or acquitted] of the offense charged by the judgment of the court of ———, [naming it,] rendered at ———, [naming the place,] on the ——— day of ———.' (4) If he plead once in jeopardy: 'The defendant pleads that he has been once in jeopardy for the offense charged, [specifying the time, place, and court.]" The pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy, as the defendant asked to have them entered, were in substantially the form required by the Code. They were oral, and the clerk was to enter them on the minutes of the court. If the clerk failed to make the entry as fully as he ought to have done, the defendant cannot be made to suffer for that failure. If the failure was by reason of the order of the court, the order was erroneous, and is cause for reversal.

We think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CHUCK v. GARRISON et al., (HAWLEY BROS. HARDWARE Co., Intervenor.)
(No. 11,992.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 29, 1888.)

LIENS—FOR LABOR ON THRESHING-MACHINE—OWNERSHIP IMMATERIAL.

St. Cal. 1885, p. 109, provides: "Every person performing work * * * in, with, about, or upon any threshing-machine * * * shall have a lien upon the same" for the value of his services. Plaintiff worked for defendants on a threshing-machine, and sought to enforce a lien against it. The intervenor complained that it was the owner of the threshing-machine, and that the defendants were not its agents. Held, that intervenor's complaint was demurrable; the actual ownership of the threshing-machine being immaterial. McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action to foreclose a lien on a threshing-machine by Jack Chuck, a Chinaman, plaintiff and respondent, against George W. Garrison and William Falla, defendants, and Hawley Bros. Hardware Company, a corporation, intervenor and appellant. A demurrer to the complaint of intervention was sustained, and the intervenor appeals.

Stuart S. Wright and Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellant. W. B. Cullom and Brown & Daggett, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff alleges that the defendants Garrison and Falla are indebted to him in the sum of $138.25 for work and labor performed for them, at their request, on their certain threshing-machine, while engaged in threshing grain in Fresno county, between June 1 and August 14, 1886. Then follows a description of the machine, its appurtenances and value. He alleges that he quit work on said 14th day of August, and that 10 days have not expired since he ceased so working. He alleges that he has a lien on the machine and its appurtenances for the amount due him for said work, that there is danger of said machine and appurtenances being removed from said county, and prays for a judgment against the said defendant for said sum of $138.25 so due for said work and labor; that E. H. Tucker of Fresno county be appointed by this court to receive and safely keep the said threshing-machine, and all of the said appurtenances, and everything thereto appertaining, whether the same has been properly described herein or not; and that the same, and every part thereof, be sold according to law, and the proceeds thereof be applied to the payment of plaintiff's judgment, and all costs of suit. The summons was served on Garrison, one of the defendants, but the record does not show that it was served on Falla, or that either of the defendants ever appeared in the action. The default of defendant Garrison was entered on the 5th day of October, 1886. On the 11th day of October, 1886, Hawley Bros. Hardware Company, (a corporation,) by leave of the court, filed a complaint in intervention, in which, among other things, it is alleged that at the time of the commencement of the action the intervenor was, and for more than six months prior thereto had been, the owner of the property mentioned in the plaintiff's complaint; that the defendants were not agents or employes of intervenor, nor had they or either of them any power or authority to bind intervenor by any contract, or to create any lien upon said property; that plaintiff performed no work or labor for intervenor "in, with, about, or upon" said property. To the complaint in intervention the plaintiff interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained by the court, and, as the intervenor declined to amend, judgment was awarded the plaintiff for the relief prayed in his complaint. From that judgment intervenor appeals.

Appellant's counsel say "that the order sustaining the demurrer must have been made upon the ground that the title to the property could not have been involved in the action. That is to say, the mere fact that work and labor had been performed 'in, with, about, or upon' the property gave to the persons who had performed such work or labor a lien upon the property, and all of it, no matter who was the owner of the whole, or of any part thereof." We think the demurrer could have been sustained only on the ground that the actual ownership of the property was an immaterial circumstance. The action is brought under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to secure the wages of persons employed as laborers on threshing-machines," approved March 12, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 109.) It is very short, and we insert it in full:

"Section 1. Every person performing work or labor of any kind in, with, about, or upon any threshing-machine, the engine, horse-power, wagons, or appurtenances thereof, while engaged in threshing, shall have a lien upon the same to the extent of the value of his services.

"Sec. 2. The lien herein given shall extend for ten days after the person has ceased such work or labor.

"Sec. 3. If judgment shall be recovered in any action to recover for said services for work or labor performed, and said property shall be sold, the proceeds of such sale shall be distributed pro rata to all judgment creditors who have within ten days begun suits to recover judgments for the amount due them for such work.

"Sec. 4. The lien shall expire unless a suit to recover the amount of the claim is brought within ten days after the party ceases work."

The language of the act is sufficiently comprehensive to include a case like this. We could not exclude such a case from its operation without a material modification of its provisions. This case is clearly within the letter of the law, and we see no reason to doubt that it is just as clearly within the spirit of it. The statute gives the lien, and a court of equity undoubtedly has jurisdiction of an action to foreclose it. We think the court properly sustained the demurrer to the complaint of intervention, and that the judgment should be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

In re NEWMAN'S ESTATE. (No. 12,170.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1888.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—"ISSUE"—ADOPTED CHILD.

Civil Code Cal. § 1886, div. 1, relating to the rule of inheritance, provides: "If the decedent leave no surviving husband or wife, but leave issue, the whole estate goes to such issue; and if such issue shall consist of more than one child," etc. Held, the word "issue" is used in the same sense as "child," in this section; and sections 227 and 228 of the Code, relating to the status of adopted children, when construed with this section, will entitle an adopted child to succeed to the estate of the adopting parent.

2. JUDGMENT—DIVORCE—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PROOF OF SERVICE OF SUMMONS.

The validity of an adoption was sought to be impeached by showing that a judgment for divorce, which, if properly obtained, would only require the consent of the parent in custody of the child, was void, because of some irregularities in the proof of the service of the summons by publication, and that judgment was rendered before expiration of defendant's time for answering. Held, that the fact of service, and not the proof, gave the court jurisdiction, and that, after jurisdiction had been acquired and judgment rendered, the proceedings could not be attacked collaterally.¹

3. DIVORCE—DECREE—OPERATIVE ON DELIVERY TO CLERK.

In an action involving the question as to when a decree for divorce became binding upon the parties thereto, it appeared that the decree was signed by the judge, and delivered to the clerk for filing, who neglected to enter it for over a year. Held, that the decree became operative as to the parties from the date of its delivery to the clerk.

4. ADOPTION—ORDER—VALIDITY—SIGNED BY ACTING JUDGE.

An order for the adoption of a child, made by the court, and signed by an acting judge, was objected to, on the ground that it was not made and signed by the regular judge sitting in chambers. Held, this did not invalidate the order.

SEARLS, C. J., dissents.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM A. CHENEY, Judge.

¹Respecting the grounds on which a judgment may be collaterally attacked, see McCarter v. Neil, (Ark.) 6 S. W. Rep. 731, and note; Nicholson v. Nicholson, (Ind.) 15 N. E. Rep. 223; Decker v. Decker, (N. Y.) Id. 307.

Bernard Newman, a resident of Los Angeles county, died intestate on the 15th day of November, 1886. His estate is valued at $88,000. The next of kin of the deceased are his brother, Michael Newman, the appellant herein, and several nephews and nieces. It is claimed by the respondent that one George B. Maldonado, her child, aged two and one-half years, is the adopted son of the deceased. Mary Maldonado, the mother and guardian of said minor child, claims the right to letters of administration on said estate, under section 1368, Code Civil Proc. Said guardian filed her petition for letters on the 24th day of November, 1886. Appellant, Michael Newman, filed his petition on the 6th day of December, 1886, and also filed grounds of opposition to the petition of said Mary Maldonado; alleging, among other things, that George B. Maldonado is not the adopted child of the deceased, that said child is not entitled to succeed to said estate, that therefore his guardian is not entitled to letters, (section 1365, Code Civil Proc.,) and that said Mary Maldonado is a married woman. In his grounds of opposition, Michael Newman asserted his right to letters of administration. He further set out that the decree for divorce claimed by Mary Maldonado from her husband was void, because of certain irregularities in the proof of the service of the summons by publication, and that the judgment was rendered upon default before the expiration of the time allowed defendant in which to answer. He also asserted that the decree, if operative at all, did not become so until nearly six months after the adoption of the child. It appeared that the decree was duly signed by the judge, and delivered to the clerk for filing in October, 1885, who neglected to enter it until in January, 1887. The child was adopted in June, 1886. Newman claims the decree for divorce did not become binding on the parties until entered by the clerk in January, 1887; that as there was no consent of the father to the adoption, as required by law, in case the divorce was void, or did not become binding on the parties until January, 1887, there was therefore no valid adoption of the child, and the mother had no right to administration.

Matthew I. Sullivan and Stephen M. White, for appellant. Lucien Shaw and James M. Damron, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. 1. The provisions of the Civil Code bearing upon the first question presented for our consideration are the following:

"Sec. 227. The judge must make an order declaring that the child shall thenceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the person adopting.

"Sec. 228. A child adopted may take the family name of the person adopting. After adoption the two shall sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child, and have all the rights, and be subject to all the duties, of that relation."

"Sec. 1386. When any person having title to any estate dies without disposing of the estate by will, it is succeeded to, and must be distributed, in the following manner: (1) If the decedent leave no surviving husband or wife, but leave issue, the whole estate goes to such issue; and if such issue consists of more than one child living, or one child living and the lawful issue of one or more deceased children, then the estate goes in equal shares to the children living, or the child living, and the issue of the deceased child or children, by right of representation."

Under these provisions, we think that an adopted child is entitled to succeed by inheritance to the estate of the adopting parent. The provisions of sections 227 and 228 extend to all the rights and duties of natural parents and children. The language is general and comprehensive. The use of the word "issue," in section 1386, does not limit the right of inheritance to natural children only. That section prescribes the rule of inheritance. The word "issue" is there used in the same sense as the words "child" and "children." If the adopted child is, by virtue of its status, to be "regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the person adopting," and is to "have all the rights, and be subject to all the duties, of the legal relation of parent and child," the right to succeed to the estate of the deceased parent must be included. Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 491. See, also, Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 266.

2. So far as the action of Maldonado v. Maldonado affected the status of the parties and the custody of the child, it was a proceeding in rem, and service by publication in such cases is good. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714. The recital in the judgment that the defendant was duly served with process is consistent with the proof of service. It is the fact of service which gives the court jurisdiction, not the proof of service; and the court had authority to receive the amended affidavits of service after judgment, and before the roll was made up. Mason v. Messenger, 17 Iowa, 261; Richards v. Ladd, 4 Pac. Coast Law J. 52; Allison v. Thomas, 14 Pac. Rep. 309. The affidavits of service, and the recitals in the judgment, are conclusive. The affidavit on application for an order of publication, and the order of publication, cannot be considered. They are no part of the roll. Hahn v. Kelley, 34 Cal. 391; McCauley v. Fulton, 44 Cal. 355. Belcher v. Chambers, 53 Cal. 635, is not in point. In that case, as in Pennoyer v. Neff, the judgment considered was a personal judgment against a non-resident, without personal service or process. So far as the rule established in Hahn v. Kelley is applicable to proceedings in rem, it has not been overruled. The judgment referred to in that case was for money,—the deficiency after foreclosure and sale. The court had jurisdiction of the defendant, and the subsequent proceedings, from the time that publication of summons was complete. Code Civil Proc. 416. The fact that judgment was rendered upon default entered before the time allowing the defendant to answer had expired, rendered the judgment erroneous, simply, not void. A judgment thus rendered can be attacked only upon motion or by appeal, and by the parties in interest. Maldonado is the only party aggrieved by the decree, and he is the only one who can attack it in any way. Alderson v. Bell, 9 Cal. 321; Mitchell v. Aten, 14 Pac. Rep. 497.

3. It is contended that the order is void because it was made by the court, and not by the judge. The order appears to have been made in open court, but it is a written order, signed by the judge, and filed in the proceedings. The words "by this court," in the order, may be treated, we think, as surplusage. An order made by the judge at chambers, in a case requiring action by the court, may, for good reasons, be held to be invalid, but no such reasons can be urged in cases like this. The power which the judge might have exercised in his chambers was exercised in open court; and the fact that the clerk and sheriff were present cannot affect the validity of his judicial act.

4. The judge who signed the order—Honorable B. T. WILLIAMS, of Ventura county—had the same power as the judge of Los Angeles county, for whom he was acting. Section 71, Code Civil Proc. It must be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that he was acting upon the request of the governor, or of one of the judges of the superior court of Los Angeles county.

5. The decree was signed by the judge on October 19, and was filed with the clerk on October 22, 1885. Thus rendered, it was binding on the parties and privies, although not entered until January 5, 1887. The clerk could not, by his failure to perform a ministerial duty, abridge the rights of any party interested. Casement v. Ringgold, 28 Cal. 339; Gray v. Palmer, Id. 422. The order is affirmed.

PATENT BRICK CO. et al. v. MOORE et al. (No. 9,958.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1888.)

1. NEW TRIAL—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—STATEMENT OF CASE.

On the hearing of a motion for a new trial, where the statement of the case contained no specification of the particulars wherein the evidence was alleged to have been insufficient to justify the decision, the court below properly disregarded the statement as to that ground.

2. SAME—ERRORS OF LAW—FAILURE TO TAKE EXCEPTIONS.

Where it appears from the statement of the case that there were no exceptions whatever taken at any time during the trial to any act of the court, the court is justified in refusing to grant a new trial upon the ground that the decision is against the law.

3. SAME—ISSUES NOT RAISED AT TRIAL.

On a motion by defendant for a new trial, made on bill of exceptions and statement of the case, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, because a certain bond, introduced in evidence without objection, which appears in the statement of the case as signed by plaintiffs, as sureties for the contractors who built the building upon which the lien is claimed, containing an express stipulation that the building should be delivered clear of all liens, worked an equitable estoppel in pais, and prevented the foreclosure of plaintiffs' lien, held, that as there was nothing in the findings to indicate that such a clause existed in the bond, and no issue being made, based upon such a contention, the trial court, not being informed by the statement of the case that the defendant claimed the evidence derived from that clause in the bond did not justify the decision, was not bound to make a finding not responsive to the pleadings, and the motion for a new trial was properly refused.

4. DAMAGES—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—UNCERTAINTY OF ACTUAL DAMAGES.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1671, which provides that parties to a contract may agree upon an amount as liquidated damages when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable to fix the actual damages, taken in connection with section 1670, which provides that every contract by which the damages to be paid for a breach thereof is determined in anticipation is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in section 1671, a building contractors' bond, containing a stipulation that, if the building is not completed on a day certain, they should pay $100 for each day of delay as liquidated damages, does not of itself, in the absence of all other evidence upon the subject, make it clear that it would be impracticable to fix the actual damages resulting from the breach of a bond in not completing the building.

5. MECHANICS' LIENS—ATTORNEY'S FEE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien asked for an attorney's fee. The defendant, in his answer, did not claim that no fee should be allowed, but that a smaller fee than that asked for would be sufficient. Held, that the parties had left it to the discretion of the trial court to fix the amount, and his decision, having been judiciously made, will not be disturbed.

6. SAME—MATERIALS USED IN BUILDING—FINDINGS—APPEAL.

On appeal from a judgment in plaintiffs' favor, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, when the complaint states and the findings show that the materials furnished were sold to be used, and were used, upon the building, and that the claim was assigned to plaintiff, and the statement of the case cannot be examined to see if the evidence upon these points is sufficient, and from the record there does not appear to have been any exceptions taken, it will be presumed that the findings were based upon sufficient evidence.

7. SAME—ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIM—FINDING.

An allegation in the pleading that a claim was transferred and assigned in writing is an allegation of a matter of evidence, so far as the statement that it was in writing is concerned; and, when the findings show that the claim was assigned to plaintiff, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to show to the contrary, that the court found upon sufficient evidence that the claim was assigned in writing.

8. SAME—PERFORMANCE OF LABOR—FINDINGS.

From the findings in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, to the effect that plaintiff performed labor upon and in the construction of the building at the request of the contractors, it would appear, in the absence of anything to show to the contrary, that plaintiff, as a person, performed the labor upon the building, and was entitled to enforce his lien, having filed his claim under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, giving mechanics, material-men, etc., a lien for all labor performed or materials furnished by them, etc.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

The action of William Cronan, et al. v. The Mechanics' Institute and Charles P. Moore, et al. was commenced in July, 1882. Thereafter eight other suits were brought against the same defendants by the Patent Brick Company et al., Charles Hanson et al., A. Gennon et al., Fr. H. Rosenbaum, Asa R. Wells et al., Alpheus Kendall et al., Walter J. Weatherly, and Charles Williams. These nine actions were consolidated and tried together. Each of these actions was brought to foreclose mechanics' liens for materials furnished and work done for defendants Moore et al., contractors in the construction of a building for the Mechanics' Institute, known as the "Mechanics' Pavilion." In the contract it was provided that the building should be completed by the 10th of February, 1882, and the contractors were to pay $100 per day as liquidated damages for every day thereafter that the said work should remain unfinished. A bond was given by the contractors, signed by Hanson and Joost, plaintiffs in these suits, as sureties, containing the same provision. It was also provided that the building should be delivered over to the institute free and clear of all liens; that 75 per cent. of the appraised value of the work should be paid as the work progressed, and the residue 31 days after the entire work was completed and accepted. The contract price was $32,000. Defendants claimed a breach of the contract, and $6,000 damages, for failure to complete the contract, and also that the work was not done in a workman-like manner, in accordance with the terms of the contract, "whereby this defendant was damaged in the sum of eight thousand dollars." At the trial, the court awarded $2,000 damages, but did not allow liquidated damages, and, to save any question, found that defendants had suffered no damages by the alleged breach of the contract. The court found $6,482.60 due the contractors, and awarded the same to the plaintiffs proportionately, and their liens upon the land covered by the building were recognized and foreclosed. From a judgment overruling a motion for a new trial, made on a bill of exceptions and statement of the case, defendants appealed, assigning error.

Estee, Wilson & McCutcheon, for appellants. D. H. Whittemore, Arthur Rodgers, K. M. Smith, A. N. Drown, Culler & Eisner, Wm. H. H. Hart, Wm. H. Fifield, and Jarboe, Hornson & Goodfellow, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. Nine separate actions were instituted in the trial court for the foreclosure of mechanics' liens against certain property belong to the Mechanics' Institute, arising out of a building contract which the institute had entered into with Charles P. Moore et al. Those several actions were by order of court consolidated into one, and tried without a jury. Judgment of foreclosure in behalf of all the lien claimants was rendered; and from that, and an order refusing to grant a motion for a new trial, the Mechanics' Institute has appealed. The grounds upon which the motion for a new trial proceeded, as set out in the notice of intention, were: First, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision; second, that the decision is against law; third, errors in law, occurring on the trial, and excepted to by the defendant.

We will first consider the case as it affects the appellant and Charles Hanson et al., respondents. There is no specification in the statement of the case of the particulars wherein the evidence is alleged to have been insufficient to justify the decision; therefore the court below was obliged to disregard the statement as to that ground for a new trial.

As to the second ground, it appears from the statement that there was no exception whatever taken at any time during the trial to any act of the court; so that it was justified in refusing to grant a new trial upon that ground.

It is claimed for the appellant that the court should not have given a decision in favor of enforcing the lien of Hanson et al., and should not have rendered a judgment of foreclosure in their favor because a certain bond which appears in the statement of the case as signed by Hanson and one Joost, as sureties for C. P. Moore et al., (the contractors in the building of the institute,) contained an express stipulation that the building should be delivered over to the appellant free and clear of all liens. It is argued that inasmuch as Hanson and Joost signed such a bond as sureties, they cannot be allowed to foreclose a lien for materials furnished the contractors, Moore et al., which were used to complete the appellant's building. It is said that the clause in the bond above referred to worked as an equitable estoppel in pais, and prevented Hanson and Joost from foreclosing their alleged lien. There is nothing in the findings which indicates that any such clause existed in the bond, and there is no issue made by the pleadings based upon any such contention as is here made. As the trial court was not informed, in the statement of the case, that the appellant claimed the evidence to be derived from the recitations of that clause of the bond did not justify the decision, we cannot perceive how the court could have done otherwise than refuse a new trial because of the mere existence of such a clause in the bond, introduced in evidence.

But it is further argued that, although an estoppel in pais may not be properly pleaded, yet, where evidence tending to show such an estoppel is introduced without objection, that a verdict based thereon will not be disturbed; and from that it is argued that where such evidence is introduced in a case tried by the court without a jury, that a decision is against law if the trial court omits to make a finding thereon. The case of Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, is cited to us in support of that view. But we fail to see how it is applicable here. There the party waived his right to object to evidence not responsive to the issues made by the pleadings; and it was very properly held that it was a waiver of an existing right, and for that reason the verdict should not be disturbed, and the case was to be considered as if the estoppel had been pleaded. But we do not understand that it was held in that case that the trial court must make a finding based upon evidence not responsive to the issues made by the pleadings, even although such evidence may have been introduced on the trial without objection.

Again, it is urged that the court below was not justified in finding that the appellants had suffered no damage by reason of the delay in the construction of their building. It is said that the bond signed by Hanson and Joost contained a clause that if the building was not completed by a certain day, that they should pay $100 for each day of delay as liquidated damages. But, as we have before said, the court could not, on the motion for a new trial, consider that matter, because there was no specification filed wherein the evidence was alleged to be insufficient to support the decision. But it is pressed upon us that, as the findings show such a clause did exist in that bond, and that it was pleaded by the appellants, as against the right of the respondents to recover, it is apparent from the judgment roll that the court erred in its decision and judgment. We must take the language of the finding which sets out a recital of the bond, in considering this matter, as the error, if any, is to be determined on the judgment roll. It does not anywhere appear in the findings that, "from the nature of the case" in hand, it was "impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage" that would result from non-completion of the building by a certain date. Section 1671, Code Civil Proc. Nor does it appear anywhere in the judgment roll that such was the nature of the case. That being so, we cannot perceive how the contention of the appellant is maintainable, when we come to consider the language of the section supra, taken in connection with section 1670, Civil Code, which is as follows: "Every contract by which the amount of damage to be paid, or compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof, is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in the next section." As a matter of course, we do not mean to declare that there may not be cases where, from their very nature, (the point made by the appellants,) parties may themselves anticipate and fix liquidated damages to be recovered on a breach of contract, but it must always, as it seems to us, be demonstrated by satisfactory evidence that the case is one where such liquidated damages may, under the statute, be contracted for and recovered. In the present case there is nothing in the record to show that it was impracticable or extremely difficult to have fixed the actual damage which would result by the failure of the contractors to complete the building by the date mentioned in their contract. Certainly, the stipulation in the bond does not of itself, in the absence of all other evidence upon the subject, make it clear that it would be extremely difficult or impracticable to fix the actual damages that would result from a breach of the bond in not finishing the building by a certain date. It would appear, therefore, that the findings do support the decision, and that it was not against law, so far as it affects the rights of the appellants and Hanson and Joost.

Upon the matter of the allowance of an attorney's fee, the institute, in its answer, does not claim that no fee should be allowed, but simply claims that $250 would be a sufficient fee. It was therefore left by all parties to the discretion of the trial court to fix the amount of that fee, and we do not see but what it has been judiciously exercised.

It is claimed that the decree in favor of W. J. Weatherly was erroneously entered by the trial court; that the lien established in his favor is not valid, and cannot be enforced, because, as the appellant alleges, it does not appear that the material was expressly furnished for the building; that Whittier, Fuller & Co., who furnished the materials, had assigned it in writing to Weatherly; or that the bill or demand therefor was in writing. The statement of the case could not be examined to see if the evidence on these points was insufficient to justify the decision, because there were no particulars specified in which the evidence was alleged to be insufficient. There does not appear to have been any exception or objection taken to any action of the court during the trial. The findings show and the complaint states that the materials furnished by Whittier, Fuller & Co. were sold to be used, and were used, in the building, and that the claim was assigned and transferred to W. J. Weatherly by Whittier, Fuller & Co. We think that this finding, to the effect that materials were furnished to be used in the building, and were used in the construction and erection of the building, was sufficient taken with the allegations of the complaint as to those same matters, to bring this case within the rule laid down on the point in question in Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307; Bottomly v. Church, 2 Cal. 90. And when it is said, in the finding, that the claim was transferred and assigned to respondent, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to show to the contrary, that the court thus found upon sufficient evidence that the claim was assigned in writing. The rule laid down in Ritter v. Stevenson, 7 Cal. 388, cited to us to support the appellant's contention as to this matter, declares a rule of evidence, for in that case it affirmatively appeared that the assignment of the claim and lien was oral. In this case it does not anywhere appear that the assignment and transfer was oral; and when the court, in its finding, says it was transferred and assigned, it must be presumed that the evidence showed it to be a legal transfer and assignment in writing, since we are confined to the judgment roll in considering the question. Error on appeal must be affirmatively shown. Hayne, New Trials & App. § 241; Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 626. The assignment to Weatherly is pleaded in the same language as that of the findings, and this is sufficient. Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 140; Hayne, New Trials & App. § 242, subd. b. Findings should not consist of mere matters of evidence; and an allegation in the pleading that the claim was transferred and assigned in writing is an allegation of a matter of evidence, so far as the statement that it was in writing is concerned, and need not be found.

It is claimed that the court erred in finding that Charles Williams was entitled to a lien. We cannot examine the statement of the case to ascertain what the evidence was, because no specification of particulars wherein it was claimed to be insufficient to justify the decision was made by the appellant. We must look to the findings, then, to see what was the basis of Williams' claim to a lien upon the building. The finding is to the effect that Williams performed labor upon and in the construction of the building at the request of the contractors, and that the value thereof was $474.81. In the absence of anything to show to the contrary, it would appear from the finding that Williams, as a person, performed labor upon and in the construction of the building, and was therefore entitled to enforce his lien, the claim therefor having been duly filed under section 1183, Code Civil Proc., which is as follows: "Mechanics, material-men, contractors, sub-contractors, artisans, architects, machinists, builders, miners, and all persons and laborers of every class, performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in, the construction, alteration, or repair * * * of any building * * * or other structure, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials."

The appellant does not appear to question the validity of any other of the liens for which judgment was rendered. The further claim is made in its behalf that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that the findings are inconsistent, and cannot be harmonized, but we can see no force in the contention. Perceiving no prejudicial error in the record, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C. C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

EMERY v. MASON et al. (No. 9,715.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 2, 1888.)

EQUITY—ACCOUNTING—WHEN REFERENCE MAY BE REFUSED.

When an accounting is prayed, the court may itself take or state the account; and after ascertaining and declaring upon the evidence that there is no profit, return, money, or property acquired by the party whose estate was sought to be charged, under a contract set forth in the complaint, it is not error to refuse to refer the cause for the taking of an account.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

This was an action by the plaintiff, Joseph S. Emery, against Guadalupe Mason, Guadalupe Mason, administratrix of the estate of Charles G. Mason, deceased, and Juan Anastacio Mason, defendants, for the recovery of profits and proceeds of an alleged contract with Charles G. Mason for a prospecting tour. The superior court found the facts, and gave judgment for the defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Wilson, Otis & Roche, for appellant. Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for respondents.

MCKINSTRY, J. The appellant contends the facts of this case resemble those in the case of Harris v. Hillegass, 54 Cal. 463. But in Harris v. Hillegass the court below had sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and this court held the complaint stated a cause of action. In the case at bar the superior court overruled a demurrer to the complaint, and found upon evidence adversely to allegations of the complaint, which were denied by the answer.

The complaint avers that in consideration of money, provisions, and tools furnished by plaintiff to Charles G. Mason, under the prospecting contract, alleged in the complaint, between plaintiff and said Mason, and in pursuance of said contract, Charles G. Mason "entered upon and made the said prospecting tour; and from said money, tools, and provisions made and received for the common benefit and advantage of himself and said Emery, a large amount of issues, profits, and proceeds, and outgrowth thereof, and the profits derived therefrom, for the equal, common profit, benefit, and advantage of said Mason and said Emery, and, in pursuance of the undertaking and adventure aforesaid, bought, located, and acquired valuable mines of gold and silver and other property, real and personal, and large sums of money, as proceeds, issues, and profits thereof, of the exact character, value, or location of which, except as hereinafter stated, plaintiff is ignorant." The superior court found: "(2) That in pursuance of said agreement, the said plaintiff, on or about said last-named date, at said San Francisco, furnished and delivered to the said Mason the sum of $342 in money, and tools of the value of $45.98, and provisions of the value of $112.02; and the said Mason, in consideration thereof, entered upon said prospecting tour, and proceeded to said Santa Lucia mountains and prospected said marble quarry, and found the same valueless, and thereafter continued upon said prospecting tour without discovering, acquiring, or locating any mines or mine until about the 20th of October, 1863, when he arrived at San Luis Obispo, when he left the said tools, and abandoned the said prospecting tour, and proceeded thence to Arizona territory, when, after living a short time by hunting, he settled upon the Gila river, in Pinal county, A. T., where he took up a pre-emption claim, and engaged in farming, an occupation which he exclusively pursued, with a life of great hardship, poverty, and danger, for some eight or ten years, until about the 22d of March, 1875, when the Silver King mine, in Pinal county, A. T., was discovered by one of his neighbors, Isaac Copeland, and was located by Isaac Copeland, B. W. Reagan, W. H. Long, and said Charles G. Mason. (3) That said Charles G. Mason did not make or receive from said money, tools, or provisions, or any part thereof, or in any way, directly or indirectly, therefrom, either for the common benefit or advantage of himself and said Emery, or at all, any issues or profits or proceeds. That he never operated with said money or tools or provisions, or any part thereof, except to prospect said marble quarry; nor did he ever operate with the proceeds or outgrowth thereof, or with any part of the proceeds or outgrowth thereof, or with the profits derived therefrom, or with any part of the profits derived therefrom. That there never were any proceeds, outgrowth, or profits, either from said money, tools, or provisions, or any part thereof, or from said prospecting tour. (4) That said Charles G. Mason never did, in pursuance of the undertaking and adventure aforesaid, or under or in pursuance of said agreement, buy, locate, or acquire any mines or mine, valuable or otherwise, or any property of any kind, or any sum of money whatever, either as proceeds or as issues or as profits, or in any other way, directly or indirectly." The evidence sustained the findings.

It is insisted by appellant that, notwithstanding the findings, the superior court should have ordered an accounting; that the only way in which it could be ascertained that Charles G. Mason did not make or receive any advantageous benefit from the money, tools, and provisions supplied to him by the plaintiff was by an accounting. But, as the court found nothing was acquired during the prospecting tour, there was no necessity for a decretal order referring the cause for the taking of an account. Moreover, when an accounting is prayed, the court may itself take or state the account; and it would be difficult to state one in the present action more clearly than by ascertaining and declaring upon the evidence that there was no profit, return, money, or property acquired by the deceased under the contract set forth in the complaint, to be charged against him or his estate. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; PATERSON, J.

In re BARNES. (No. 11,756.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 2, 1883.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—MISCONDUCT—DISBARMENT—OFFERING MONEY FOR TESTIMONY.

An attorney, believing a certain paper to be a forgery, hired an expert to examine it. The expert expressed his doubt as to the forgery; and the attorney, supposing that the expert believed the paper a forgery, and only expressed doubt to extort money, offered him a large sum of money to testify in regard to the forgery. Held, that such conduct was subject to criticism, but not sufficient ground for disbarment.

2. SAME—PROCURING PERSON TO STEAL PAPERS—EVIDENCE.

The respondent was charged with procuring one to steal a paper, but the only evidence against him was the testimony of the party who lost the paper that the person who stole it said that respondent had hired him to steal it. Held, that such statement was not evidence, and the respondent could not be disbarred on the charge.

In bank. Application to disbar.

This was an application to disbar W. H. L. Barnes, upon accusations preferred by James L. Crittenden, complainant. The respondent, Barnes, is charged in and by the complaint—First, with having “been guilty of the violation of his oath as an attorney and counselor at law;” secondly, with having “been guilty of the violation of his duty as an attorney and counselor at law;” thirdly, with having been guilty of “corrupt practices, tending to degrade and defeat the due administration of justice.” The complaint further specifies two instances wherein said Barnes was guilty as alleged, to-wit: First. That said Barnes, after M. Gumpel had informed him that certain letters and a contract of marriage introduced in evidence in the case of Sharon v. Sharon were written and signed by William Sharon, in his opinion, and that he (M. Gumpel) could not testify in favor of William Sharon, and against the genuineness of said letters and contract, “willfully and corruptly tried to induce said M. Gumpel to commit perjury, and swear that the signature of said Sharon to said contract was not his genuine signature, and that said letters were not written or signed by said Sharon, and willfully and corruptly offered to pay said M. Gumpel a large sum of money if said M. Gumpel would so swear, which said M. Gumpel declined to do.” Secondly. That respondent, Barnes, requested one McLaughlin, the clerk of George W. Tyler, to go to the office of said Tyler and procure a written contract which he (Barnes) supposed to have been made between George W. Tyler and M. Gumpel, and to take it and deliver it to him, (Barnes,) for money which he (Barnes) promised to pay; and that said McLaughlin, in order to earn the money so corruptly offered him by said Barnes, went to the office of said Tyler in the night-time, in the absence of Tyler, and stole therefrom a private paper belonging to Tyler, purporting to be such contract, and delivered the same to said Barnes, who paid said McLaughlin therefor the sum of $25,000; and that said Barnes paid said money to said McLaughlin for said contract with the corrupt intent to use the same in evidence in the suit of Sharon v. Sharon; and that said Barnes did afterwards use said paper as evidence in said suit of Sharon v. Sharon. The respondent pleads not guilty to these charges.

James L. Crittenden, for complainant. John H. Curry, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. I think the accusation should be dismissed. As to the first specification, the charge as made has not been established by evidence which satisfies my judgment. It does appear, however, that Gumpel was employed by the defendant in the case of Sharon v. Sharon to examine the alleged marriage contract, with the expectation that he would be called as a witness if his opinion was favorable. After the examination had been made, the respondent was induced to believe the result favorable to his wishes, and Gum-pel was paid $1,500 on account. Gumpel from the first talked of his poverty, of his urgent need for money, and insisted that it was a great case, and he expected to be liberally paid, and that there should be an agreement that his bill should be paid whatever it might be, and sometimes argued against the views of respondent in regard to the genuineness of the signature. Respondent, however, never supposed that Gumpel had any doubts as to the question of forgery, but thought he was merely attempting to get more money. Nevertheless, he continued to rely upon Gumpel, and paid him some money after this evidence of venality, and even intimated that he would probably be satisfied as to his compensation. Now, it must be borne in mind that Gumpel was employed to assist and advise the defense. On any other hypothesis the sum he had already received would be extortionate, or must have been received for the testimony he was to give. However much it may be regretted, we know that experts are often employed and paid large sums for their services, and practically for their testimony; for it often requires labor as well as skill to examine and determine the question upon which an opinion is to be given, and sometimes to prepare an effective exhibit of the facts for the court. The money paid was understood by both parties to be for such services, and I do not believe that Barnes thought that the money would cause the witness to change his opinion or his evidence as to the genuineness of the signature. The respondent knew, or thought he did, that the signature was a forgery, and he seems never to have doubted that Gumpel was of the same opinion, and he regarded, as he well might, the occasional arguments of the witness on the other side as mere intimations that he wanted some money. Under such circumstances, no doubt, it would have been more in accordance with exalted ideas of propriety for Barnes to have denounced the witness, and dismissed him, but I doubt whether many practitioners would have acted very differently from the course of the respondent. Lawyers meet and are compelled to contend with all sorts of people. They have in their hands the interests of their client, and they should not permit him to lose the benefit of important testimony upon any refined ideas of propriety. Frequently witnesses whose testimony is essential know the value of their position, and too often attempt to realize upon it. It is a trying thing for an attorney to be placed in a situation where he must deal with such a witness; and, while an honorable attorney would be careful to make no payments or promises which could affect the truthfulness of the evidence, all would try to retain the witness, however much he would be compelled to despise him. I have considered the matter entirely from the stand-point of the respondent; and while I think his conduct, according to his own testimony, may justly be criticised, I do not think it sufficient ground for a disbarment.

As to the other charge, it is still more proper to regard it entirely as the facts appeared to the respondent. He is not more guilty than he would have been had the document been genuine, and availed to expose the forgery of the signature of Sharon, and that it was being supported by perjured testimony. The denouement,—the discomfiture of Barnes,—showing that he had been duped, must be left out of view. If the facts had proven to be as he believed they were, and the result as he anticipated, most people, I think, would have applauded his conduct. There is no evidence in this record to show that Barnes advised McLaughlin to steal the paper, or induced him in any way to take it from the custody of Tyler. That idea is founded, so far as this case is concerned, entirely upon the statements of Tyler as to what McLaughlin told him. That, of course, is not evidence, and, in my judgment, not worthy of credence if it were. Had that fact appeared by legal and creditable evidence, I agree that Barnes' position would be indefensible. It is bad enough, no doubt, as it is. But detective work must be judged by an ethics of its own. It is deemed proper to deceive and practice stratagems upon a public enemy, and the criminal is the common enemy of all. I concur in discharging the accused, while regretting that one so high in the profession should have been guilty of conduct which requires explanation.

I think the respondent should neither be disbarred nor suspended. It is fair to repeat that all the facts have been viewed as I think they appeared to respondent. The allusions to Gumpel must be understood in that light. The accusation is dismissed.

McFARLAND, J., SHARPSTEIN, J., and PATERSON, J. We concur in the judgment, because, in our opinion, the evidence utterly fails to show any conduct on the part of respondent for which he should either be disbarred or suspended.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the conclusion reached in Justice TEMPLE's opinion on the second specification of the accusation, which relates to the Tyler-Gumpel contract. I do not concur in the conclusion reached as to the first specification.

SEARLS, C. J., was not present at the hearing, and did not participate in the decision.

BOYLE v. SOLSTIEN et al. (No. 11,665.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1888.)

JUDGMENT—BY DEFAULT—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

To set aside a judgment by default on motion and affidavits showing that defendant's attorney had suddenly died, and that defendant himself had no knowledge of the case, is not an abuse of the court's discretion.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

John Boyle sued H. A. Solstien and J. A. Arden, executors of Patrick Foley. Judgment against defendant by default, proper service having been made. On motion and affidavits, after notice to plaintiff, the same was set aside, and defendant allowed to plead, on the ground of excusable surprise, inadvertence, and neglect, in that defendant's attorney in charge of the case had suddenly died, and defendant himself had no knowledge of it. From this order plaintiff appeals.

J. M. Wood, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The court did not abuse its discretion in granting the motion to set aside the default and judgment. Order affirmed.

In re TURNER. (No. 20,401.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 8, 1888.)

CRIMINAL LAW—JUDGMENT—VALIDITY—HABEAS CORPUS.

In an application for a writ of habeas corpus, petitioner had been convicted of a misdemeanor. The complaint showed the date of the offense, and charged that it was done feloniously, but these facts did not appear in the judgment of conviction. The justice's docket showed plea of not guilty, waiver of jury, date of trial, issuance of subpoenas, examination of witnesses, argument of counsel, submission to the court, and the finding that defendant was guilty as charged. Held, that the judgment was not void, and that the writ of habeas corpus would not lie.¹

Application of Henry Turner for writ of habeas corpus. Conviction had in justice's court, city of Stockton, San Joaquin county; J. H. TAM, Judge. A. L. Levinsky, for petitioner. Jas. H. Budd, City Atty., for the People.

¹Respecting the office of the writ of habeas corpus, see Barton v. Sanders, (Or.) post, 921, and note.

PATERSON, J. The complaint upon which the petitioner was arrested, tried, and convicted, charged that "said Henry Turner committed the crime of petit larceny, a misdemeanor, as follows, to-wit: The said Henry Turner, on or about the 13th day of February, 1888, at the city of Stockton, county of San Joaquin and state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously steal, take, and carry away certain faucets, tube-scrapers, thumb and screw wrenches, and old pipe and pipe connections, of the value of $4, gold coin of the United States of America, the same being then and there the personal property of the state of California." The return of the sheriff shows that the petitioner is held in custody by virtue of a certified copy of the judgment of the police court, the material portion of which is as follows: "Whereas the said Henry Turner, having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of willfully and unlawfully stealing, taking, and carrying away certain personal property, the same being the property of the state of California, and of the value of $4, or thereabouts,—a misdemeanor,—it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said defendant be punished by a fine of $80, and, in default of the payment of such fine, that he be imprisoned in the county jail of San Joaquin county, California, until said fine is satisfied; said imprisonment to be at the rate of one day for each two dollars of said fine."

Counsel for petitioner has made a very ingenious argument on behalf of his client, but has failed to convince me that the judgment is void. The distinction between a void and a voidable judgment is sometimes very nice, and the judgment will fall under the one class or the other accordingly as it is regarded for different purposes. In some of the cases cited the commitments were for the purpose of holding the defendant to answer. After trial and conviction the commitment is of a higher dignity than an ordinary commitment holding to answer. This is true with courts, both of special or limited jurisdiction, and those of general jurisdiction. The judgment of a court of inferior jurisdiction is, to a great extent, beyond the reach of collateral attack by the writ of habeas corpus, as the judgments of higher courts are. Church, Hab. Corp. § 240. "In no case can the writ of habeas corpus be used as a writ of error. Mere error in the judgment or proceedings under and by virtue of which the party is imprisoned, constitutes no ground for the issuance of the writ, and it is well settled by both the state and federal courts that a judgment or sentence cannot be assailed on habeas corpus, if it is merely erroneous, the court having given a wrong judgment when it had jurisdiction of the person and the subject-matter." Church, Hab. Corp. § 372; Willis v. Bayles, 105 Ind. 371, 5 N. E. Rep. 8. The case of Ex parte Ah Cha, 40 Cal. 426, cited by petitioner, was overruled in Ex parte Max, 44 Cal. 580, where it was held that if the complaint was in all respects sufficient, and the offense of which the petitioner was convicted was one within the scope of the indictment, and the judgment one which the court had the authority to render upon the appearance and plea, there was jurisdiction, and all other questions were matters of mere error, which could not be inquired into upon the writ of habeas corpus.

It is contended that the judgment before us is void because it fails to state all the necessary elements,—the word "feloniously" and the date being omitted,—and that, therefore, the judgment would be no protection to the defendant upon another charge for the same offense alleged in the complaint. But, if the petitioner should ever have the misfortune to require evidence in support of such a plea of former conviction, he will be entitled to the whole record, and not simply to the judgment. Ex parte Ring, 28 Cal. 253. He will be entitled to introduce in evidence in support of that plea, not only the judgment, but the complaint, and the docket of the justice. The entries in the docket of the police judge show clearly a plea of not guilty, waiver of jury trial, date of trial, issuance of subpoenas, examination of witnesses, argument of counsel, and submission of the cause. It then recites: "The court finds the defendant guilty as charged, and, he having waived time for sentence, and no cause being shown, the court renders its judgment that, whereas," etc. The failure of the court to state the elements of the crime in the judgment as fully as they were necessarily stated in the complaint does not render the judgment void. The offense is sufficiently designated in the judgment. To entitle the petitioner to a discharge we must necessarily assume that the record of conviction fails to show the commission of any offense. To reach this conclusion we should have to resort to a hypercritical, overnice, and technical examination of the commitment, convert the writ of habeas corpus into a writ of error, and defeat the ends of justice.

Petitioner is remanded.

STANFORD v. FELT et al. (No. 8,117.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 30, 1886.)

1. TRIAL—VIEW OF PREMISES BY TRIAL JUDGE—FACTS DISCOVERED BY, ON INSPECTION.

Where the findings of the court below that no return of surplus water had been made to the stream, after diversion and use, appeared to be based on the testimony in the cause, and on facts discovered by the judge on inspection of the premises, held, that a judgment based on such finding could not be sustained.

2. RIPARIAN RIGHTS—REASONABLE USE OF WATER—QUESTION OF FACT.

A riparian proprietor is allowed to make a reasonable use and detention of the waters of a stream for domestic and other purposes; and whether such use and detention is reasonable or not is a question of fact for the court below.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county.

Action brought by Leland Stanford against J. J. Felt and another to restrain the diversion and detention of the waters of Trancos creek. In the district court of the Twelfth judicial district, San Mateo county, judgment was given for the plaintiff, and the superior court of that county refused to grant a new trial; whereupon defendants appeal.

Edward J. Pringle and P. J. Galpin, for appellants. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. By the common law of England, the right of the riparian proprietor to the flow of a stream is inseparably annexed to the soil, and passes with it, not as an easement or appurtenance, but as part and parcel of it. Use does not create the right, and disuse cannot destroy or suspend it. The right of such proprietor extends to the natural and usual flow of all the water of the stream, unless when the quantity has been diminished as a consequence of the reasonable use or appropriation of it by other riparian owners for proper and legitimate purposes. Ferrea v. Knipe, 28 Cal. 340, 87 Amer. Dec. 128; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. Rep. 674. The uses by the riparian owner of the water for domestic purposes, for irrigation, and for the propulsion of machinery, are recognized as proper and legitimate purposes. This we regard as the law of this state. See Ferrea v. Knipe and Lux v. Haggin, supra. It appears to be law that where all the water of a stream is needed for domestic purposes, and for watering cattle, and is thus consumed by one proprietor, the law allows such use. But, in making such reasonable use of water, such proprietor must return the surplus which remains after such use to the natural channel of the stream, (Dilling v. Murray, 6 Ind. 324, 63 Amer. Dec. 385; 3 Kent. Comm. 439; Miller v. Miller, 9 Pa. St. 74, 49 Amer. Dec. 545; Gould, Wat. § 213;) and, if this is not done, the diversion will be restrained at the suit of a riparian owner below. Nor is the owner lower down the stream required to show, in order to procure an injunction, any actual present damage. The diversion by lapse of time may grow into a right. Crandall v. Woods, 8 Cal. 136; American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 361; Gould, Wat. § 214; Moore v. Water-Works, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. Rep. 816; Navigation Co. v. Water-Works Co., L. R. 9 Ch. 451, L. R. 7 H. L.

697. To prevent such result, an injunction will be awarded. Parker v. Griswold, 17 Conn. 288, affirming Chapman v. Manufacturing Co., 13 Conn. 269. It appears from the findings in this case that water has been diverted from the stream on which both plaintiff and defendants are riparian proprietors, but as to the fact whether it has been returned or not the finding is as follows: "That except by natural gravitation, and in the summer time over dry lands, no means of returning water diverted from the said Trancos creek to its bed has ever existed, and none are provided by the defendant Felt. That no return of any water so diverted as aforesaid is, or ever has been usually made; and, from personal inspection of the premises, I am satisfied that in the dry season of the year no such return of said waters has ever been made, and that none can be made under existing circumstances, except by so opening the defendant Felt's reservoir, or the short six-inch pipe which passes through the head thereof, and above mentioned, so as to rapidly exhaust its contents, and render it practically of no use, and a source of inconvenience, if not injury, to the use of his property. At all events, from my inspection of the premises, it is evident that while the outer end of the discharge pipe from said reservoir was open on the day I visited the premises, and was then discharging a torrent of water through the defendant Felt's lands in the direction of the Trancos creek, which plowed the ground, and made traveling uncomfortable, there had been no such previous customary discharge, and there was no visible indication of any connection or habitual flow between the waters of the reservoir and the bed of the creek ever having been maintained at any time. And I find as a fact that no return of discharged water, or any portion of it, has been usually made to the bed of the creek by the defendant Felt." From the language employed here, it is left in doubt whether the finding "that no return of any water so diverted as aforesaid is, or ever has been, usually made," is based on the testimony given in the case, or on facts ascertained by the personal inspection of the premises by the learned judge who made the finding. In such a state of the case, ought a judgment based on a diversion, and no return of the water diverted, (for such is the character of the judgment here,) to be rendered?

In Wright v. Carpenter, 49 Cal. 609, it was held that an instruction which authorized the jury to take into consideration the result of their own examination of the land in controversy, which they were sent by the court to inspect, in determining its character as swamp and overflowed or otherwise, was erroneous. The court made the following observations in regard to the instruction: "In authorizing the court to send the jury to view the premises in litigation it was not the purpose of the statute to convert the jurors into silent witnesses, acting on their own inspection of the land, but only to enable them the more clearly to understand and apply the evidence. If the rule were otherwise, the jury might base its verdict wholly on its own inspection of the premises, regardless of an overwhelming weight of evidence to the contrary, and the losing party would be without a remedy by motion for a new trial. It would be impossible to determine how much weight was due to the inspection by the jury, as contrasted with the opposing evidence, or (treating the inspection as in the nature of evidence) whether it was sufficient to raise a substantial conflict in the evidence. The cause would be determined, not upon evidence given in court, to be discussed by counsel and considered by the court in deciding a motion for a new trial, but upon the opinions of the jurors, founded on a personal inspection, the value or the accuracy of which there would be no method of ascertaining." See, also, Wright v. Carpenter, 50 Cal. 556. The reasons above given which render it error for a jury to base its verdict on evidence derived from a personal inspection of the land involved in the action tried before them are equally cogent when applied to a judge making such inspection. The findings of fact made should be upon the oral and documentary testimony introduced at the trial, and not on any fact ascertained by the judge of the court on an examination of the premises involved in the controversy. As the finding above quoted may and appears to have been on the testimony in the cause, and on facts discovered by the judge on the inspection above referred to, we cannot regard it as a finding that the water diverted has not been returned as the law requires. In such a state of the case, a judgment which is manifestly based on the fact that the water has been diverted, and not returned, cannot be regarded as proper.

It may be contended from some of the other findings that the water has been detained for some space of time, but, as the defendant Felt is a riparian proprietor, he has a right to such a reasonable detention of the water in the use of it. The reasonableness of the detention is involved in the question of reasonable use. Whether the use of water is reasonable or not is always a question of fact, to be determined by the court below. Whether, then, the water is reasonably or unreasonably detained, must be a question of fact; and all such questions are to be determined by the tribunal above mentioned. Whether Felt, in using the water, has made an unreasonable detention of it, has not been clearly and distinctly found; and in this state of the case this court cannot act upon it as a fact in the cause. It must be remembered that no injunction can be awarded which can deprive the defendant of the reasonable use of the water for domestic purposes and for the support of life.

For the reasons given above the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Ordered accordingly.

McKINSTRY, J., MYRICK, J., and SHARPSTEIN, J., (concurring.) We concur in the judgment. In our opinion the findings are too uncertain and indefinite to sustain the judgment of the court below.

WINTERHALTER v. WORKMEN'S GUARANTEE FUND ASS'N OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 9,913.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1888.)

INSURANCE—ACTIONS ON POLICY—EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—RIGHT TO SUE.

The executor of a testator, who, by his will, gave all of his estate after payment of his debts to his mother, is the proper party to sue for and receive the money due on a policy of insurance on testator's life, payable subject to the will of the insured.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Marcus Rosenthal, for respondent. J. G. Severance and Wm. Loewy, for appellants.

v.17p.no.1—1

SEARLS, C. J. Defendant is a corporation, and on the 16th day of March, 1880, plaintiff's testator, Fritz Hoffmeister, became a member of such corporation, and for a valuable consideration received therefrom its certain promise, agreement, and certificate in writing, in the words and figures following, viz.: "WORKMEN'S GUARANTEE FUND ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., No. 69.

"This is to certify that Fritz Hoffmeister is a member of the Workmen's Guarantee Fund Association of San Francisco, Cal., and as such is entitled to participate in the guarantee fund, to the extent of $1 to each member of said association in good standing at the death of said Fritz Hoffmeister, provided the number of members at that time shall not exceed 1,000. Said sum of $1,000 or less, at his death, shall be paid to ———, subject to his will. This certificate is issued upon the expressed condition that said Fritz Hoffmeister shall comply with all the laws, rules, and requirements which are now or may be hereafter enacted by the Workmen's Guarantee Fund Association. In witness whereof, the Workmen's Guarantee Fund Association has caused this certificate to be signed by its president and secretary, and the seal to be attested this 16th day of March, one thousand eight hundred and eighty.

"WORKMEN'S GUARANTEE FUND ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
[Seal Corporation.] "P. VEASEY, Vice-President.

"E. M. READING, Secretary."

Hoffmeister never filled the blank in the certificate by inserting the name of a beneficiary, but died on the 4th day of October, 1882, leaving a last will whereby he gave, devised, and bequeathed to his mother, Louisa Hoffmeister, after payment of all his debts and liabilities, all his estate and effects. Plaintiff was named as executor of the will, which has been regularly admitted to probate, etc. Defendant answered, admitting its liability to the extent of $1,000, but claimed that testator had, by his last will, designated his mother, Louisa Hoffmeister, as his beneficiary, and the person to whom said sum should be paid in the event of his death, and asked that said Louisa be made a party to the action, which was done. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. The articles of association of the defendant provide: "(2) That the purposes for which it is formed are to provide for the payment to the widow, heirs, and legatees of each deceased member thereof, a stipulated sum of money, by contributions from surviving members upon assessments duly made therefor." The constitution of defendant, article 2, provides as follows: "Art. 2. The object of this association is to provide for the payment to the husband, widow, heirs, or legatees of a deceased member, a stipulated sum of money, by contributions from its surviving members upon assessments duly made therefor." The defense also introduced the following in evidence: "The application of intestate for membership in the association contained the following clause: 'I hereby authorize and direct that the amount of said guarantee fund to which I may be entitled shall, at my death, be paid subject to my will.'"

The question presented for determination upon the facts is this: Is the executor entitled to recover the sum due decedent, or does it go directly to his mother, Louisa Hoffmeister? It may be stated that, where a policy of life insurance expressly designates a person as entitled to receive the insurance money, such designation is conclusive, in the absence of some question as to the rights of creditors. The receipt of the person designated will discharge the insurer, and he may sue for and recover the amount due at the maturity of the policy. In such cases the legal representative of the insured has no claim upon the money, and cannot maintain an action therefor. It forms no part of the assets of the estate of the insured. The exceptions to this rule, involving the rights of creditors, are not involved in this case, and need not be commented upon. Bliss, Ins. §§ 316, 317. The policy in the present instance, as will be seen, did not specifically name the beneficiary; it was to be paid "subject to my will;" that is to say, subject to the will of the insured. Whether the term quoted should be interpreted as meaning subject to the last will and testament of the insured, or in the broader sense of subject to his will as expressed by inserting the name of the beneficiary in the blank space left in the policy, apparently for that purpose, need not concern us here, as such blank was never filled. Nor was there any special designation of the mother of deceased as the beneficiary of the amount to be realized on this policy in the will of the deceased, except that all of his property was bequeathed to her after the payment of his debts and liabilities. He left no widow, and we may suppose that, had he left no last will, the sum for which he was insured would, under the articles of association and the constitution of defendant, quoted above, have gone to his heirs. Either this result must follow in such a case, or the policy be held to have lapsed for want of a beneficiary. Such a contingency cannot arise in any event here, for defendant admits its liability, has paid the money into court, and only asks that the question as to the right of the two claimants may be determined, so as to absolve it from liability. Had the testator in his last will specifically nominated his mother as the recipient of the sum to fall due upon his death, it might be contended, alike upon reason and authority, that, under his contract with defendant, she alone was entitled to recover. The undertaking of the corporation defendant was to pay not exceeding $1,000, subject to the will of deceased. That will, as expressed, is that this sum, in common with all his property, "after payment of all his debts and liabilities," shall go to his mother, Louisa Hoffmeister. It is true that by subdivision 10 of section 690 of our Code of Civil Procedure, this money is not subject to execution and forced sale. So, too, in case of the death of a husband, the probate court may set aside for the use of his family the property exempt from execution, but these provisions cut no figure here, as there is not, so far as appears, any family. The simple fact is that testator has bequeathed the fund in question to his mother, subject to the payment of his debts, and as these debts can only be paid through the interposition of his executor, the court below was correct in its conclusion that the executor was a proper party to have and recover the fund out of which such debts, if any, were to be paid. The executor is the trustee of an express trust, and, as such, under our Code, may sue without uniting with him those beneficially interested. Code Civil Proc. § 369.

We have examined the several decisions quoted from various states in appellant's brief. Most of them depend upon the peculiar statutes of the states in which they were rendered, which are different from our own, and, while we are in accord with most of the reasoning of those cases, we are still of opinion the peculiar facts of this case are sufficient to differentiate it from those referred to. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ELLIS v. BRADBURY. (No. 9,725.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1888.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—LEASES—COVENANT TO PAY TAXES—ACTION ON—PLEADING.
In a suit brought by a lessor for the recovery of taxes paid by him on demised premises which, by the terms of the lease were to be paid by the lessee, it is not necessary to specifically set forth in the complaint the steps necessary to constitute a valid assessment.
2. SAME—ACTION AGAINST SUBLESSEE—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.
In a suit by a lessor against a sublessee of a portion of the demised premises, where the lease bound the lessee to pay taxes, for taxes paid by the lessor, it is exror to render judgment in favor of the plaintiff for an amount in the same proportion to the tax on the whole tract that the sublet portion bears to said tract, without reference to the proportionate value of the tracts.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Complaint by Moses Ellis against W. B. Bradbury. Ellis leased certain real estate to Tyler, who agreed in the lease to pay, as the same became due, all taxes levied on the demised premises or any tract thereof levied by any lawful authority during the demised term, and, if paid by the lessor, should be repaid to him by the lessee. Tyler assigned his interest under said lease in a part of said demised premises to Bradbury, who failed to pay the taxes, and the same were paid by the lessor, who brings this suit to recover a proportionate part of the total tax on said premises. The demised tract was assessed as a whole at the same amount per front foot, and the improvements thereon were assessed separately. The portion sublet to Bradbury had a less depth than the remaining portion. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for an amount in the same proportion to the total tax as the assignee's portion bears to the whole tract. Defendant appeals.

Joseph R. Brandon, for appellant. T. C. Van Ness, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Plaintiff, by indenture in writing, leased to Samuel Tyler certain lots of land in San Francisco for a term of 15 years. The lessee covenanted to pay all taxes levied or imposed upon said premises or any part thereof, or upon the owner on account thereof. The lessee assigned all his right, title, and interest in said indenture as to a portion of one of said lots leased, to the defendant, Bradbury. This action is to recover a proportion of the taxes on the whole lot, levied after such assignment, and alleged to have been paid by plaintiff under authority given in the lease. In addition to the covenant on the part of the tenant to pay the taxes when they became due, the lease provides that, "if any of said taxes, charges, assessments, or impositions should become due and payable and remain unpaid, and the said demised property should be offered for sale, then the party of the first part may pay the same; or, if said premises, or any part thereof, should be sold, then the party of the first part may redeem the property so sold therefrom; and all sums of money by said party of the first part paid as aforesaid shall be repaid by the party of the second part within ten days, with interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per month." To this complaint a general demurrer was interposed, and the point is made that the steps necessary to constitute a valid assessment are not specifically set forth. It is alleged in general terms that the whole of the lot in question was assessed for state and county taxes, and that the proportionate amount of taxes due upon the portion sublet to defendant is a certain sum.

This suit is upon a covenant in the lease, and the assessment is a collateral matter. Under such circumstances we think the complaint not obnoxious to a general demurrer. We think the covenant was one running with the land, and was divisible, but we think the method adopted to ascertain the proportionate tax upon the portion sublet was clearly erroneous. Property is assessed in proportion to its value, and the division should be made on that basis. The court cannot assume that each portion of the lot had the same value per front foot; especially where, as in this case, the portion sublet had less depth than the remaining portion. Upon this question the method followed by the assessor was an entirely immaterial circumstance. That might or might not be a correct mode of ascertaining the value of the whole lot; but it would not follow that it would be a proper criterion of the relative value of the portion sublet to defendant. Defendant is not sued upon the covenant for allowing the tax to become delinquent, or a sale of the property to be made. The action is for money laid out and expended for his use; and, since it was his duty to pay when it became due and payable, and the lessor had an interest in its payment, we think he could recover it with interest, after demand. The case will have to be reversed, however, for the error above specified.

Judgment and order reversed, and new trial ordered.

DUNPHY v. HEINMANN. (No. 11,189.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 15, 1888.)

APPEAL—FRIVOLOUS.

Where the finding in ejectment is that defendant did not "wrongfully or unlawfully enter upon or oust plaintiff" from the possession of the premises, an appeal on the ground that there was no finding upon the issue as to ouster is frivolous.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Ejectment by William Dunphy, plaintiff, against Fritz Heinmann, defendant. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Wm. H. Webb, for appellant. Geil & Morehouse, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from the judgment. The only point made is that there was no finding upon the issue as to ouster. It is found that plaintiff was not at any time the owner of the premises, or entitled to the possession thereof or any part of the same, "nor did defendant, during any of said time, wrongfully or unlawfully enter upon or oust the plaintiff therefrom, nor then nor now wrongfully withhold the same or any part thereof from plaintiff." This appeal was evidently not taken in good faith, and is frivolous.

Judgment affirmed, with $50 damages for taking a frivolous appeal.

(Supreme Court of California. March 16, 1888.)

WILL—CONTEST—ATTORNEY'S FEE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The appointment of an attorney for absent heirs in the contest of a will, and the allowance to him of a fee, to be paid by the estate, are matters entirely within the discretion of the probate court; and if such allowance be improvident or indiscreet, the court may vacate it at the suggestion of any one, or upon its own motion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

M. C. Baum, pro se. H. Wilkins and J. M. Chretien, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. At the hearing of the petition for the probate of the will of the deceased, the appellant, M. C. Baum, appeared and contested the same for certain absent heirs. So far as we can learn from the very meager record this contest took place in August, 1886. He was not appointed by the court to represent said heirs at the hearing of the petition for the probate of the will, and it seems that he had no authority from said heirs to appear for them. Afterwards, on April 11, 1887, when, for aught that appears, the contest had been determined, the court made an order "nunc pro tunc as of the 2d day of August, 1886," appointing appellant attorney for said absent heirs; and on May 3, 1887, the court made another order directing the executors of the estate to pay said appellant $800, "as such attorney, and under order of court, nunc pro tunc as of August 2, 1886." On June 6, 1887, on motion of the residuary legatee, and upon notice to appellant and the executors, the court made an order vacating and setting aside both of said orders above mentioned. From this order appellant appeals, and also from an order overruling certain objections to the appearance of the said legatee.

Waiving the questions whether or not the order appealed from was an appealable order, and whether or not there was power in the court to make the nunc pro tunc order at all, and whether or not the residuary legatee could rightfully appear and make the motion to vacate, still we think that the appointment of an attorney for absent heirs, and the allowance to him of a fee, are matters entirely within the discretion of the probate court, and that if such allowance be improvident or indiscreet, the court may vacate it, at the suggestion of any one, or upon its own motion. Orders affirmed.

HEILBRON et al. v. LAST CHANCE WATER DITCH CO. (No. 11,391.)

(Supreme Court of California. February 15, 1888.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ADVERSE USER—LEASED PREMISES.

In an action brought by the lessees to restrain defendant from diverting water from a natural water-course which flowed over the leased land, the defense was adverse user of the water diverted for more than five years prior to the commencement of the suit, and the statute of limitations. Held, that even if it were the law that the lessor could not bring such suit while the land was in possession of the lessees, yet if, after the adverse user had commenced, the term of the lease had expired, thus giving the lessor the right of possession, he could not continue to make new leases, and thus indefinitely postpone the running of the statute of limitations.

2. SAME—FAILURE OF LESSOR TO SUE—LESSEE ALSO BARRED.

The land was all the time in the possession of lessees. Held that, under Civil Code Cal. § 826, which provides that "a person having an estate in fee, in remainder, or reversion, may maintain an action for any injury done to the inheritance, notwithstanding an intervening estate for life or years," the lessor could have maintained an action against defendant for the alleged diversion at any time within five years after it commenced, and not having done so, he and the plaintiffs, lessees, were barred, and defendant acquired title by adverse user.

v.17p.no.2—5

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

McAllister & Bergin, D. S. Terry, and Brown & Daggett, for appellants. Bronson & Wells, Atwell & Bradley, and Wells, Van Dyke & Lee, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action to restrain defendant (a corporation) from diverting water from a natural water-course called "King's River," and for damages for past diversion. The court below, sitting without a jury, gave judgment for defendant, and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal. The plaintiffs, who are August Heilbron, Adolph Heilbron, S. Clayburgh, and S. C. Lillis, aver in their complaint that they "are now, and they and their predecessors and grantors for more than five years last past have been, the owners and in lawful possession of" a large tract of land in Fresno and Tulare counties, in this state, called the "Rancho Laguna de Tache." The facts about their title and possession, as proven and found by the court, are these: On and prior to September 23, 1868, the title in fee to the said rancho was in Jeremiah Clarke, to whom it had come by mesne conveyances from Manuel Castro, to whom before that time it had been patented by the United States government. On said September 23, 1868, said Clarke leased the rancho to Edwin St. John for a term of 10 years from and after November 1, 1868. St. John took possession under the lease, and so held possession until the 10th day of September, 1874, on which day, with consent of Clarke, he transferred his unexpired leasehold to the plaintiffs herein, who then entered and have been in possession continuously until the commencement of this action, which was October 12, 1883. On April 24, 1877, Clarke made a contract with plaintiffs by which the term of the lease to St. John was extended for the further period of six years, ending November 1, 1884, and plaintiffs were given the privilege of buying a part of the land at a specified price. On May 1, 1880, Clarke made another contract with plaintiffs, by which he leased said rancho to plaintiffs for the term of 10 years from said May 1st, with the privilege of buying the whole of the land, and canceled the contract and lease of April 24, 1877. And since May 1, 1880, plaintiff's possession has been under the said contract made that day. Clarke is still the owner in fee of the land. He is not a party to this action. Along this land, and forming a boundary of it for many miles, there is a natural water-course, called "King's River." The defendant, by means of a dam and ditch, has diverted a large amount of the water of this river and carried it away from said land, and continues to so divert and carry it. Plaintiffs bring this action to restrain such diversion, and for damages, basing their cause of action upon the right of a riparian owner to have a natural stream continue to flow as by nature it is wont to flow, over, through, or along his land. Defendant contends that, by an adverse user for a period of more than five years before the commencement of the action, it has acquired the right to have the water continue to flow in its ditch, and pleads the statute of limitations. The court below finds that in 1874 defendant constructed the ditch through which the diversion complained of is accomplished, and that in that year it turned the water of said stream to the extent of a certain number of inches into said ditch, and has ever since continuously used and diverted that amount of water, and no more, claiming the right to do so; "and that said use and diversion by defendant was actual and continuous, open, peaceful, notorious, and known to plaintiffs, and adverse to them for a period of more than five years immediately preceding the commencement of this action." And there is clearly evidence sufficient to support this finding. Plaintiffs contend, however, (and this contention raises the main issue in the case,) that during the lease to St. John, the land being in possession of tenants, the landlord or reversioner, Clarke, could not have maintained an action for the diversion of the water; and that therefore the statute of limitations did not begin to run against him during the tenancy. And they invoke the doctrine that title by prescription is based upon the fiction of a lost grant; that no grant can be presumed as against the reversioner, because he has no means of resisting the adverse user; and that a tenant for years can make no grant longer in duration than his term.

It is not entirely clear how this proposition, if tenable, could be made available upon the facts in this case. If the principle contended for were correct, still if after the adverse user had commenced the term of lease had expired, thus giving the landlord the right to the possession, he could not continue to make new leases, and thus indefinitely postpone the running of the statute of limitations. The theory of appellants is that as the first lease to St. John did not expire until November 1, 1878, and the complaint was filed October 12, 1883, therefore, the action—according to their contention—was commenced in time. But in April, 1877, while the adverse user was in full force, Clarke, by written contract, extended the lease for six years; thus putting it out of his power, according to the principle asserted, to sue at the end of the first lease. And by contracts and leases overlapping each other, Clarke has, by the rule contended for, disabled himself indefinitely from bringing an action for the alleged diversion of the water. We mention these difficulties in appellants' way because they are obvious; but, as counsel for respondent have not very strenuously insisted upon them, we will examine the case as though the only question presented were: Can the owner in fee of land, having leased it, and while it is in the possession of the tenant for years, maintain an action against a third party for the diversion of water from a natural stream running through the land? Section 826 of the Civil Code provides that "a person having an estate in fee in remainder, or reversion, may maintain an action for any injury done to the inheritance, notwithstanding an intervening estate for life, or years." And it seems clear upon principle and authority that the diversion of natural water from land is "an injury done to the inheritance." The flow of natural water over land is a continuous source of fertility and benefit, and its withdrawal is followed by consequences which are perpetually injurious to the freehold. This is strikingly illustrated by the averments in the complaint in this case, "that the waters of said King's river have hitherto been accustomed to overflow,—seep through and moisten the lands of said ranch; whereby the fertility of said lands was greatly increased, and a large and valuable quantity of natural grass was produced upon said lands;" and that, by reason of the diversion of the water by defendant, "said lands have failed to produce their accustomed crops of natural grass." The flow of the water of a stream, whether it overflow the banks or not, naturally irrigates and moistens the ground to a great and unknown extent, and thus stimulates vegetation; and the growth and decay of vegetation add, not only to the fertility, but to the very substance and quantity of the soil. It is not true, therefore, as claimed by appellants, that the water of a natural stream may be taken away from land for a great number of years, and then turned back, without any permanent injury to the land. Moreover, according to the riparian doctrine (upon which appellants rely in this case) "the right to the flow of water is inseparably annexed to the soil, and passes with it, not as an easement or appurtenant, but as a parcel." Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 390, 10 Pac. Rep. 674, and cases there cited. In Cary v. Daniels, 5 Metc. 238, the court say that the right to the use of water flowing over land is undoubtedly identified with the realty, and is a real and corporeal hereditament. And consequently it has been repeatedly held that a reversioner may maintain an action for interference with natural water, although the land be in the actual possession of a tenant for years. In section 378 of Gould on Waters it is said that "the reversioner may sue for any wrongful interference with the future enjoyment of property. This includes all acts directly injuring his freehold, and all adverse uses tending to establish easements or to abridge his rights." And at section 379 the learned author says: "In America it has been held that the freehold is injured by causing water to flow back upon the plaintiff's land, or into his race, or by the obstruction of his mill by backwater; or again by withholding water from his mill, or by diverting a natural water-course from his land, or by polluting the stream; and that the reversioner may recover for such injuries." In Hart v. Evans, 8 Pa. St. 14, it was held that "the water-course was a permanent advantage to the inheritance, and taking it away was an injury to the inheritance, for which an action would lie;" and that "the gist of the action for diverting a water-course is the diversion, which, in whatever way it is done, is an injury both to the freehold and the possession." It seems clear, therefore, that Clarke might have maintained an action against the defendant for the alleged diversion at any time after it commenced in 1874, and within the statutory period of limitation, (whether that period be four or five years,) and that, not having done so until nearly nine years afterwards, he and the plaintiffs were barred, and defendant acquired title by adverse user. And this is so without considering section 738, Code Civil Proc., which provides that "an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim;" and without regard to the contention of respondents that the statute of limitations cuts off the remedies off all persons whom it does not expressly except. The point that respondents are not found to "have paid all the taxes, state, county, or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon said land," (section 325, subsec. 2, Code Civil Proc.,) is sufficiently answered by the fact that it does not appear that any taxes were ever levied or assessed upon the ditch and water-right in question to defendant, or to any person or persons, known or unknown. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; THORNTON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCKINSTRY, J.

PATERSON, J. I dissent. The findings respecting adverse use are contradictory; there can be no adverse use to set the statute in motion where the use is by consent.

The description of the quantity, viz., "14,400 cubic inches per second under a 4-inch pressure of the waters of said river," is uncertain. If it means "14,400 cubic inches per second," or "14,400 inches under a 4-inch pressure," it is not supported by the evidence.

QUINLAN v. NOBLE. (No. 12,113.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1888.)

EASEMENT—PURCHASER TAKES SUBJECT TO.

The owner of a tract of land through which a water-ditch had been dug, divided the tract, and conveyed the same to different grantees, one of whom obstructed the ditch, so as to cut off the supply of water to the other's land. Held, that he took subject to the easement, and could not obstruct it.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by Michael Quinlan against George A. Noble to remove an obstruction in a water-ditch. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Ward & Grady and Stuart S. Wright, for appellant. R. B. Terry, (H. S. Dixon, of counsel,) for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to remove an obstruction in a water-ditch. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. At the close of plaintiff's evidence defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. It does not appear that any evidence was offered by defendant, and the verdict went for plaintiff. Appellant's argument is addressed mainly to the point that the court erred in denying the nonsuit.

The evidence was sufficient to warrant the court and jury in finding the following facts: At the commencement of the action, June 1, 1886, plaintiff was the owner of a certain tract of land called "Lot No. 10," and defendant was the owner of a tract of land adjoining said lot 10. On the 18th day of May, 1873, William S. Chapman was the owner in fee of both these tracts, and continued to be the owner thereof until he disposed of them as herein-after mentioned. In November, 1875, he made a written contract with one F. A. Pierce for the conveyance to the latter of said lot 10, and put Pierce in possession. In May, 1878, Pierce assigned and conveyed all his title and interest in the contract and land to D. W. Shepard; and in March, 1879, Shepard, in like manner, assigned and conveyed to Julia A. Fink Smith (widow.) In January, 1881, Chapman conveyed said lot 10 to said Mrs. Smith and T. C. White in fee-simple, in pursuance of the said contract with said Pierce.

Afterwards, through mesne conveyance, the title to said lot 10 was vested in plaintiff on September 1, 1885. The said adjoining tract, owned by defendant, was conveyed by said Chapman to the Bank of California on the 20th of April, 1879; and, through mesne conveyances, the title to it vested in defendant in December, 1882. As early as 1877 Chapman, while he owned both tracts, built a ditch across the tract now owned by defendant, to said lot 10, for the purpose of irrigating the latter; and from 1877 until after the conveyance of lot 10 to plaintiff in September, 1885, there has continuously been a ditch across the tract owned by defendant to lot 10, and used by the owners of the latter for its irrigation, although the course of the ditch over defendant's tract was at one time changed by the owners of said tract from what was called "Ditch No. 1" to "Ditch No. 2." It was there when plaintiff purchased lot 10, in September, 1885, but was obstructed shortly afterwards by defendant.

Taking these to be the facts, we think that the judgment of the court below was right, and that without reference to the question of adverse user. While Chapman owned all the land there probably could have been no relation of dominant and servient tenement between the tracts, but when he severed them by sale and conveyance, the grantee of each took it in the form which it assumed when he acquired it. This was held to be the law in Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 139. In that case Mr. Justice MCKINSTRY, delivering the opinion of the court, quotes approvingly the language of DENIO, J., in Lampman v. Mills, 21 N. Y. 505, as follows: "The rule of the common law on this subject is well settled. The principle is that where the owner of two tenements sells one of them, or the owner of an entire estate sells a portion of it, the purchaser takes the tenement or portion sold with all the benefits and burdens that appear at the time of sale to belong to it, as between it and the property which the vendor retains. * * * No easement exists so long as the unity of possession remains, because the owner of the whole may at any time rearrange the quality of the several servitudes; but upon severance by the sale of a part, the right of the owner to redistribute ceases, and easements or servitudes are created corresponding to the benefits or burdens existing at the time of sale."

Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

PHARIS v. MULDOON. (No. 12,208.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

MINES AND MINING—RELOCATION—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2324, provides, upon failure of a locator to expend $100 each year on his mining claim, the same shall be open to relocation, unless the original locator resume work thereon before such relocation. Defendant's claim became, under that statute, open to relocation January 1, 1886, and at 1 A. M. plaintiff posted his notice. He did not, however, mark out his boundaries until January 5th, and defendant, on January 1st, at the usual hour in the morning, resumed labor, did work to the amount of $10 up to January 5th, and $200 during that year. Held, plaintiff's proceedings, not amounting to location before work was resumed, conferred no right upon him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Amador county; C. B. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Defendant, E. Muldoon, on July 14, 1884, located the claim in controversy, but during the year of 1885 expended thereon no more than $60. Plaintiff, Alfred Pharis, claiming under a relocation, on January 1, 1886, brought this action to quiet title. Judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Curtis H. Lindley and D. B. Spagnoli, for appellant. Eaton & Rust, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. Action to quiet title to a mining claim. It is found by the court, and assumed by counsel upon both sides, that the claim of the defendant was not open to relocation until January 1, 1886. At 1 o'clock A. M. of that day plaintiff posted his notice, but did not mark out his boundaries until January 5th. In the mean time, that is to say, at the usual hour of commencing work of that kind, on the 1st day of January, 1886, the defendant resumed labor on his claim, did $10 worth of work on it up to the 5th of January, 1886, and afterwards, during that year, performed labor upon it to the amount of $200 more. The marking of boundaries is a necessary part of the location, (Newbill v. Thurston, 65 Cal. 419, 4 Pac. Rep. 409,) and this was not done until January 5, 1886. The defendant had resumed work "after failure and before location." This being the case, the plaintiff's proceedings conferred no right upon him, (Mining Co. v. Deferrari, 62 Cal. 163,) even if we concede, what we are not prepared to admit, that an entry by stealth at 1 o'clock in the morning is within the contemplation of the act of congress (section 2324, Rev. St. U. S.) The other points made require no special notice. It results that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

SCHUMACHER v. CONNOLLY, Sheriff. (9,711.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

ATTACHMENT—WRONGFUL—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

Judgment for $300 damages for wrongful attachment sustained, the evidence being conflicting as to the value of the property attached.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action for damages for wrongful seizure of property under writ of attachment against a third party, brought by Frederick Schumacher against Patrick Connolly, Sheriff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Geo. A. Knight, for appellant. Henry Eickhoff, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This was an action for damages against Connolly, as sheriff, for the alleged wrongful seizure of the plaintiff's property, under writ of attachment against one R. White. The cause was tried by a jury. The plaintiff had a verdict for $600. A motion for a new trial was duly made, and the court below ordered "that said motion be granted, unless the plaintiff shall consent in writing to a reduction of the judgment herein from the sum of six hundred dollars to the sum of three hundred dollars, in which case the judgment will be modified accordingly, and the said motion for a new trial denied." The plaintiff consented to have the judgment modified as required by the court, and from the judgment thus made and given, and the order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The point is made by the appellant that the judgment should be reversed because the evidence shows that there was no immediate transfer and actual and continued change of possession of the property attached, either from White, the defendant in the attachment suit, to one Seligman, who first bought the goods, or to his vendee, Schumacher, the present plaintiff. It was also claimed that the sale was fraudulent. We perceive nothing in the record to warrant us in sustaining the last contention. The evidence sufficiently shows an immediate transfer, and an actual and continued change of possession of the property attached from White, the defendant in attachment, to Seligman, and from him to the plaintiff. There was a conflict in the evidence as to the value of the property attached, and the modification of the judgment under the order of the trial court should stand.

We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

WARD v. DOUGHERTY. (No. 11,085.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1888.)

1. DEED—DELIVERY—PRESUMPTION.

In an action to quiet title, plaintiff produced at the trial a deed from defendant, executed and acknowledged by him, duly recorded, and forming part of the chain of title from defendant to plaintiff. Held, that such facts constitute prima facie evidence of delivery, and, under Civil Code Cal. § 1055, providing that "a grant duly executed is presumed to have been delivered at its date," such delivery will be presumed to have been at the date of the deed.

2. SAME—IDENTITY OF GRANTOR—PRESUMPTION.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1963, provides that identity of person shall be presumed from identity of name. Held that, in an action to quiet title, where plaintiff claimed under a deed executed in the name of defendant, it will be presumed to be defendant's deed.

3. RES ADJUDICATA—LIEN FOR STREET ASSESSMENT—FORECLOSURE.

In an action to quiet title, plaintiff claimed under a sheriff's sale, made in pursuance of a decree of foreclosure of the lien of a street assessment. Such assessment was, in that decree, declared paramount to the lien of a mortgage, the mortgagee under whom defendant claimed having been made a party to such proceeding to foreclose. Held, that defendant, being in privity of estate with such mortgagee, and the court rendering such decree having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person of the defendant in such proceeding, it cannot be attacked collaterally by defendant's showing that the assessment had been paid.

4. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—SHERIFF'S DEED TO PURCHASER AFTER CONVEYANCE BY LATTEK.

Defendant held a certificate of purchase under a foreclosure sale. The time for redemption had passed, and he conveyed the premises by quitclaim deed to plaintiff's grantor before the sheriff's deed had been made to him. Held, that the sheriff's deed subsequently made to defendant is void as between him and plaintiff.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

John J. Coffey, for appellant. Wm. M. Pierson, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an action to quiet title to a lot of land at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Broadway, San Francisco. Plaintiff deraigned title through a quitclaim deed executed by the defendant, John Dougherty, on the 14th day of June, 1870, to one Patrick J. Tannian, and recorded June 18, 1870, at the request of one Julius George. Plaintiff, in further support of title in herself, introduced a deed from P. J. White, sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, to James Gaffney, under whom plaintiff claims by sundry mesne conveyances, dated July 5, 1883, and executed pursuant to a decree, order of sale, and sale in the case of James Gaffney v. Barnaby Dougherty, in an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment under a contract made the 9th day of September, 1866. It appears from the judgment roll that Denis Mahoney, one of the defendants in the action, set up in a cross-complaint the prior lien upon the property of a mortgage thereon executed May 26, 1864, by Barnaby Dougherty to David Mahoney, and assigned to him, the said Denis Mahoney, by the mortgagee, David Mahoney. The lien of the street assessment was declared to be paramount to that of the mortgage. Date of decree, December 14, 1867; date of sale thereunder, January 22, 1868. Defendant claims title to the premises under a sheriff's deed, dated July 3, 1883, and executed pursuant to a foreclosure and sale of the premises under the mortgage above mentioned, in an action in which Denis Mahoney was plaintiff and B. Dougherty defendant. Decree entered March 19, 1868; sale April 14, 1868, to Denis Mahoney, who received a certificate of sale, and assigned the same to the defendant on the 22d day of September, 1868, with all his right, title, and interest in the premises. James Gaffney was made a party defendant in this last-named action, but there was a dismissal as to him, and no decree was taken against him. Upon the closing of the testimony on the part of plaintiff, defendant moved for judgment as in case of nonsuit, upon the ground that there was no proof of delivery of the deed from defendant Dougherty to P. J. Tannian. The motion was overruled, and this action is assigned as error.

We find in the record no specification of the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient, but, waiving this point, we think there was sufficient evidence of the delivery of the deed by the defendant to the grantee therein named. It was regularly executed, acknowledged, and recorded as a conveyance of title to the premises in dispute. It formed a part of the regular chain of title from the defendant to plaintiff, and was produced and offered in evidence at the trial by the attorney of the latter. It is hardly necessary to say that a deed only takes effect upon delivery, and that without such delivery it has no validity. Possession of a deed of property, however, by the grantee therein named, and upon the same principle by one holding by conveyance of the same property under him, is prima facie evidence of its delivery. The question of delivery being one of fact, and possession being only primary evidence of delivery, he who disputes such fact may rebut the presumption arising from possession by showing that there has in fact been no delivery; but it has been said that where a deed is found in possession of the grantee, nothing but the most satisfactory evidence of non-delivery should prevail against the presumption. Devl. Deeds, § 294. In Tunison v. Chamblin, 88 Ill. 379, it was said: "When a deed duly executed is found in the hands of a grantee, there is a strong implication that it has been delivered, and only clear and convincing evidence can overcome the presumption. Otherwise titles could be easily defeated, and no one could be regarded as being secure in the ownership of the land. It cannot be that a grantor may assail a conveyance fifteen or twenty years after a deed has been made, and recover the land by merely swearing that he never delivered the deed. The unsupported evidence of the grantor surely cannot be permitted to have such effect, especially when the evidence of such a grantor is in many material matters contradicted, and who seems to act on a low moral plane. To so hold would render all titles insecure, and would be disastrous in the extreme. Any system of jurisprudence adopting rules for the attainment of justice can never sanction a rule fraught with such unjust and iniquitous results." In Branson v. Caruthers, 49 Cal. 374, it was said: "The production of the deed of gift by the attorneys of the wife (the grantee) was sufficient evidence of its delivery and acceptance." Barr v. Shroeder, 32 Cal. 609. Section 1055 of the Civil Code provides that "a grant duly executed is presumed to have been delivered at its date." It may be inferred from the decision in Boyd v. Slayback, 63 Cal. 493, that this court was of opinion that this inference only applied to the time, and not to the fact, of delivery. In other words, that the fact of delivery must be proven by other and competent evidence, and that, when proven, the presumption of the Code as to the time of such delivery applies. In view of this interpretation the fact of delivery of the deed from defendant to Tannian having been sufficiently proven by its production by the attorneys of plaintiff, who held under him, the date of such delivery will, under the Code, be deemed to have been the date of the instrument, viz., June 14, 1870. So, too, John Dougherty, who executed the deed, is presumed, under section 1963 of our Code of Civil Procedure, to be the John Dougherty who is defendant in the cause, upon the theory that identity of person is presumed from identity of name. What is said here will apply with like effect to similar errors assigned upon the introduction of other deeds. The only other alleged error is predicated upon the refusal of the court to permit defendant to testify in answer to the following question: "Do you know of your own knowledge whether the assessment for that street work was paid by Denis Mahoney?" The proffered evidence involved an attempt to show by parol, in a collateral attack, that the decree of foreclosure of the lien of the street assessment, and the sale and deed thereunder, were void by reason of the payment of such assessment. Both plaintiff and defendant are in privity of estate with Denis Mahoney, and the decree, being fair on its face, and rendered in a case where the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the person of defendant, is not subject to collateral attack. Again, if we dismiss from view the title of plaintiff, based upon the sale under foreclosure of the lien for street assessment, which was found to be paramount to the lien of the mortgage, under which defendant claims title, and the case stands thus: Defendant held a certificate of purchase under the foreclosure sale. The time for redemption had expired. He had a perfect equitable title, which only lacked a sheriff's deed to turn it into a legal title. In this condition of things he conveyed by his quitclaim deed on the 14th day of June, 1870, to Tannian, from whom plaintiff derains title. In Green v. Clark, 31 Cal. 592, it was held that if one who has purchased land at sheriff's sale quitclaims his interest in the same, before a sheriff's deed is given, the quitclaim is equivalent to an assignment of the sheriff's certificate of sale, and if the sheriff afterwards give a deed to the purchaser, the deed is void as between the parties.

It follows that, were we to concede the error upon the exclusion of defendant's testimony to be well assigned, the conclusion rendered by the court below was correct. Judgment affirmed.

REAGAN v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 11,228.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 15, 1888.)

1. REVIEW, WRIT OF—WHEN LIES—JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT.

A judgment rendered upon default by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter cannot be questioned upon a writ of review.

2. PLEADING—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint upon contract, to which the plea of the statute of limitations or of frauds has not been properly interposed, will be presumed to state a good cause of action as to these defenses, unless the contract is one which must be in writing, to confer jurisdiction on the court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Appeal from a judgment dismissing a writ of review in the case of Daniel Reagan, plaintiff and appellant, against the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, and William B. Smith, a justice of said court, and Bridget Fitzgerald, executrix of the last will and testament of Patrick Fitzgerald, deceased, defendants and respondents.

John D. Whaley, for appellant. M. Cooney, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco dismissing a writ of review to the justice's court of said city and county. An action was commenced in the justice's court. The following is a copy of the complaint:

"IN THE JUSTICE'S COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

"Bridget Fitzgerald, Executrix of the Last Will of Patrick Fitzgerald, Deceased, Plaintiff, vs. Daniel Reagan and Ann Reagan, Defendants.

"The above-named plaintiff complains of the above-named defendants, and alleges that the said Patrick Fitzgerald died in said city and county on or about the 28th day of July, 1884, leaving a will, which, after due proceedings had, was admitted to probate as his last will and testament on the 13th day of August, 1884, in and by the order and decree of the superior court of said city and county, duly made and given herein. And on or about the same day letters testamentary upon his estate issued to said plaintiff, Bridget Fitzgerald, out of said court, and she then and there qualified as executrix of said will, and she ever since has been, and now is, such executrix. That at the time of the death of said Patrick Fitzgerald the said defendants were indebted to him in the sum of $381, gold coin of the United States, for money loaned by said deceased to the defendants in his life-time, and legal interest on the same. That in about three months after the said death the defendants promised to pay said sum of $381 to said executrix, but they have not paid the same, or any part thereof, except the sum of $101, leaving a balance of $280 still due and unpaid, which sum is now payable to said plaintiff as executrix. Wherefore the plaintiff prays for judgment against the defendants for the sum of $280, with interest and costs. M. COONEY, Attorney for Plaintiff."

Indorsed: "Filed February 4, 1885.

"FRANK MURPHY, Clerk.

"By M. T. DWYER, Deputy-Clerk."

Summons in due form was issued, returnable February 9, 1885, which was duly served, together with a copy of the complaint upon the defendant. He failed to appear to the action on the 9th, but on a day later, on the 10th, filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was stricken out, and judgment entered against him by default, as prayed for in the complaint. Before the expiration of 10 days he moved, on notice and affidavit under section 859, Code Civil Proc., to set aside the default, and for leave to answer. The motion was met by counter-affidavits, and was denied by the court, whereupon a writ of review was sued out from the superior court, which, upon the coming in of the return, was dismissed, as hereinbefore stated.

The complaint stated a cause of action against the defendant. The right to interpose the plea of the statute of limitations is waived, unless taken advantage of by demurrer or answer; and, had the complaint shown affirmatively on its face that the demand was so barred, it could have availed defendant nothing, in the absence of such demurrer or answer. So, too, where, under the statute, an agreement is required to be in writing, such agreement, if in other respects properly pleaded, will be presumed, for the purpose of testing the sufficiency of the pleading, to have been in writing. Wakefield v. Greenwood, 29 Cal. 598; Miles v. Thorne, 38 Cal. 335; Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458; Blennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 8. The exception to the rule arises in cases where the contract must necessarily be in writing, to confer jurisdiction on the court. Cory v. Hyde, 49 Cal. 469. In justices' courts, pleadings are not held to any great degree of strictness; but waiving this leniency to the pleading, and we are of opinion it was quite sufficient, in the absence of objection, to constitute a cause of action, under our Code, in any court. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the person of the defendant. We see nothing in the record to indicate that the court did not regularly pursue the authority conferred upon it by law. If, in so doing, it committed errors, it is not the province of the writ of review to correct them, as it only issues in case where the inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded its jurisdiction, and there is no appeal or other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. In Clark v. Superior Court, 55 Cal. 199, this court held that should the superior court, having jurisdiction, order judgment for one of the parties without a trial, the judgment, while erroneous, would not be in excess of jurisdiction, and the only remedy would be by appeal. The decision proceeds upon the theory that such action would not be without or in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. Applying the reasoning of that case to the question involved here, we are of opinion no proper foundation was laid for the issue of the writ, and that it was properly dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

POWERS et al. v. BRALY et al. (No. 9,994.)*(Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1888.)1. APPEARANCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—BY ATTORNEY.

An attorney having appeared for the purpose of striking out an amended complaint, and having asked for an extension of time in which to plead until the motion to strike out is decided, has not so appeared as to constitute a waiver of the service of summons by defendant, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 416, which provides that a defendant appears in an action when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him.

2. PRACTICE—SERVICE OF AMENDED COMPLAINT—DEFENDANT NOT SUMMONED.

The service of an amended complaint upon a defendant who was not a party to the suit in the first instance, and has never been served with summons, is void.

3. SAME—SERVICE ON ATTORNEY.

The service of an amended complaint upon an attorney, prior to his appearance in a cause for the defendant, does not constitute a valid service of such complaint upon the defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action by John Powers and Catherine Powers against Margaret J. Braly, executrix, and William R. Sloan, executor, to quiet title. Judgment was rendered by default in favor of plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

W. R. Daingerfield, for appellants. J. B. Hart, for respondents.

SEARLES, C. J. This is an appeal from a final judgment by default in favor of plaintiffs, and against all the defendants. The action was originally brought by John Powers against Margaret J. Braly to quiet title to a parcel of land, by filing a complaint. Some time afterwards, and without any order or leave of the court, plaintiff filed an amended complaint making Catherine Powers, a party plaintiff with himself, and adding William R. Sloan, executor, and Margaret J. Braly, executrix, of Marcus Braly, deceased, as parties defendant. W. R. Daingerfield, Esq., was the general attorney of the defendants, and of all of them. The amended complaint was served upon defendant Sloan, and upon Daingerfield as and for defendant Margaret J. Braly. Two extensions of time were granted by plaintiffs' attorney to Daingerfield to answer. On the 22d day of December, 1882, Daingerfield gave notice that on December 29, 1882, he would move the court to strike out the amended complaint, and dismiss the action as to Sloan. This notice specified that Daingerfield appeared specially. On the same day said Daingerfield applied to the court for extension of time for defendants to move and plead until it was determined which complaint he should plead to; and on the 23d day of December, 1882, the court made an order granting all the defendants until five days "after notice of decision of motion to strike out amended complaint in which to plead." The notice to strike out was denied on the 23d day of January, 1883, and notice thereof served upon Daingerfield the same day. The summons (if any there was) was never served upon any of the defendants, and never was amended to meet the changes of parties plaintiffs and defendants.

1. The service of the amended complaint was void as to the defendant Sloan, because no service of a summons upon him or his co-defendants was had, and equally void as to defendant Braly, because, at the date of such service, Daingerfield, upon whom it was served, had not appeared as an attorney in the cause.

2. Daingerfield never appeared as an attorney of record in the cause so as to waive service of summons and complaint under section 416, Code Civil Proc. "A defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him." Code Civil Proc. § 1014. None of these things were done. The appearance of Daingerfield to strike out the amended complaint was special, for that particular purpose, and in no sense a general appearance in the cause, and his asking the court for an extension of time to move or plead, until the motion was disposed of, was an act ancillary to the motion, which neither in letter nor spirit complied with the provision of the Code as to an appearance as attorney of record for the defendants. It follows that there was no waiver of service, and the defaults of defendants were improperly entered.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded.

REAGAN v. FITZGERALD. (No. 11,148.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1888.)

JUDGMENT—BY DEFAULT—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE.

In an action brought to annul a judgment rendered in justice's court by default, regular on its face, and for an injunction restraining the collection of the same, where the complaint showed that a motion, made under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 859, giving to justices of the peace the power to relieve from judgments by default in case of mistake, etc., on good cause being shown, was denied, it appearing that plaintiff had pursued an adequate remedy at law, a demurrer to the complaint is properly sustained, and, on refusal to amend, the injunction should be dismissed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN J. FINN, Judge.

Action brought by Daniel Reagan to annul a judgment against him by default in a justice's court, and for an injunction restraining the collection or assignment thereof, against Bridget Fitzgerald, executrix of the will of Patrick Fitzgerald, deceased. Plaintiff appeals from a final judgment for defendant and from an order dissolving an injunction.

John D. Whaley, for appellant. M. Cooney, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an appeal from a final judgment render in favor of defendant on sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and refusal by the latter to amend, and from an order dissolving an injunction. The action was brought to annul a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff by default in a justice's court, and for an injunction restraining the collection or assignment thereof. It appears from the complaint that the defendant, as executrix of the last will of Patrick Fitzgerald, deceased, brought suit against the plaintiff herein in a justice's court to recover $280, as for money loaned to the latter by defendant's testator. Summons was regularly served upon plaintiff, but the latter, being unable to read, made a mistake as to the return-day, which was February 9, 1885, and did not appear in the cause until the following day, when he caused a demurrer to be filed to the complaint. This demurrer was on the 18th of February stricken out, on motion of plaintiff's counsel therein, and judgment entered against the defendant. On the 21st day of February, 1885, defendant in that case moved the court to vacate the judgment and permit him to file an answer, basing his motion on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect, and averring that he had a good and meritorious defense to the action on the merits. What particular facts were set out in the justice's court, to show a meritorious defense to the action, beyond a statement of non-indebtedness, does not appear. The motion to set aside the default was denied March 5, 1885, and thereupon this action was instituted. Section 859, Code Civil Proc., gives to justices' courts power, "on such terms as may be just, and on payment of costs, [to] relieve a party from a judgment by default taken against him by his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, but the application for such relief must be made within ten days after the entry of the judgment and upon affidavit showing good cause therefor." The application to set aside the default was in due time. Injunctions to restrain proceedings at law are granted in instances where the facts show it to be against conscience to enforce such proceedings, and at the same time show that the injured party could not have availed himself of such facts in a court of law, or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence on his part. In such cases it mattered not whether the application was made before or after judgment or execution, and upon a proper showing a court of equity would interfere by injunction to restrain the adverse party. Bills of this sort are frequently termed bills for a new trial. Story, Eq. Jur. § 887. Not that a new trial was in fact ordered in the court of law, for this could not be done, but that the result reached was tantamount thereto. As above stated, a case for relief by way of injunction against a judgment at law must present facts not only showing the equitable rights of the complainant, but also showing that he could not have availed himself of such facts in the legal forum. The tendency of modern legislation and practice has been to greatly abridge the necessity for this class of bills by providing remedies in the courts of law for many of the exigencies which called them into existence.

Thus, in the present case, we may assume that default was taken against the plaintiff herein by his inadvertence and excusable neglect, and that he had a perfect defense to the action; a case in which he would formerly have been entitled to relief in equity. But we cannot say he was powerless to take advantage of this mistake at law, for the reason that section 859, quoted above, is expressly designed to give relief in such cases, and thus, by a short and adequate process, to secure the ends formerly attained by the long and cumbersome process of a bill in equity. He not only could, but did, move under this section in the justice's court. The contention of plaintiff is that the justice improperly decided against him, and that he has no appeal. The answer is that a court of equity does not sit as a court for the correction of errors in actions at law, and it never grants relief upon the ground of error or mistake in the judgment of the court of law, or because the court of equity, in deciding the same questions, passed upon by the law court, would have reached a different conclusion. Story, Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 1575. We are, of course, speaking of judgments fair upon their face, and not of void judgments, which may be impugned anywhere, and by direct or collateral attack. Even were we authorized to examine into the propriety of the action of the court in refusing to set aside the default of plaintiff, which we are not, we have not the record before us upon which he acted; non constat, but there may have been good reasons appearing for the refusal complained of. It follows that, as it appears affirmatively from the law and the complaint, not only that plaintiff had an adequate remedy in the action at law, but that he pursued it, the complaint is insufficient to warrant the relief asked, and the demurrer was properly sustained; and, as he declined to amend, and final judgment was rendered against him, the injunction was properly dismissed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

DAVIS v. HEIMBACH et al. (No. 12,383.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

I. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—CONTRIBUTION BETWEEN SURETIES—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 709, provides that, in an action against a principal and sureties, a surety is entitled to the benefit of the judgment to compel contribution from his co-sureties, provided he file with the clerk notice of his payment and claim to contribution. Held, in view of such provision requiring the filing of notice, an execution by a surety against his co-sureties will be quashed when obtained without serving notice upon them.

Cal.Rep. 16-19 P.—20

2. SAME—AGREEMENT BETWEEN SURETY AND PRINCIPAL—EFFECT ON REMEDY AGAINST CO-SURETIES.

A surety who agrees with his principal, in a written contract entered into before judgment recovered against them, to pay the whole of his principal's debt, is not entitled to execution against his co-sureties, nor to show in such summary proceeding that the contract was entered into by him through mistake, and should be set aside.

Commissioners' decision Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGFORD, Judge.

H. M. Albery, for appellant. Richard Bayne, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This is an appeal by defendants McDaniel and Miller from an order quashing an execution issued at their instance against their co-defendants Wiles and Ludy. It appears that these four parties were sureties upon a note of defendant Heimbach to the plaintiff, Davis, and were all defendants in the action, which was upon the note. Judgment having been entered against them, McDaniel and Miller paid the whole amount, and then, under section 709, Code Civil Proc., took out a writ of execution against their co-defendants, Wiles and Ludy, for their proportion. This execution was quashed by order of the court, and from this order the appeal is taken. The section referred to provides that contribution may be enforced in this summary manner "if, within ten days after his payment," the party files a notice, etc. The whole sum paid was $5,600.58. Of this $3,354.30 was paid on May 18th, and the remainder not until June 24th. The notice and claim were filed on June 27th. It is open to doubt whether such filing was "within ten days after his payment;" for, the proceeding being statutory, the course pointed out by the statute must be strictly pursued. Hansen v. Martin, 63 Cal. 282. But, without expressing an opinion upon this point, we think there are other grounds upon which the order should be affirmed.

1. The order directing the issuance of the execution was obtained without notice to the parties to be affected by it. We have not been referred to any decision in relation to the section under which the proceedings were taken. But there are several decisions in relation to section 942, which provides for the entry of judgment against sureties on appeal-bonds. In Ladd v. Parnell, 57 Cal. 232, the court said that it saw nothing in the point that that section was unconstitutional. But in that case it appears from the opinion that notice had been given, and from the argument of counsel it would seem that the point in which the court could see nothing was that the sureties were entitled to a trial by jury. In the subsequent case of Meredith v. Mining Ass'n, 60 Cal. 617, it was held that the sureties on an appeal-bond were not entitled to notice of an application for judgment against them. The ground of the decision seems to have been that the section did not provide for notice, and that it must be presumed that the sureties contracted with reference to existing law, which therefore entered into and formed a part of their contract. It is to be observed of this case that the statute construed does not in terms dispense with notice. It is simply silent upon the subject. And if it be true that, when taken in connection with other provisions of the same Code, (sections 1005 and 1011,) it does not provide for notice, yet it is deserving of consideration whether, in view of the importance of an opportunity to be heard,—a right which almost always exists,—it ought not to be presumed that the parties contracted with reference to it, and that it formed a part of their contract. To say otherwise is to dispense with a fundamental and important right by a somewhat strained application of an artificial rule of construction of a contract. But, however this may be as to the section in relation to appeal-bonds, the doctrine of the case has no application to the section involved here. This section provides that the party seeking the entry of judgment shall "file with the clerk of the court where the judgment is rendered notice of his payment, and claim to contribution or repayment." It is true that it does not specify the person to whom the notice is to be given, or its period, or the manner in which it is to be given. But the natural meaning of the word "notice" is a notice to some one, and, if the person be not indicated, the plain inference is that the party intended is the person who is interested,—the one who is to be proceeded against. Even if this were not the natural meaning of the word, we should hesitate long before concluding that the legislature intended to provide for judgment against a man in a court of justice without giving him an opportunity to be heard in his defense. But, as above stated, it is not straining the language to hold that some notice to the parties interested is necessary, and, if this is so, the period and manner of giving it are provided in other parts of the Code. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1005-1011, et seq. The order directing the execution having been without notice, the proceedings were properly vacated.

2. The showing made by the respondents upon the motion to quash was sufficient to sustain the order made. The respondents produced a written contract, made before the judgment, by which the appellant McDaniel, in consideration of the assignment to him of the principal's interest in a certain firm, and the conveyance by the principal's wife of a piece of real estate, (which transfers were duly made,) agreed to pay the whole debt himself. McDaniel admitted that he signed the agreement, but urged that he did so "without first having read it, and without knowing what it contained," and that it did not truly express what was in fact the understanding of the parties. Without expressing any opinion as to whether the showing made would entitle McDaniel to maintain a suit in equity to have the contract set aside, it is sufficient to say that as long as it stands it is a good answer to an application for contribution, whether by motion or action. John v. Jones, 16 Ala. 464; and compare Taylor v. Reynolds, 53 Cal. 687, and Logan v. Talbot, 59 Cal. 653. And we think it clear that he cannot have the contract set aside, and all the equities adjusted, in this summary proceeding, based upon affidavits. Still less can he ignore the contract entirely, and calmly proceed to take out his execution in defiance of it, and without so much as notice to those interested.

The other points made do not seem to require special notice. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

BYRNE v. REED et al. (No. 11,714.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS AGAINST INTEREST.

In an action by plaintiff claiming for his testator that defendant conveyed property in fraud of creditors, the defendant claiming that she conveyed in good faith & discharge an indebtedness to her grantee, testimony that plaintiff's testator had spoken about such indebtedness was competent, being a declaration against interest.

2. SAME.

And in such action, where the grantee, being asked by plaintiff how the indebtedness arose, replied that her mother had given $500 to the defendant, and being asked how she knew that, answered that defendant told her so, the evidence was responsive to the question and admissible.

3. SAME—GOOD FAITH OF GRANTEE.

In an action to set aside a deed for fraud on the part of both grantor and grantee, a question to the grantee as to whether she took the deed for the purpose of preventing any one else from getting the property, was relevant to the question in issue whether witness took the deed in good faith.

4. SAME—GOOD FAITH OF GRANTOR.

Whether defendant conveyed property in fraud of creditors being in issue, testimony as to what plaintiff said about the value of other property, which defendant had mortgaged to him, was admissible to show that she might honestly have believed, when she made the conveyance in controversy, that the mortgaged property was sufficient to pay all incumbrances on it.

5. SAME.

And her petition to set aside the sale of such mortgaged land was also admissible for the same reason.

6. SAME.

And where it appeared that the grantee had asked plaintiff if he could hold liable the rest of defendant's property if the mortgaged property should be insufficient to satisfy the mortgage, and plaintiff had answered "No," testimony as to plaintiff's motive in so answering was inadmissible.

7. NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

An application for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, which would probably not produce any different result, is properly denied.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYERS, Judge.

C. A. & F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. J. M. Fulweiler and Hale & Craig, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment, and order denying him a new trial. The action was brought to remove an alleged cloud on the plaintiff's title to certain mining claims, situate near Iowa Hill, in Placer county. The mining claims in controversy were formerly owned by the defendant Adelia Hill, and the plaintiff asserts title to them under a sale on execution, issued upon a judgment against her, made to him as executor of the last will of Matthew Reed, deceased, on the 24th day of September, 1883, and under a sheriff's deed made to him, in pursuance of the sale, on the 26th day of March, 1884. The defendant Julia S. Reed asserts title to the claims under a deed made to her by her co-defendant Adelia Hill, on the 18th day of May, 1883. It is alleged in the complaint that this deed to the defendant Reed was made without any consideration, and with the intent, on the part of both grantor and grantee, to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the grantor, of whom the plaintiff was and is one; and that it consequently is a cloud on his title, which he asks to have removed. The answer denies that the deed in question was made without consideration, or with any intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of defendant Hill, or any of them, and alleges that on the 18th of May, 1883, defendant Reed, for a full, sufficient, and valuable consideration, purchased the claims, and ever since has been and now is the bona fide and lawful owner and holder of the same, and of every part and parcel thereof. The court below found that on the 18th day of May, 1883, the aggregate value of the mining claims in controversy was not over $1,100; that on that day the defendant Hill was justly indebted to the defendant Reed in the sum of $1,976.33, "and on said day, by agreement thereto with said Reed, said Hill executed and delivered to said Reed the conveyance of said properties mentioned in the complaint herein, and certain other mining property not described in the complaint, in full satisfaction, discharge, and payment of said indebtedness, and said Reed accepted said conveyance in full satisfaction, payment, and discharge of said indebtedness; that the said indebtedness, and the satisfaction and discharge thereof, was a full and adequate consideration for the properties thus conveyed; that the said conveyance was made and accepted in good faith, and without any intent to hinder, delay, or defraud plaintiff, or any creditor or creditors of defendant Hill; that the defendants Reed and Hill did not collude or intend, by said conveyance or otherwise, nor did either of them intend, thereby to hinder, delay, or defraud the plaintiff or his co-executor, or any creditor or creditors of the defendant Hill, from collecting, by execution or otherwise, any anticipated or other judgment that might be rendered against defendant Hill, or to prevent, hinder, or delay the collection of any debt or demand due by defendant Hill to any one." It was accordingly adjudged and decreed that the defendant Julia S. Reed is, and since the 18th day of May, 1883, has been, the owner of all the properties conveyed to her on that day by defendant Hill, and is entitled to hold the same as against the plaintiff; and that neither the plaintiff nor the estate of Matthew Reed, deceased, ever acquired or had or held any title to, or right, interest, or estate in, said properties, or any part thereof.

It is claimed for the appellant that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and that the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted for that reason. The answer is that as to all of the disputed facts there was a clear conflict in the evidence, that given in behalf of respondents being quite sufficient to justify each of the findings. The well-settled rule in regard to conflicting testimony must therefore control the action of this court. It is also claimed that the court committed several errors in admitting and rejecting evidence, which should cause a reversal of the judgment. We shall speak briefly of each of these alleged errors. The plaintiff was called as a witness in his own behalf, and testified that he told defendant Hill in presence of defendant Reed that he must foreclose, and that defendant Reed asked him if he could come on the other claims if the property mortgaged did not bring the amount due, and he answered, "No." Counsel for plaintiff then asked why he said "No." The question was objected to and excluded by the court, and we see no error in the ruling. It was certainly immaterial for the court to know what secret motives induced the witness to answer as he did. The defendant Reed was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and was asked how she paid for the property conveyed to her. She answered that when she purchased the property her aunt (defendant Hill) owed her $1,976.33, and added: "The consideration of the indebtedness was this: my mother gave my aunt $500 for me September 10, 1868." She was then asked how she knew her mother gave $500 to her aunt, and she answered that her aunt told her so. Counsel for plaintiff moved to strike out the answer, and the court denied their motion. We see no error in this ruling. The answer was responsive to the question, and the fact that it was hearsay was no reason for striking it out. Indeed, the plaintiff would seem to have been left in a better position with the answer in than out. On cross-examination the same witness was asked if Matthew Reed, in his life-time, said anything to her about her aunt owing her this money. The question was objected to, and the objection overruled. This ruling was proper. The plaintiff was claiming for the estate of Matthew Reed that the conveyance to the witness was made without any consideration, and it was proper, therefore, to show, as a declaration against his interest, that Reed, in his life-time, knew and spoke of the indebtedness. The witness was also asked, on her cross-examination, if she took the deed for the purpose of preventing anyone else from getting the property; and the question was objected to but allowed. The question was entirely relevant and proper. It was insisted for the plaintiff that the witness took the deed to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and, whether she did so or not, was the principal issue to be decided. She was a competent witness, and it was proper for her to state what her purpose was. The defendants were permitted, against the objection of plaintiff, to prove by the witness Hobson that in 1879 plaintiff's testator told him that defendant Hill held $500 in trust for defendant Reed. For the reasons above stated, we see no error in this ruling. The testimony of Hobson as to what plaintiff said about the value of the mortgaged property, and the petition of defendant Hill to set aside the sale under the Gleason mortgage, were admissible to show that defendant Hill might honestly have believed, and did believe, when she conveyed the claims in controversy to defendant Reed, that the mortgaged property was more than sufficient to pay all incumbrances upon it. One of the grounds upon which the plaintiff made his motion for a new trial was newly-discovered evidence, which he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced at the trial. Applications for new trial are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and the action of that court will not be disturbed, except for an abuse of its discretion; the presumption being that the discretion was properly exercised. And to entitle a party to a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, it must appear—"First, that the evidence, and not merely its materiality, be newly discovered; second, that the evidence be not cumulative merely; third, that it be such as to render a different result probable on a retrial of the cause; fourth, that the party could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced it at the trial; and, fifth, that these facts be shown by the best evidence of which the case admits." Hayne, New Trial & App. § 88. In support of his motion the plaintiff filed two affidavits, and these were met by counter-affidavits on the part of defendants. After carefully reading all of the affidavits, we are of the opinion, assuming what is said in them to be true, that the court below acted rightly in denying the motion, as a retrial probably would not and ought not to produce any different result.

We find nothing in the record which calls for a reversal of the judgment, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PROMISSORY NOTE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Suit was brought on an instrument reading as follows: "$1,000. Three years from date, I promise to pay to Daniel Strickland, for value received, in United States gold coin, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annual," and dated and signed. Held a valid promissory note.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Action upon a written instrument, brought by Daniel Strickland against Ellen E. Holbrooke. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Cross & Simonds and A. B. Dibble, for appellant. A. J. Ridge and J. I. Caldwell, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought against Ellen E. Holbrooke, to recover a money judgment upon a writing as follows:

"GRASS VALLEY, July 8, 1882.

"$1,000. Three years from date, I promise to pay to Daniel Strickland, for value received, in United States gold coin, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annual.

DANIEL P. HOLBROOKE.

"ELLEN E. HOLBROOKE."

Had the $1,000, in figures and dollar-mark, been expressed in words, the writing would have read thus:

"GRASS VALLEY, July 8, 1882.

"One thousand dollars. Three years from date, I promise to pay Daniel Strickland, for value received, in United States gold coin, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annual.

DANIEL P. HOLBROOKE.

¹Where the maker's obligation is not an independent, absolute, and unconditional one for the payment of a precise and definite sum of money, at all events, without contingency, the instrument is not a promissory note. Edwards v. Ramsey, (Minn.) 14 N. W. Rep. 272.

The action was brought upon this instrument as if it was a promissory note for the payment of money. The prayer of the complaint was a judgment against Ellen E. Holbrooke for $1,000, and interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from date. A demurrer to the complaint being overruled, an answer was filed denying all the allegations of the first-mentioned pleading. Judgment was rendered as prayed for, and an order made denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. From the judgment and order this appeal is taken.

The instrument above set out was offered in evidence. It was objected to, but admitted by the court. It was read, and the plaintiff offered evidence which tended to prove that no portion of the principal sum of money or interest thereon had ever been paid. The defendant offered no evidence whatever. The question for determination is, what is the legal effect of the alleged promissory note? To us it seems that by the terms thereof, at Grass Valley, on the 8th of July, 1882, Daniel P. and Ellen E. Holbrooke, $1,000, three years after said 8th of July, 1882, promised to pay Daniel Strickland, for value received, in United States gold coin, with 10 per cent. per annum; or, what is the same thing, at Grass Valley, on the 8th day of July, 1882, Daniel P. and Ellen E. Holbrooke promised to pay, three years after the said 8th day of July, 1882, Daniel Strickland, $1,000 in United States gold coin, for value received, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from said last-mentioned date. Taking the whole instrument, in all its terms, it is evident that it was a written engagement, by the signers thereof, to pay a certain sum of money at a certain time, with interest from the date of the instrument, for value received. The sum or amount of such an instrument need not necessarily be expressed in words; if expressed in figures or ciphers, it has the same effect. Story, Prom. Notes, §§ 20, 21. No particular form of words is necessary to constitute such a writing. The form of it may be varied at the pleasure of the individual executing it, provided that in all cases the form adopted amounts, in legal effect, to a written promise for the payment of money, absolutely and at all events, and it interferes with no statute regulation. Id. § 12. The instrument in question needed no correction or addition to or subtraction of words therefrom, to make it a promissory note. It was just as certainly a promise to pay, for value received, $1,000 in gold coin, three years after a certain date, with interest at a certain rate, as if the $1,000 had been written after the word "pay" in the body of the note, instead of being written, as it was, before the word "three." For these reasons we are of the opinion that the judgment and order of the court below should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROBABLE CAUSE—COMMITMENT ON PRELIMINARY HEARING.

In an action for malicious prosecution, it appeared that plaintiff won money from defendant on a wager; that defendant threatened to have plaintiff arrested if he did not return such money; that plaintiff was arrested, at defendant's instance, and committed on a charge of larceny; that an information, duly filed, charging plaintiff with such crime, was dismissed for want of evidence. Held, that such commitment was only prima facie evidence of probable cause for such prosecution, and that it was fully rebutted by the other evidence.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

¹See, also, Finchim v. Com., (Va.) 3 S. E. Rep. 343, and note.

Action by John Diemer against John Herber for malicious prosecution. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

L. Quint, for appellant. Edw. Salomon, (Henry Eickhoff, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action for damages for a malicious prosecution. A jury was impaneled to try the issues joined, and evidence was introduced on the part of the plaintiff. Thereupon the defendant moved for a nonsuit, and it was granted. From the judgment therein given and made, and from an order refusing a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted. The facts of the case as they appeared in evidence are as follows: The plaintiff and the defendant got into a discussion as to whether any watch could be found in San Francisco which would run longer than a week without being wound up. The defendant was willing to bet five dollars against a hundred that no such watch could be produced. Finally the parties each bet and put up a hundred dollars; the plaintiff betting that sum that he could, and the defendant betting that he could not, produce such a watch. Then the plaintiff produced a watch that he said would run longer than a week, and was told by the defendant to take the money which had been put upon the wager. The plaintiff, in accordance with this permission and request, took the money, and went out of the defendant's premises. In a very few minutes the defendant sent a messenger after him to bring back the money, or he would be arrested. The plaintiff, thinking he had won the money fairly, treated the demand with scorn. Afterwards, through his attorney and others, the defendant endeavored to induce the plaintiff to return the whole, and then a part, of the money; one of the propositions made being that, if the plaintiff would pay back $50, the defendant would "have it published in all the papers in San Francisco that he was wrong." Finally, the defendant and one McPherson came to the plaintiff to see him about the matter, and were told that the plaintiff would not pay a cent. Then the defendant had the plaintiff arrested, and, after a preliminary examination, he was bound over to the superior court to answer a charge of grand larceny. An information was duly filed against the plaintiff accusing him of that crime in stealing $100 from the defendant. This information was dismissed, upon motion of the prosecuting attorney, for the reason that there was "no evidence to convict." The plaintiff then instituted this action.

As the matter appears to us, the defendant having made a foolish bet in a vein of braggadocio, and given up the money he had staked, repented of it in a very short time, and sought to get his money back. Finding that the person he had bet with treated the affair as serious, he tried the influence of lawyers and friends to get back that which he had thus wagered. This not bringing about the desired result, he had the defendant arrested, charged with an infamous offense, and he sued him, also, civilly, to recover the money, and obtained a judgment. He succeeded by this latter means in accomplishing the desired result. From the evidence before us there does not appear to have been the least ground to believe that the plaintiff had committed a larceny; and it is hardly comprehensible how the defendant could have believed, in good faith, that such a crime had been committed. The whole affair, so far as the defendant is concerned, exhibits a reckless disregard of the rights and character of the plaintiff, and a willingness to resort unjustly, and without any proper foundation, to the harsh arm of the law, in the shape of a criminal prosecution. The fact that plaintiff was held to answer by the committing magistrate does not alter the case. The fact is prima facie evidence of probable cause, (Ganea v. Railroad, 51 Cal. 140,) but it is not conclusive. That is to say, if the defendant was clearly guilty of having instituted a malicious prosecution against plaintiff without probable cause, the fact that the committing magistrate held plaintiff to answer does not take away the malice, or establish conclusively that there was probable cause. We do not understand the case of Jones v. Jones, 71 Cal. 89, 11 Pac. Rep. 817, or Hahn v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 284, to be in conflict with the foregoing. Those cases, as we understand them, went upon the theory that there was reliance upon the advice of counsel after a full disclosure of the fact; the counsel being the officers designated by the law to act in such affairs.

The judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

GERLACH v. TERRY. (No. 9,923.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE OF DEMANDS—EVIDENCE.

In an action against an administrator for medical services, where the answer denied the employment of plaintiff by deceased, evidence that one T. and deceased had lived together for many years as husband and wife, and that plaintiff stated that he looked to T., who employed him, for payment and not to deceased, was admissible as tending to show that deceased did not employ plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by George Gerlach against L. A. Terry, administrator of the estate of Mary J. Turner, for medical services rendered deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

A. P. Needles, for appellant. Stetson & Houghton, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. Plaintiff instituted this action to recover a sum of money for services as a physician, performed, as he alleged, at the special instance and request of the defendant's decedent. The court below gave judgment in favor of the defendant, and from that and an order refusing a new trial the plaintiff has appealed.

There seems to have been no conflict as to any of the allegations of the complaint, except as to whether or not the services had been rendered at the request of the decedent, and on her employment of the physician. The complaint alleged that the physician had performed the services at the special instance and request of the reputed Mrs. Turner, and the answer denied that such was the case. It is claimed that all the evidence, which tended to show the marital relations between the decedent and J. W. Turner, which the court below allowed to be introduced on the trial, was not admissible, because the answer did not set up as a special defense the coverture of the decedent. "Anything which rebuts the idea of a contract, express or implied, is proper evidence," where an action is brought for services rendered on a contract to pay for them, either express or implied. Angulo v. Sunol, 14 Cal. 403. According to the evidence in this cause, Turner had lived for many years with the decedent, openly claiming her as his wife, and the marriage ceremony had been performed between them, both, at that time, being in ignorance of the fact that Turner was not divorced from a former wife. It was also in evidence that when the decedent was taken sick, in her last illness her reputed husband, Turner, employed Dr. Gerlach, and that Dr. Gerlach afterwards, while attending her, stated that he looked to him for payment, and not to the decedent.

As it appears to us the evidence introduced as to the marriage of the parties was not introduced for the purpose of showing that Turner was responsible for medical services performed for his wife, as such, and under cover-ture, but that it was introduced for the purpose of showing the relations actually existing between the parties, which, taken in connection with the other evidence in the case, tended to show the probability of the defense set up, viz., that the decedent did not employ the plaintiff, but that the person who, in all respects, had in good faith for many years assumed towards her the relation of a husband, and towards whom she, in the same way, had held the relations of a wife, had made the contract of employment. This certainly went to rebut the allegation that she had employed Dr. Gerlach, and requested the services which he rendered, viz., had made a contract for them as was alleged in the complaint. The findings seem to us responsive to the issues made by the pleadings, and are supported by the evidence. We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C. C.

HAYNE, C. I concur on the ground that while the valuable services received by the deceased constituted sufficient consideration to support the subsequent promise to pay which, I think, the evidence shows was made, yet the terms of such promise seem to me to bring it within the statute of frauds, as being a promise to pay the debt of another.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SNYDER. (No. 20,376.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 21, 1888.)

RAPE—INDICTMENT—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Under Pen. Code Cal. § 261, which defines rape as an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female, not the wife of the perpetrator, under the following circumstances: With a child of tender years; with a lunatic or insane woman; by intimidation; by the administration of intoxicating or narcotic substances, etc.—it is sufficient if the information charge that the crime was committed by force, violence, and against the will of the prosecuting witness; and it is not necessary to set out the exact circumstances, as described in the subdivisions of the Code, by which the crime was accomplished.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

John D. Whaley, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The information charges the appellant with the crime of rape, and the jury found him guilty. The charging language of the information, after proper averments of time, place, etc., is that the defendant, "with force and arms, in and upon one Louisa Bell, a female over the age of ten years, who was not then and there the wife of the said John H. Snyder, violently and feloniously did make an assault, and her, the said Louisa Bell, then and there, to-wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, feloniously did ravish and carnally know, and accomplish with her an act of sexual intercourse, by force, violence, and against her will and resistance, contrary to the form," etc.; and the main contention of appellant is that there was a fatal variance between the information and the proofs. This contention is that while the information charges the crime to have been committed by force, violence, etc., the proof shows that it was committed (if at all) by means of an intoxicating or narcotic substance administered to the prosecuting witness by the accused; and that under section 261 of the Penal Code an information charging the crime to have been committed by force cannot be supported by proof showing it to have been committed by fraud or artifice.

The common-law definition of rape was "the carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly, and against her will." 4 Bl. Comm. 210. And the indictment was substantially in the form of the information in the case at bar. And, through decisions made from time to time, it gradually came to be the settled law (although there are cases to the contrary) that under such an indictment it was competent and sufficient to prove that the act charged was committed upon a child of tender years, incapable of consent; upon a lunatic or insane woman; by intimidation; when the woman was unconscious of the nature of the act; by the administration of intoxicating or narcotic substances; by false personation of a husband, etc. The criminal law of this state followed the common-law definition of the crime down to the adoption of the Codes. Hitt. Gen. Laws, 1449. Section 261 of the Penal Code commences as follows: "Rape is an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female, not the wife of the perpetrator, under either of the following circumstances." Then follow six subdivisions which recite substantially the things which, as above briefly indicated, could be proven under the general, common-law indictment. And the position taken by appellant really is that the indictment and the proof must follow, and be confined to, one of the six subdivisions of the section. We think the true construction of section 261 to be that thereby the legislature meant merely to put beyond doubt the rule that on an information for rape the things mentioned in the subdivisions could be proven, and would establish the crime. It is not intended to alter or establish a rule of pleading, or to create six different kinds of crime. Now, as before the adoption of the Code, under an indictment similar to the information in this case, any of the matters mentioned in section 261 may be proved. They are included in the words, "by force and violence, and against her will," and "did feloniously ravish," as fully now as they were then.

2. The court properly allowed evidence of the fact that the injured party made complaint of the injury while it was recent, and the point that evidence should not have been admitted showing that she named the defendant in her complaint has no basis in the record.

3. We cannot say that the evidence did not warrant the verdict.

There are no other points which require special notice. Judgment and order denying new trial affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; PATERSON, J.; MCKINSTRY, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; TEMPLE, J.; THORNTON, J.

75 Cal. 258

In re Estate of DORSEY. (No. 12,195.)
(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—PRIVATE SALES.

An administrator cannot object to granting the petition of a creditor that the property of a deceased person be sold at public auction to pay the debts of the intestate, on the ground that it could be more advantageously sold at private sale, as Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1544, provides that sales of the kind in question must be made at public auction, unless in the opinion of the court it would be more beneficial to sell it in whole or in part at private sale.

2. SAME—NOTICE OF SALE.

Where the court on the 3d of March ordered property to be sold at private sale on or before the 9th of the next April, there was sufficient time given under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1549, which provides that notice of the sale must be posted and published for two weeks successively next before the day on or after which the sale is to be made, and "the notice must state a day on or after which the sale will be made, and a place where offers or bids will be received. The day last referred to must be at least 15 days from the first publication of notice; and the sale must not be made before that day, but must be made within six months thereafter."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

F. W. Street, for appellant. F. D. Nichol, for respondent.

v.17p.no.4—14

BELCHER, C. C. It appears from the record that Caleb Dorsey died at Sonora, in the county of Tuolumne, on the 28th day of March, 1885. In July following, Esther M. Dorsey was duly appointed and qualified as administratrix of his estate. The estate consisted of a small amount of personal property, a dwelling-house and lot in Sonora, several gold mines and interests in mines, and a water-ditch and water-right connected therewith. By an order of the court the dwelling-house and lot were set aside for the use of the administratrix and her family. Claims against the estate were presented and allowed, aggregating more than $7,800. In October, 1885, an order was made and entered by the court authorizing the administratrix to sell all the mining properties and ditch at private sale, but no bids were received, and no sales effected. On the 25th day of January, 1887, George Winnie—the largest creditor of the estate—presented to the court a petition, which, after setting out the necessary facts, asked that an order be made directing that all the real property of the estate (except the portion thereof set aside for the family of deceased) be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash. After due notice, this petition was heard, and on the 3d day of March an order was made, authorizing and directing the administratrix to sell at public auction, and in one parcel or subdivisions, as she should judge most beneficial to the estate, the ditch and all the mines and interests in mines belonging to the estate, except the mine known as the "Lady Washington Mine," or so much thereof as should be necessary. The order further directed that the Lady Washington mine be sold at private sale, "said sale to be made on or before the 9th day of April, 1887." The administratrix was present at the hearing of the petition, and objected to having the property sold at public auction, on the ground that a private sale would be most beneficial to the estate and to the creditors thereof. The appeal is by the administratrix from the order as made, and from the whole thereof.

In support of the appeal it is urged that the court erred in ordering the property to be sold at public auction, when, in the judgment of the administratrix, it could be more beneficially disposed of at private sale. It is said that the court should have accepted and acted on her judgment in the matter. The objection is met and fully answered by the Code. Section 1544, Code Civil Proc., providing for sales of the kind in question, says: "Every such sale must be ordered to be made at public auction, unless, in the opinion of the court, it would benefit the estate to sell the whole or some part of such real estate at private sale. The court may, if the same is asked for in the petition, order or direct such real estate, or any part thereof, to be sold at either public or private sale, as the executor or administrator shall judge to be most beneficial for the estate." Under this provision all sales must be made at public auction, unless, in the opinion of the court, the best interests of the estate would be subserved by a private sale. When, however, a private sale is asked for, the court may act upon the opinion of the executor or administrator, and order such a sale to be made. In this case a private sale was not asked for, and there is nothing in the record to show that the judgment of the court was not properly exercised.

It is also urged that the court erred in requiring the sale of the Lady Washington mine to be made on or before the 9th day of April, 1887. It is said that it would have been impossible for the administratrix to have complied with the order, and section 1549, Code Civil Proc., is cited in support of the contention. That section provides that notice of the sale must be posted and published for two weeks successively next before the day on or after which the sale is to be made. "The notice must state a day on or after which the sale will be made, and a place where offers or bids will be received. The day last referred to must be at least fifteen days from the first publication of notice; and the sale must not be made before that day, but must be made within six months thereafter." As the order was made on the 3d day of March, we are unable to see why the administratrix could not have complied with it. Suppose, for instance, the notice had been published on the 4th day of March, and the 20th day of the same month had been designated as the day on or after which the sale would be made, there would then have been left 16 days during which offers or bids might have been received. Certainly this might have been, and, so far as we are advised, was a sufficiently long time within which to make the sale.

We find no errors in the record, and the order appealed from should, therefore, be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

75 Cal. 306

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. (No. 20,379.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

1. HOMICIDE—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION—ASSUMPTION OF GUILT

The court in an instruction on voluntary drunkenness, as determining the degree of an offense, said: "In this case, if the killing was willful, that is, intentional, deliberate, and premeditated, it is murder in the first degree; otherwise, it may be murder in the second degree, or manslaughter, as the evidence may convince your minds;" but in concluding the instruction added: "I desire to say, in connection with these instructions, that I do not intend to intimate to you, or tell you in any way, whether this defendant is guilty of any crime or not;" and the jury were fully instructed that the prosecution must establish every essential fact beyond a reasonable doubt. Held, that the inadvertence in assuming guilt of defendant was fully cured by the context, and the correction of the court.

2. SAME—MANSLAUGHTER—MODIFICATION OF INSTRUCTION.

It is proper for the court to qualify an instruction asked to the effect that unless it was established by the evidence that the killing was unlawful, and with malice aforethought, they must acquit, by adding "of the crime of murder."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; L. D. FREER, Judge. The defendant, Williams, was indicted for murder, and, being convicted of manslaughter, appeals.

W. J. Herrin, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was tried for murder, and, being convicted of manslaughter, appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. There is no bill of exceptions, however, in the record, and we have before us only the judgment roll.

The first exception urged here is as to the refusal of the court to give an instruction, asked by the defendant, to the effect that, if the killing was done in necessary self-defense, the defendant must be acquitted. This proposition is fully covered by instructions which were given.

It is next objected that the court instructed the jury as follows: "In this case, if the killing was willful, that is, intentional, deliberate, and premeditated, it is murder in the first degree; otherwise, it may be murder in the second degree, or manslaughter, as the evidence may convince your minds." Taken by itself, this instruction is, no doubt, defective, in assuming the guilt of defendant. We may assume, however, that the fact of killing by defendant was admitted. This is an extract from a lengthy instruction on the subject of voluntary drunkenness, and the court was explaining the proposition that, although such intoxication does not excuse crime, yet it may be considered in determining the degree of the offense. Taken with the context, the extract plainly means, "In this case, if a crime has been committed by the defendant while in a state of voluntary intoxication, if the killing was willful," etc. In concluding the instruction upon the subject, the judge added: "I desire to say, in connection with these instructions, that I do not intend to intimate to you, or to tell you in any way, whether this defendant was guilty of any crime or not. I call attention to this because, as I remember now, that, in giving part of one instruction which I just read to you, I omitted to state that which I should have stated at the time." The jury were very fully instructed as to the burden of proof, and that the prosecution must establish every essential fact beyond a reasonable doubt. We think the inadvertence was fully cured. Not conceding that there was error, in any possible view, in telling the jury that, in determining the weight to be given to the testimony of the witnesses, they should consider the character and appearance of the witnesses, it is enough, for this appeal, to say that we cannot tell that evidence was not before the jury as to the character of each witness called.

The judge very properly qualified the instruction asked to the effect that unless it was established by the evidence that the killing was unlawful, and with malice aforethought, they must acquit, by adding "of the crime of murder." Admitting that the charge contains an instruction upon the subject of insanity, we cannot say, in the absence of a bill of exceptions containing the evidence, that it was not warranted by some issue in the case. There is no such plea as insanity, and we do not know that the issue did not arise at the trial. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: SÉARLS, C. J.; MCKINSTRY, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; THORNTON, J.; PATERSON, J.

GWINN v. HAMILTON. (No. 12,128.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

1. APPEAL—FORMER APPEAL—EFFECT OF DECISION.

Where the court, upon a former appeal, held that the complaint stated a cause of action, its sufficiency cannot be again called in question.

2. SAME—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

When the evidence is conflicting, and upon the whole testimony it cannot be said that the court below came to a wrong conclusion upon such evidence, the judgment must be affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. B. MCFARLAND, Judge.

For former appeal, see 7 Pac. Rep. 837.

This was an action by Belden R. Gwinn against David Hamilton, the administrator of his father's estate, Harrison Gwinn, deceased, to recover a sum of money for labor and services alleged to have been performed by the son for the father. After the institution of the action Belden R. Gwinn died, and his administrator, John M. Gwinn, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Ball & Craig, W. H. Beatty, and S. C. Denson, for appellant. Armstrong & Hinkson, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action for services rendered by a son to his father. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $605, and the defendant appeals.

1. It is contended that the complaint does not state a cause of action. But we think that matter was concluded by the decision on the former appeal. Upon the first trial judgment was rendered for plaintiff for $2,328.87, and the defendant appealed. The judgment was reversed because a great part of the demand was considered to be barred by the statute of limitations. This of course did not involve the sufficiency of the complaint. But the question of the sufficiency of the complaint was the main point discussed, and as we understand the opinion the court decided against the defendant, and held that the complaint stated a cause of action. We readily concede that the rule as to the law of the case does not protect mere dicta. But a decision upon a point which arose in the case, and was decided, is not a dictum, although it was not necessary to the disposition of the appeal. Table Mountain v. Stranahan, 21 Cal. 551; and compare Olney v. Sawyer, 54 Cal. 384, 385; Camron v. Kenfield, 57 Cal. 553, 554; San Francisco v. Water-Works, 53 Cal. 610. Doubtless the counsel for the plaintiff relied upon the decision, and it would be unjust to suffer the sufficiency of the complaint to be again called in question. If the complaint is held to be sufficient, the finding by reference to it is sufficient. McEwen v. Johnson, 7 Cal. 260; Pralus v. Mining Co., 35 Cal. 34, 35; Carey v. Brown, 58 Cal. 184; Moore v. Clear Lake Co., 63 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. Rep. 816; Johnson v. Klein, 70 Cal. 186, 11 Pac. Rep. 606. Possibly the reference in question would not cover the plea of the statute of limitations. But that point is not raised by counsel, and we do not think that the circumstances are such as to require us to notice it.

2. It is urged that the defendant should have been allowed a credit of $566.48, which was the price of a crop of grain raised upon the land of a third person. The evidence seems to us to justify the respondent's contention that this crop was put in by the son and one St. Louis for their own benefit, and that this was with the consent of the father. There is some evidence against this view. Thus it was shown that the son used father's team for the work, and that the father paid a man to assist in harvesting the crop. On the other hand, the son evidently made the cropping contract in his own name, and ostensibly for his own benefit. This was the understanding of the owner of the land. For he says: "I judged his father let him have the team to give him a show." And it was proven that on one occasion, when the father was asked whether the cropping contract was not an extension of his business, he said: "I've got nothing to do with it; it is Belden's." And he further said "that his crop was all in, and that Belden could have his team to put in the crop." The subsequent remark about "running the ranch" appears to us to refer to the ranch upon which they lived, and not the place where this crop was put in. Upon the whole testimony we cannot say that the court below came to a wrong conclusion as to this matter. The other matters do not seem to require special notice. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEEK v. PEEK. (No. 12,315.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

APPEAL—SUBMISSION ON BRIEFS—DELAY IN FILING.

In a cause to be submitted on briefs filed, the appellant failed to file his brief at the time fixed in the order, and the respondent then filed a document containing no argument, but simply asking for judgment on the ground of default. Some time after, without leave of court, or giving any reason for the default, appellant filed his brief. Held, that respondent was not entitled to the judgment requested, but that he was not in default, and could have time to file his brief on the merits.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; HENRY M. WILLIS, Judge.

Rowell & Rowell, Harris & Allen, and Wells, Vandyke & Lee, for appellant. H. C. Rolfe, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. On October 5th the court ordered that the cause be submitted on briefs to be filed,—the appellant to file his opening brief within 30 days, the respondent to have 30 days to answer, and the appellant 10 days to reply. The appellant neglected to file his opening brief, and on November 26th the respondent filed a document which contained no argument, but simply called attention to the defendant's default, and asked that the judgment and order be affirmed. About three weeks after this the appellant's counsel, without (so far as the record shows) having obtained any extension of time, either from the court or counsel, and without the permission of the court, and without offering any excuse for their default, placed their brief on file; and in this condition of affairs the case is sent to us for examination.

The rule is that where the appellant neither makes an oral argument nor files any brief, the court will affirm the judgment without an examination of the record. Hickinbotham v. Monroe, 28 Cal. 489; Brewster v. Johnson, 51 Cal. 222; Faris v. Lampson, 14 Pac. Rep. 674; Scott v. Sowden, 16 Pac. Rep. 768, (filed February 21, 1888.) The respondent, having waited a reasonable time after the default of appellant, had a right to invoke this rule without submitting an argument on the merits; there being nothing for him to reply to. And although we think it would have been better for him to have submitted an argument upon the merits, or to have ascertained the intention of opposing counsel as to filing of a brief, he is not in default for not doing so. But there being a brief on file for appellant,—although improperly so,—we think it would be harsh to apply the rule invoked by respondent; but the respondent, not being in default, has a right to be heard, and we do not think the cause should be disposed of in the absence of an argument in his behalf. The cause of the waste of time and labor occurring in this case is the neglect of the appellant's counsel. They had no right to disregard the order of this court as to the time of filing briefs. The dispatch of business requires some order in the proceedings; and the learned counsel for the appellant will readily see that if they are at liberty to disregard the orders and rules of the court, every other counsel would be equally at liberty to do so, which would produce an undesirable confusion. The court has always been liberal in relieving against defaults. But it is hardly respectful for the counsel to place their briefs on file after the expiration of the time allowed therefore, without the permission of the court or the consent of opposing counsel. We think that where such a course results in a waste of time, and imposes additional labor on an overburdened court, it should be discouraged, and to that end that the brief of appellant be considered as improperly on file, and that it be allowed to remain only as an argument on the merits, all the technical points as to the admissibility of evidence being taken to be waived, and that the respondent be permitted to file a brief on the merits. In the briefs to be filed we think the attention of counsel should be called to the question whether the contract upon which the defendant relies is not within the statute of frauds; (see Civil Code, § 178, and section 1624, subsec. 3; Lloyd v. Fulton, 91 U. S. 480; Browne, St. Frauds, § 215;) and, if so, whether there was such a part performance as to take the case out of the statute. See Dundas v. Dutens, 1 Ves. Jr. 199.

We therefore advise that the submission of the cause be set aside, with leave to respondent to file a brief within 30 days, the appellant to have 30 days to reply.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the submission of the above cause is set aside, with leave to respondent to file a brief within 30 days, the appellant to have 30 days to reply.

PEOPLE v. GRUNDELL. (No. 20,359.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

I. CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—CONSENT OF DEFENDANT—RECORD.

Upon a trial for larceny, the recorded affidavit of the committing magistrate failed to set out that all the continuances were with the consent of the defendant, but the affidavit of the attorney prosecuting so alleged, and was opposed by only the counter-affidavit of the defendant. Held, the record does not show such want of consent as to violate Pen. Code Cal. § 861, providing that a postponement cannot be had * * * unless by consent, or on motion of the defendant.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—REPORTER'S TRANSCRIPT OF TESTIMONY.

Upon a trial for larceny, the admission in evidence of the reporter's transcript of the testimony of a deposing witness is not error, under Pen. Code Cal. § 864, placing the reporter's certified transcript of the testimony of a deposing witness, when properly filed, on the same footing as depositions; and section 1345, providing that depositions may be read in evidence by either party upon the trial, etc.

3. SAME.

The provision of Pen. Code Cal. § 869, stating that a reporter shall, within 10 days after the close of taking a deposition, * * * file with the clerk a certified copy of his notes, transcribed in long-hand, is merely directory, and the deposition is admissible in evidence, if the filing is within a reasonable time.

4. SAME—DEPOSITIONS—DESCRIPTION OF DEPOSING WITNESS.

A deposition which states that the deposing witness is a boy 16 years of age, living with his brother on a place in the mountains, contains a sufficient designation of the deponent's business or profession, under Pen. Code Cal. § 869, which provides that a deposition must state the business or profession of the deponent.

5. SAME—REPORTER'S ORIGINAL NOTES.

A record must show affirmatively that the reporter's "original notes" of a deposition are not on file with the transcript, before it will have violated Pen. Code Cal. § 869, providing that a reporter shall file his "original notes" of a deposition with the clerk, together with the transcript of the same.

6. SAME—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

A defendant, on trial for larceny, having appeared by counsel, and consented that the testimony of a deposing witness be taken down and read in evidence, cannot, upon the trial, object to the reading of such deposition on the ground that it does not conform to all of the provisions of the Penal Code relating to depositions.

7. SAME—EVIDENCE—OF ACCOMPLICE.

The testimony of an accomplice, upon the trial of the principal for stealing a steer, is admissible in evidence; and finding the hide and entrails of the missing animal buried in the principal's back-yard is sufficient corroboration of accomplice testimony to sustain conviction.

PATERSON, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; D. BELDEN, Judge.

M. H. Hyland, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HAYNE, C. The appellant was convicted of grand larceny, and sentenced to one year in the state prison. Several points are made on the appeal.

1. A motion was made in the superior court to set aside the information, on the ground that the committing magistrate had continued the hearing without an affidavit, or the consent of the defendant, as provided by section 861 of the Penal Code. Without expressing any opinion as to whether this section is merely directory or not, it is sufficient to say that from the record before us it cannot be determined that the continuance was not by consent. The magistrate says in his affidavit that the examination was set by consent for the 30th of March, and was begun on that day; that, when the prosecution rested, the hearing was continued for 10 days, at the request of the defendant; and that before the expiration of that time he was taken sick, and was unable to transact business before May 17th; but he does not state whether the intervening continuance was by consent or not. The assistant district attorney, who had charge of the case, says in his affidavit that "each and all of said continuances were with the knowledge and consent of defendant and each of his counsel." As we construe this, it includes the continuance complained of. The only opposing evidence is the affidavit of the prisoner himself. The affidavit of his then counsel is significantly absent. The court below evidently did not believe the statement of the defendant, and we do not see that it was bound to do so.

2. At the trial, the prosecution read in evidence, against the defendant's objection, the short-hand reporter's transcript of the testimony of one Lewis, given before the committing magistrate, and this is assigned as error. Section 869 of the Penal Code provides for the taking down of such testimony "as a deposition," and that "the transcript of the reporter, appointed as aforesaid, when written out in long-hand writing, and certified as being a correct statement of such testimony and proceedings in the case, shall be prima facie a correct statement of such testimony and proceedings." And the section goes on to provide that "the reporter shall, within ten days after the close of such examination, if the defendant be held to answer the charge, transcribe into long-hand writing his said short-hand notes, and certify and file the same with the county clerk of the county or city and county in which the defendant was examined, and shall in all cases file his original notes with said clerk." In the case of Reid v. Reid, 14 Pac. Rep. 781, it was held by department 2 that section 273, Code Civil Proc., did not render the unfiled transcript of the reporter admissible as evidence. But that case is not similar to this. In the first place, the transcript in that case was not filed, and stress was laid upon that circumstance in the opinion. In this case it was filed. Such a transcript, when filed by the officer in pursuance of a provision of law, may be regarded as in the nature of an official entry. Code Civil Proc. § 1920. The publicity of such a record is a safeguard against the dangers mentioned in Reid v. Reid. Such a document is quite a different thing from the unfiled and unsworn certificate of one who may no longer be an officer, produced at the trial from the pocket of one of the parties. In the second place, the statute is different from that considered in Reid v. Reid. Section 869 of the Penal Code places such transcripts upon the footing of depositions. And by section 1345 depositions "may be read in evidence by either party at the trial, upon its appearing that the witness is unable to attend by reason of his death, insanity, sickness, or infirmity, or of his continued absence from the state." There is no provision placing reporters' transcripts in civil cases upon the footing of depositions. For these reasons the case of Reid v. Reid is not in point. We think it sufficiently appeared that the witness was out of the jurisdiction, and therefore it was proper to read the deposition in evidence. People v. Oiler, 66 Cal. 102, 4 Pac. Rep. 1066.

There are, however, several objections taken to the form of the deposition. (a) It is said that it appears that the deposition was not filed within 10 days after the close of the examination, as required by the provision above quoted. But we think that the specification as to time is directory, merely. If the filing be within a reasonable time, it is sufficient; and we are not prepared to say that the time in this case was unreasonable. (b) It is said that the deposition was not admissible, "because it did not show the business or profession of the deponent." But it states that he was a boy of 16 years of age, living with his brother on a place in the Santa Cruz mountains. At that age it is not to be presumed that he had any business or profession, especially as he was living with his brother. Under the circumstances, we think the objection was properly overruled. (c) It is said that the "original notes" of the reporter were not filed with the transcript, as required by the section; but the record does not show that they were not filed. The presumption is in support of the judgment, and it is the duty of the appellant to make an alleged error apparent from the record. It may be that it appeared that the original notes were on file. Clark v. Sawyer, 48 Cal. 141, 142. The same may be said as to the want of a certificate and signature, although objections on these latter grounds were not taken at the trial, and are not argued in the briefs. It is to be observed that what is here said relates to the construction of the record, and not to the showing to be made at the trial.

3. The prosecution also read in advance the deposition of one Rost, which was taken before Judge BELDEN in open court, and written down by the reporter of the court. Certain objections were taken to the mode of authentication of this deposition, and also that there was no proof that the witness could not be produced at the trial. It appears, however, that the defendant appeared by his counsel in open court, and consented that the "deposition of Ernest Rost, a witness detained in custody to testify, may be taken; that the said testimony of the said witness be taken down by the short-hand reporter of this court, and the same may be by him hereafter written out, and said written notes of the direct and cross examination read in evidence upon the trial of said cause, with the same force and effect as if said witness were himself present and testifying." This was an express consent that this identical deposition should be read in evidence at the trial. There was no condition that it should be shown that the witness could not be produced. The deposition was taken as provided in the stipulation, and is to be governed by it, and not by the provisions as to depositions in the Penal Code. In this view the certificate was unnecessary.

4. It is said that the above-mentioned depositions were not admissible, or sufficient to support the conviction, because the witnesses were accomplices. But the objection that a witness was an accomplice does not go to the admissibility, but only to the effect, of his evidence. In this case, if it be assumed that there was such knowledge on the part of Rost as to make him an accomplice, we think that the other evidence to the effect that the owner missed his steer, and shortly afterwards its hide and some entrails were found buried in defendant's back-yard, is sufficient corroboration of the accomplice. See People v. Cleveland, 49 Cal. 577; People v. Cloonan, 50 Cal. 449; People v. Kunz, 14 Pac. Rep. 836. The court below informed the jury of the rule as to the testimony of an accomplice, in its oral charge, to which no exception was taken.

The other matters do not require special notice. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

OTTO v. JOURNEYMEN TAILORS' PROTECTIVE & BENEVOLENT UNION OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 11,645.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 21, 1888.)

1. BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES—PUNISHMENT OF MEMBERS—RIGHT OF EXPULSION.

Where the only penalty imposed by the constitution and by-laws of an unincorporated tailors' benevolent union against members working for parties against whom a strike has been declared is a fine, the expulsion of a member for such an offense is invalid.

2. SAME—GOOD FAITH.

A member, in good standing, of an unincorporated association having a benevolent fund, in the benefit of which such member is entitled to participate, was expelled from the association on a charge for which the only penalty provided was a fine, and was afterwards reinstated in order that he might be again expelled on a charge of conspiracy to injure and destroy the association, in reality the same offense for which he was first expelled. Held, that he is entitled to an order from the court commanding the association to restore him to membership, and to the rights and privileges incident thereto.

3. SAME—INTERFERENCE OF THE COURT.

A member of an unincorporated benevolent association will not be bound by the decision, made in bad faith and maliciously, of the central body of the association, although it is provided in the constitution that any member having a grievance may lay it before such body whose decision shall be final.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

John M. Days, (John C. Hall, of counsel,) for appellant. Rhodes Borden and L. M. Hoefler, (O. P. Evans, of counsel,) for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an appeal from a writ of mandate issued by the superior court, commanding appellant to reinstate the respondent, August Otto, to membership in the society, and to restore him to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of membership therein.

The appellant is, and since 1873 has been, an unincorporated association composed of about 200 persons, tailors by occupation, organized for the purpose of transacting the business of a benevolent association, of improving the condition of its members, and for protection against unjust and arbitrary encroachment of capital. The association has a constitution and by-laws, providing for its government, and has a benevolent fund to which members may, under proper circumstances, become entitled to a certain extent. Plaintiff became a member about October 1, 1883, and continued such in good standing until June 9, 1884, when, as the court finds, he was expelled without any hearing or trial whatever. On May 24, 1884, plaintiff was a regular member, in good standing, of the association and of the benevolent fund branch of the association, and entitled to its pecuniary benefits, when a question arose in reference to the employment of non-members of the association by a firm of tailors, and such proceedings were had that a special meeting of all members of shop meetings was called, at which it was decided by a vote of 89 for and 39 against, to declare a strike against the offending firm, for which plaintiff was laboring. By the constitution and by-laws it is provided that a two-thirds majority of the members shall be necessary to ordering a strike. There were at the time 176 members entitled to vote on the question, of whom two-thirds did not vote, but two-thirds of those present at the meeting did vote in favor of the strike. Plaintiff opposed such strike. He at first expressed a determination to abide by the decision, but finally, upon being offered work by the offending firm, accepted such work, and was therefore expelled from the association, as hereinbefore stated, and all union members were informed thereof, whereby he has since that date, under the rules of the association, been prevented from procuring employment in union shops, which seemed to include most of the better class of shops in the city (San Francisco.) The expulsion was invalid in this: members working for parties against whom a strike is declared are subject to a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100, and no other or further penalty is provided, so far as appears by the constitution and by-laws. On the 17th of July, 1884, the striking members of the union agreed to terminate the strike, and to return to work for the employers of the plaintiff, on the condition that they would discharge the latter, which was done, and the strike thus terminated. On the 13th of October, 1884, the central body of the union rescinded the expulsion of plaintiff, and on the same day of the same month other charges involving conspiracy on the part of plaintiff and others against and to the injury of the society and its members were preferred. The 27th day of October was set for the trial of plaintiff upon the charges, which trial subsequently took place, and plaintiff was found guilty of conspiracy, and expelled from the society. The court below finds as bearing upon this point in substance: First. That the expulsion of June 9th was for working for a firm against whom a strike had been ordered. Second. That the rescission of October 13th was not made in good faith, and was only for the purpose of expelling him again. Third. That the first and second expulsions were for one and the same offense, and was not called "conspiracy" until the charges were drawn by an attorney, and then only that a charge might be formulated which would warrant expulsion, independent of the constitution and by-laws. Fourth. That the trial of October 27th was by the central body, and not by the union as a whole; that this was not fair, was contrary to natural justice; not provided for by the constitution or by-laws, etc. The findings fully sustain the allegations of the petition, and warrant the judgment of the court, provided it is within the province of that tribunal to investigate and question the action of the appellant in expelling plaintiff. Appellant specifies many particulars in which it is claimed the decision of the court is not supported by the evidence. We have examined the testimony and are of opinion that it warrants the findings of the court in all essential particulars. To enumerate the several objections, and specify the evidence in support of the findings excepted to, would extend the decision beyond reasonable limits, without any corresponding benefits to the parties; hence we dismiss this branch of it thus summarily. Courts will interfere for the purpose of protecting property rights of members of unincorporated associations in all proper cases, and, when they take jurisdiction, will follow and enforce, so far as applicable, the rules applying to incorporated bodies of the same character. Respondent, as a member of the association, in good standing, who had paid all his dues and assessments, and who was entitled to participate in the benefit feature of the company, had property rights involved, which, if violated, entitles him to the protection of the courts.

The right of expulsion from associations of this character may be based and upheld upon two grounds: First, a violation of such of the established rules of the association as have been subscribed or assented to by the members, and as provide expulsion for such violation; second, for such conduct as clearly violates the fundamental objects of the association, and if persisted in and allowed would thwart those objects or bring the association into disrepute. We content ourselves with stating the propositions thus broadly, and, for the purposes of this case, need not refer to the numerous authorities defining and limiting the power. In the matter of expulsion the society acts in a quasi judicial character, and, so far as it confines itself to the exercise of the powers vested in it, and in good faith pursues the methods prescribed by its laws, such laws not being in violation of the laws of the land, or any inalienable right of the member, its sentence is conclusive, like that of a judicial tribunal. Com. v. Society, 8 Watts & S. 250; Burt v. Lodge, 44 Mich. 208; 33 N. W. Rep. 13; Robinson v. Lodge, 86 Ill. 598. The courts will, however, decide whether the ground for expulsion is well taken. Hirs. Frat. & Soc. 55; Cotton Exchange v. State, 54 Ga. 668. It has been held in reference to the expulsion of members from societies of this character, that the courts have no right to interfere with the decisions of the societies, except in the following cases: "First. If the decision arrived at was contrary to natural justice, such as the member complained of not having an opportunity to explain misconduct. Secondly. If the rules of the club have not been observed. Thirdly. If the action of the club was malicious and not bona fide." Hirs. Frat. & Soc. 56; Dawkins v. Antrobus, 44 Law T. 557; Lambert v. Addison, 46 Law T. 20.

Article 25 of the appellant's constitution provides as follows: "If any member defrauds this union, he shall be dealt with as the central body may decide." Beyond this no specific provision appears in the constitution or by-laws under which members may be expelled. The contention of appellant is that the power of expulsion is inherent in every society, and that the offense of which plaintiff was found guilty was sufficient ground for expulsion, as matter of law, irrespective of any provision of the constitution or by-laws. We subscribe to that portion of the proposition which asserts the inherent right of expulsion, subject, however, to the limitations hereinbefore expressed. For the purposes of this case we assume, also, without deciding—First, that the charges and specifications against plaintiff were sufficient, upon being proven, to warrant his expulsion under the inherent right so to do mentioned; second, that the "Central Body,"—that is to say, the board of delegates of shop societies, as contradistinguished from the entire body of members, may exercise the power of expulsion. Conceding these propositions, however, (so far as the latter is concerned, we doubt if it can be maintained,) the facts as found by the court still remain, that plaintiff was really and in fact found guilty for no other offense than that for which he was expelled in the first instance, viz., for working for parties against whom a strike had been ordered; that the expulsion was not in good faith, was not fair, and was contrary to natural justice; that the charge of "conspiracy to injure and destroy the union," was in substance but a pretext to punish him for an offense only subjecting him to a fine, in a manner wholly different from the imposition of the penalty provided therefor, etc. We think, as before stated, that there was evidence from which the facts as found were fairly deducible. These facts raise the inevitable conclusion, that the trial and conviction of plaintiff was a travesty upon justice, and lacking in the essential elements of fairness, good faith, and candor, which should characterize the action of men in passing upon the rights of their fellow-men.

We are referred to the provision of appellant's constitution which provides that "any member having a grievance, shall have the right to lay his case before the central body, who shall take action thereon, and whose decision shall be final." No doubt when action is properly taken in the manner indicated, it is final, and the courts will not interfere, but when under the guise of remedying the grievance of a member, the central body acts in bad faith, and maliciously makes the subject of the grievance a pretext for oppression and wrong, its action may, however, to that extent, be the subject of review. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: PATERSON, J., MCKINSTRY, J.

LONGNECKER v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 12,268.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 21, 1888.)

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE OF INSOLVENT—DISCRETION OF THE COURT.

The disposition of a motion to set aside a decree of final discharge in insolvency rests largely on the discretion of the nisi prius court, and will not be reviewed except in case of an abuse of that discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; LEON D. FREER, Judge.

W. R. Felter, one of the creditors of G. H. Longnecker, an insolvent debtor, filed in the superior court an opposition to the insolvent's discharge, which opposition was demurred to. Felter's attorney confessed the demurrer, and 15 days were allowed in which to amend the opposition, but no amended opposition was filed within the time granted, and a default was entered, and the insolvent discharged. The motion to set aside the default was based upon an alleged verbal understanding between the parties as to the filing of the amended opposition.

Albert M. Johnson, for appellant. W. J. Herrin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside a decree of final discharge in insolvency. The motion was based upon the inadvertence, surprise, excusable neglect, etc., of the appellant. The disposition of motions of this kind rests largely in the discretion of the nisi prius court; and in this case we see no such abuse of discretion as would warrant us in disturbing the ruling of the court below. Order affirmed.

In re WILLIAMSON'S ESTATE. (No. 12,226.)
(Supreme Court of California. March 21, 1888.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—AMOUNT OF PROPERTY DEVISED.

Where a will, after declaring that all of testator's property is the common property of himself and wife, recites: "I bequeath to my son * * * all my property, real, personal, or mixed, * * * that is to say, an undivided half interest in said property, leaving the remaining undivided one-half of said community property to my said wife, as the law directs;" and the wife dies before the testator,—her half of the property is not disposed of by the will, and should go to the heirs.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCANN, Judge.

Appeal by Caroline Judd from a decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of William Williamson, deceased.

A. S. Kittredge, for appellant. Julius Lee, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution. The question presented is as to the construction of the will. The will first declares that all of the testator's property is the community property of himself and his wife, Artemesia, who was then living, and that an advancement had been made to his daughter, Caroline Judd, (the appellant here;) and then, after reciting that his son, Robert Samuel Williamson, "by his valuable labor and service, has greatly assisted, and is now greatly assisting, me in making and accumulating my said property," proceeds as follows: "First. I give, bequeath, and devise to my said son, Robert Samuel, * * * all the property, real, personal, or mixed, of whatsoever nature or character, or wheresoever the same may be situated, in or to which I now have, or hereafter may acquire, any right, title, or interest; that is to say, an undivided one-half interest in said property, or all of which I have power under the law to make testamentary disposition, leaving the remaining undivided one-half of said community property to my said wife, Artemesia, as the law directs. Second. I request and desire that my said wife, in case she survives me, by testamentary disposition or otherwise, distribute her portion or half of said community property equally between our said children, Robert Samuel and Caroline, and any others that may be begotten unto us." The wife died before the testator, and the contest is between the two children as to the share which would have gone to the wife had she lived. The court below decided that the son took the whole of such share, and the daughter appeals.

We think the court erred. The testator first used language which, if not limited by what follows, would undoubtedly have given the whole estate to the son. But he immediately defines the sense in which he used the sweeping language by the following: "That is to say, an undivided one-half interest in said property, or all of which I have power under the law to make testamentary disposition." This shows that, when he spoke of bequeathing "all the property" to the son, he meant all over which he supposed he had power of disposition, which was one-half of the community property. And, as if to clinch the matter, he adds this clause: "Leaving the remaining undivided one-half of said community property to my said wife, Artemesia, as the law directs." Now, if the wife had survived the testator, there would have been no doubt at all as to the intention. It would have been perfectly clear that the testator intended the son to take only one-half of the property. The fact that the wife died before the testator does not seem to us to alter the case. The argument that the words, "all of which I have power under the law to make testamentary disposition," show that it was the testator's intention to give to the son the wife's half of the community property, in case he acquired power of disposition over it by her death, is plausible, but not sound. The phrase is used in opposition to the preceding one, viz., "an undivided one-half interest in said property." And the intention of the testator that the whole property should not go to the son at the wife's death is shown by his request to the wife: "I request and desire that my said wife, in case she survives me, by testamentary disposition or otherwise, distribute her portion or half of said community property equally between our said children, Robert Samuel and Caroline, and any others that may be begotten to us." It seems to us that the wife's half was not disposed of by the will, and that it should go to the heirs as the law directs. The learned judge of the court below was led into error by attributing too much force to the sweeping words of disposition first quoted.

No other question has been argued by counsel. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a decree in accordance with the views above expressed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a decree in accordance with the views above expressed.

BAUGHMAN v. REED. (No. 12,141.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 21, 1888.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—RENTING ON SHARES—PARTITION.

Where a tenant under a lease by which he agreed to deliver to the lessor two-fifths of all grain produced on the premises, has raised certain crops of grain which he threatens to convert to his own use, denying the lessor's right to any part, the latter is entitled to a partition, and the appointment of a receiver under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 564, par. 1, providing that a receiver may be appointed in an action between persons jointly interested in any property, on the application of one whose interest is in danger.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Amador county; C. B. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Action by Adam Baughman, surviving partner, against R. B. Reed, for partition of personal property, appointment of a receiver, and for general relief. Demurrer to complaint sustained; judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. The facts sufficiently appear from the opinion.

Lindley & Spagnoli and Reddick & Solinsky, for appellant. Blanchard & Swisler and Eagon & Rust, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed. The material facts stated in the complaint are as follows: In October, 1882, the plaintiff executed to the defendant a written lease, for the term of five years then next ensuing, of a certain ranch in Amador county, and also of certain farming utensils and stock. The plaintiff was to erect certain improvements on the premises, and to furnish to the defendant the seed needed to put in a crop the first year. The defendant was to till and in all respects cultivate the premises in a husband-like manner, and out of the crop raised the last year was to return to the plaintiff the same number of pounds of seed, and of the same kinds as he received the first year. The defendant was also to deliver to the plaintiff, or his order, "two-fifths of all the crops produced on the said farm and premises aforesaid, of every name and description or kind, to be divided on the place; hay in bale under shelter, grain of all kinds in the granary, apples, peaches, pears, plums, etc., in the fruit-house, grapes in the vineyard after being gathered, and in a reasonable time after such crops shall have been harvested or gathered." The defendant entered under his lease, and continued to occupy and cultivate the premises until the 26th of July, 1886, when this action was brought. It is further alleged that plaintiff, in October, 1882, furnished to defendant, to be used as seed, 32,469 pounds of barley and 3,700 pounds of wheat; that during the year 1886 defendant had raised on the premises 37 tons of barley of the value of $1,000, and 45 tons of wheat of the value of $1,350, and that all of this grain was severed from the ground and in process of being threshed and sacked; that defendant intended and had threatened to and would leave and abandon the premises on completing the harvesting of the crop, and that he denied the right of the plaintiff to any part thereof, and threatened and intended to remove the whole crop, and to dispose of and convert the same to his own use; that defendant is insolvent. The prayer is that 32,469 pounds of the barley, 3,700 pounds of the wheat, and two-fifths of the remainder of the crop be segregated and set apart to the plaintiff, and that a receiver be appointed pending the action, and for general relief.

We fail to see why the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The action was in effect for a partition of personal property, owned by the parties as tenants in common. Now conceding that plaintiff did not own that part of the crop which he claimed in return for the seed furnished in 1882, (Callender v. McLeod, 16 Pac. Rep. 194,) still he unquestionably did own, as tenant in common with the defendant, two-fifths of all the wheat and barley raised on the leased premises. Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 542; Knox v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 617; Freem. Co-Tenancy, § 100. The defendant was in possession of the whole crop and was threatening to sell it and appropriate the proceeds to his own use. In such a case an action for partition was the proper remedy, and the appointment of a receiver was authorized by the Code. Freem. Co-Tenancy, §§ 426, 448; Code Civil Proc. § 564. It is urged for respondent that the complaint was insufficient, because it failed to allege that plaintiff had performed all the conditions of the lease which were to be performed by him, but we think sufficient facts were stated in this regard. It is further argued that the action was commenced prematurely, because the defendant was to deliver to plaintiff his share of the grain in the granary. But as the defendant denied the plaintiff's right to any part of the crop, and was threatening to appropriate it all to his own use, we do not see why plaintiff was called upon to delay the commencement of an action to determine his rights. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: HAYNE, C., FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

In re STUTTMEISTER'S ESTATE. (No. 12,254.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1888.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—EXPENSES OF ADMINISTRATION—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Where the executor was negligent in his duties and some of the heirs employ an attorney to prosecute the matter, and hasten administration, the estate is not bound for the payment of such attorney's fees.

2. SAME—ALLOWANCE OF DEMAND—VOID ORDER.

In such case, on petition of the attorney against the heirs, an order was entered by the probate court, on default, that the attorney's fees be paid out of the estate. Held, on petition against the administrator to enforce payment under such order, that the order was void.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

For former report of this case, see 14 Pac. Rep. 35.

Ben. Morgan, for appellant. E. J. & J. H. Moore, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner herein is an attorney at law. On June 12, 1884, he filed a petition in the probate department of the superior court, asking for an order citing V. R. and W. O. Stuttmeister, Bertha M. Byer, and George C. Hoadley, guardian of the estate of Alice L. Stuttmeister, a minor, to appear and show cause why they should not pay the petitioner their proportion of the sum of $300 claimed by him as an attorney fee. In his petition he alleged, among other matters, that the executor of the last will of Stuttmeister, deceased, had grossly neglected the duties of his trust, and delayed the settlement of the estate; that the heirs and devisees were unable to learn anything about the affairs of the estate; that two of the heirs, V. R. Stuttmeister and B. M. Byer, being greatly in need of money, retained the petitioner as their attorney to prosecute the matter in their behalf, he consenting to act without a retaining fee; that he was retained by them as their attorney to prosecute their claim for themselves and minor heirs; that Hoadley, as guardian of the estate of the minors, retained him to prosecute, on behalf of the minors, proceedings against the executor, on the same terms and conditions. He further alleged that, in pursuance of his agreement, he had performed services which were worth the sum $300; that he had presented his claim to the heirs and Hoadley, the guardian, and demanded payment, but all objected to the payment of the same except the guardian, who was willing to pay whatever sum the court might allow. On September 19, 1884, the default of the respondents for failure to answer the petition was entered. On October 8, 1884, the court made an order allowing the petitioner $300 "for services rendered as attorney for the heirs herein in hastening the administration of the estate," and ordered "that judgment be entered in favor of petitioner for the sum of $300, * * * to be paid from said estate in due course of administration." No appeal was taken from this order. Thereafter, on May 11, 1887, the petitioner filed another petition in said estate, setting forth the making of said order, and praying that the administrator of said estate be compelled to pay him said sum of $300. To this petition the administrator filed an answer, and, the matter coming on to be heard, the court granted the prayer of the petition, and ordered the administrator to pay the petitioner forthwith, out of the funds in his hands belonging to said estate, the said sum of $300, from which order this appeal is taken.

From the foregoing statement, it will be seen that the contract upon which the petitioner relies in support of the orders of the court was a contract between himself and V. R. Stuttmeister and B. M. Byer. The executor was not a party to the agreement, and there was no order appointing the petitioner attorney for minor or absent heirs. The heirs could not by their contract bind the estate. The executor was not made a party to the proceeding which resulted in the first order, and the estate was not represented. The claim was not one which arose in the life-time of the testator, and it was not an expense of administration. The fact that no appeal was taken from the original order is immaterial, because the proceedings, on their face, are void. They show a contract with parties who could not bind the estate, the petition states no facts authorizing the order, and no one representing the estate was a party thereto. In Stuttmeister v. Superior Court, 14 Pac. Rep. 35, it was decided, simply, that an appeal having been taken from the order now before us, and a supersedeas bond filed, the court had no power to enforce the payment of the money by proceedings for contempt. The order is reversed.

BOOTH et al. v. HOSKINS. (No. 12,363.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

1. MORTGAGES—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ABSOLUTE DEED.

Plaintiffs conveyed land by a quitclaim deed to defendant, and at the same time borrowed money from defendant, both signing an agreement at the same time to mutually repay and reconvey. Held, that although on the face of the deed it was an absolute conveyance, yet it was clearly the intention of the parties to create a mortgage only, and such must it be considered.¹

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—WRITTEN AGREEMENT—ORAL EVIDENCE TO VARY.

Where there is a written agreement in which appears a stated time for the repayment of a loan, the lender will not be allowed to adduce in evidence an oral agreement to alter the terms of, or be substituted for, the written agreement, if made at the time of the loan; nor, if made subsequently, can such an oral agreement create a new or continuing contract so as to prevent the running of the statute of limitations.

3. QUIETING TITLE—MORTGAGED PREMISES—PAYMENT OF MORTGAGE DEBT.

Plaintiffs, owing defendant a mortgage debt, brought action against the latter to quiet title to the property subject to such charge, defendant's cause of action to recover his money being barred by statute. Held, that the plaintiffs must be denied any affirmative relief in equity until they had done equity by payment of the debt and interest to defendant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.

Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYRES, Judge.

Action brought by Edward Booth et al., plaintiffs and appellants, to quiet title to land in Placer county, California, against J. H. Hoskins, respondent and defendant.

Taylor & Holl, for appellants. J. M. Fulweiler and C. A. & E. P. Tuttle, for respondent.

BELCHÉR, C. C. The plaintiffs commenced this action on the 29th day of July, 1885, to quiet their title to a quarter section of land in Placer county. By his answer the defendant denied that the plaintiffs, or either of them, had owned the land in question since the 13th day of July, 1878, admitted that he claimed to own it, and, by way of cross-complaint, alleged that on the 13th day of July, 1878, the plaintiff, Booth, was the sole owner of the land, and on that day, for and in consideration of the sum of \$408, gold coin, paid to him by defendant, executed and delivered to defendant a good and sufficient deed of the same, and thereby the defendant became, ever since has been, and now is the owner thereof. And the prayer was that the defendant's title be quieted as against the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs answered the cross-complaint, and admitted the execution of the deed as alleged, but averred that it was a quitclaim deed, and was made for and as a mortgage, and was so understood and intended by the parties thereto, to secure the payment of \$408, with interest, thereon at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per month, due from Booth to the defendant for money loaned and advanced to him by defendant; and then further averred that all claim and demand which defendant may have had against Booth, on account of the money so loaned and advanced, was, before the commencement of the action, barred by the provisions of sections 337, 339, Code Civil Proc. At the trial the deed referred to, being an ordinary quitclaim deed, was introduced in evidence, and also a paper signed by both parties, which reads as follows: "This agreement, made and entered into this 13th day of July, 1878, by and between Edward Booth, of Placer county, state of California, and J. H. Hoskins, also of said county and state, witnesseth, that whereas, the said party of the first part has entered at the Sacramento land-office (describing the quarter section in controversy;) and whereas, said party of the second part has furnished the said party of the first part \$408, in United States gold coin, for the said above-described land; and whereas, to secure the party of the second part, the said Edward Booth has this day deeded to J. H. Hoskins his right, title, and interest in the above-described land: now, therefore, this agreement witnesseth, that if the said Edward Booth shall repay to the said J. H. Hoskins the sum of \$408 within three months from the date of this instrument, with interest at $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per month, then the said J. H. Hoskins shall reconvey to the said Booth the above-described land, and all its appurtenances." The defendant was a witness in his own behalf, and testified "that at the time of the execution and delivery of the said deed, Booth also delivered to him the certificate of purchase, just received from the receiver of the land-office, with the express understanding that the patent was to be delivered to him (Hoskins) when it should be issued by the government; and that although the written instrument recited the promise to pay within three months from the 13th day of July, 1878, yet it was distinctly understood and agreed between him and Booth that he (Hoskins) should receive the patent and hold it as additional security; and that Booth should have a reasonable time, after the issuance of the patent, to pay the \$408 and interest; that he never asked Booth to pay him, or expected Booth to pay him, or that his money was due until after the patent had been issued; that it was not until about the 25th day of July, 1881, when he went to the land-office and found that the patent had been issued during the winter preceding, and that Booth had caused it to be delivered to him by making an affidavit, etc.; that about the last of August, or in the forepart of September, 1881, he saw Booth and asked him about his getting the patent, and the payment of what Booth owed him for the purchase of the land; that Booth admitted that he got the patent, and said he was going to keep it, and that his deed to Hoskins was not good because it was not signed by Booth's wife, and that he did not propose to pay him, Hoskins, until he got ready, if at all; that then was the first time that Booth had ever been asked by him for the money, or had refused to stand by his agreement made at the time of the payment for the land and execution of the deed." The foregoing was all the evidence introduced by either side upon the question as to the purpose and effect of the deed from Booth to defendant, and upon the question as to whether the defendant's cause of action to recover back his money was barred by the statute of limitations or not. The court found that prior to the execution of the deed Booth resided with his family upon the quarter section, and filed a homestead thereon, stating in his declaration of homestead all the facts required by law to be stated therein, and, among others, that the property was then of the value of \$2,500; that at the time of the trial the property was of the value of \$20,000; that the deed "was intended to vest the title to said premises in said Hoskins in trust, and to secure the payment of \$408, with interest at $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per month, loaned by Hoskins to Booth on the day last aforesaid to pay for and secure the title to said land from the government of the United States;" that the amount then due was \$918, no part of which sum had been paid or tendered, and that defendant's right to recover the amount due him was not barred by the provisions of sections 337, 339, Code Civil Proc. And as a conclusion of law the court found "that in fairness the plaintiffs ought not to have any relief in this action until they first pay the defendant his just debt; that, seeking equitable relief, they should show equity on their side; that defendant Hoskins is entitled to a decree foreclosing his said deed as a mortgage, and foreclosing plaintiffs of and from all right, title, and equity of redemption therein, after execution of sheriff's deed therefor according to the law and the practice of the court, and for the sum of \$918, to be paid out of the amount arising from the legal sale of said premises, over and above the sum of \$5,000, exempt as a homestead." Judgment of foreclosure was accordingly entered in favor of the defendant, from which and from an order denying them a new trial the plaintiffs have appealed.

¹See note at end of case.

The first question that presents itself for consideration is, what was the character of the defendant's deed? We think it entirely clear that the deed was intended to be and was only a mortgage. The defeasance, executed contemporaneously, shows beyond doubt that it was made to secure the payment of a sum of money loaned by the grantee to the grantor, and payable at a future day, with interest. In such a case a deed absolute is held to be and is treated as a mortgage. Farmer v. Grose, 42 Cal. 169; Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352. The next question is, was the defendant's cause of action to recover back his money barred by the statute of limitations? We think it was. By express provision of the written contract, made at the time of the loan, the money was to be repaid in three months. Under this contract the debt became due, and the statute began to run in October, 1878, and an action was consequently barred after four years from that time. There is nothing to take the case out of the general rule except the testimony of defendant that it was understood and agreed between him and Booth that the latter should have a reasonable time to pay the money after the issuance of his patent. But this agreement was oral, and, if made at the time of the loan, could not change the terms of, or be substituted for, the written contract, and, if made subsequently, could not create a new or continuing contract, so as to take the case out of the operation of the statute. Code Civil Proc. § 360. Besides, if we could accept defendant's theory, we should meet with a new difficulty. Defendant learned, in July, 1881, that the patent had been issued, and in August or September following was informed by Booth "that he did not propose to pay him, Hoskins, until he got ready, if at all," and still he waited for three years and a half after that without attempting to assert his rights. Under such circumstances the delay would seem to have been unreasonable and inexcusable. Now, conceding, what we do not decide, that under our law, as at present framed, a mortgage upon a homestead, executed by the husband, but not by the wife, is void only as to the homestead value, and is good as to the excess, (Sargent v. Wilson, 5 Cal. 504; Moss v. Warner, 10 Cal. 296; Mabury v. Ruiz, 58 Cal. 14,) still, the defendant's right to recover the money due him being barred, he was not entitled to have his mortgage foreclosed. But were the plaintiffs entitled to any relief without first paying the defendant? The whole case shows that Booth justly owed the defendant all the money claimed by him. It was by the use of the money loaned by defendant that Booth acquired the title to his property, now of large value. Common honesty requires a debtor to pay his just debts, if he is able to do so, and the courts, when called upon, always enforce such payments if they can. The fact that a debt is barred by the statute of limitations in no way releases the debtor from his moral obligation to pay it. Moreover, one of the maxims which courts of equity should always act upon is, as suggested by the court below, that he who seeks equity must do equity. In accordance with this maxim, we think the plaintiffs should be denied any affirmative relief until the money justly due to the defendant is paid. The other questions discussed by counsel do not require special notice.

The judgment and order should be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter a decree upon the findings in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

BURKE v. KOCH. (No. 11,088.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1888.)

1. REPLEVIN—ALTERNATIVE JUDGMENT—WHEN NOT NECESSARY.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 667, providing that judgments in actions to recover possession of personal property may be for the possession, or value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had, the court is not bound when it appears, in such an action, that property which belonged to plaintiff was fraudulently disposed of by defendants, to find the character or value of such articles as could be returned, or to render a judgment in the alternative.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—FRAUD.

In an action of claim and delivery, when it appears that property which belonged to plaintiff was fraudulently assigned by one defendant to the other, both being participants in the fraud, the fact that a consideration passed between them is immaterial to the case.

3. SAME—DAMAGES—CLAIM IN PETITION.

In an action of claim and delivery, it is error for a trial court to allow any damages beyond the amount prayed for in the petition.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action brought by Alfred I. Burke, as assignee of the estate of Jacob Zech, insolvent, against Jacob D. Koch and Jacob Zech, to set aside an alleged fraudulent assignment, etc. The court decided for plaintiff, and defendant Koch alone appealed. After such appeal he died, and his executors, K. Meussdorffer and A. Grass, were substituted as defendants.

A. C. Ellis, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Conceding that this action is, as claimed by appellant, an action of claim and delivery, it does not follow that the judgment is void or erroneous because not in the alternative. The court found that the defendants sold and disposed of a large portion of the property sued for, and appropriated the proceeds thereof. Under the findings of the court,—and the findings are supported by the evidence,—the defendants stand as wrong-doers, as fraudulent assignor and fraudulent assignee. The defendant Zech, with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, made the assignment to his brother-in-law, defendant Koch, and the latter, with full knowledge of the fraudulent purpose, accepted the same, to aid Zech in defrauding his creditors. In pursuance of their scheme, a part of the property which should have gone to the possession of the assignee, this plaintiff, was disposed of by the defendants. This fact appearing at the trial, the court was not bound to find the character or value of the articles which could be returned, or to enter a judgment in the alternative. Whetmore v. Rupe, 65 Cal. 238, 3 Pac. Rep. 851; Brown v. Thompson, 45 Cal. 76.

The fact that Koch paid $2,200 for the property, if such be the fact, is immaterial; it entitles the defendant Koch to no consideration, either at law or in equity. The defendants were both fraudulent actors. Actual fraud characterized the transaction ab initio, and the creditors are not called upon to reimburse Koch for money which was paid him to insure the fraud against detection. Goodwin v. Hammond, 13 Cal. 168; Swinford v. Rogers, 23 Cal. 234.

The statement shows that "plaintiff offered in evidence, as admissions made by Jacob Koch as to why he took the property, and his knowledge of the circumstances of Mr. Zech, and also showing he was told the value, the testimony of Mr. Koch taken at the trial of the opposition to the discharge of Jacob Zech in insolvency." The evidence was objected to by defendant, as "irrelevant and inadmissible." Objection was overruled, and defendant excepted. The evidence following this offer and ruling appears to be a transcript of the sworn testimony of Koch, but is not shown to be such except by the statement above quoted. The evidence was not irrelevant, if it was in fact a statement made by Koch, and the objection that it was inadmissible was insufficient to test the question of its competency. The ruling is therefore not shown to be erroneous.

The judgment is for $7,470 and costs. The plaintiff prayed for the sum of $6,000, the value of the property, and $500 damages; and the prayer follows the ad damnum clause of the complaint, which alleges that plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $500 by reason of the detention. In the absence of an amendment to the complaint, therefore, the court could not allow any damages beyond the amount prayed for.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to modify the judgment by striking out the figures "$7,470" and inserting the figures "$6,500" in lieu thereof. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

STOCKTON BLDG. & LOAN ASS'N v. CHALMERS et al. (No. 11,828.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 23, 1888.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS AGAINST—RIGHTS AS INDIVIDUALS.

The wife of a deceased mortgagor was made a party to a foreclosure suit as executrix only. A homestead previously declared by her was set up in defense. The land was sold under a decree giving plaintiff possession. Held, that a writ of assistance should not issue against the wife, as, not being a party to the suit in her individual capacity, such homestead exemption could not be properly pleaded in defense.

2. SAME.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 387, 389, prescribing two methods by which new parties may be brought into an action, viz., by intervention and by order of court, one who is before the court as executrix cannot become a party to the action in her individual capacity, except by one of the methods prescribed.

PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county; GEORGE E. WILLIAMS, Judge.

W. L. Dudley and Geo. G. Blanchard, for appellant. Chas. N. Fox, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an appeal from an order after final judgment, refusing a writ of assistance. Robert Chalmers, in his life-time, executed a mortgage upon certain premises in El Dorado county. Subsequently his wife, Louisa, declared a homestead upon a portion of the same premises. Chalmers departed this life, and an action to foreclose the mortgage was brought against the executor and executrix of his last will, viz., against George Chalmers and Louisa M. Chalmers, as executor and executrix thereof. Louisa Chalmers, the widow, was made a party defendant as executrix, but not in her individual capacity. The executor and executrix set up the fact of the declaration of homestead by the latter, and the court found the existence of the homestead as a fact, and that it was subsequent in time and subject to the lien of the mortgage. A decree was entered in favor of plaintiff under which the property was sold, purchased by plaintiff, and, a sheriff's deed having passed, possession was demanded of Louisa M. Chalmers, (who had before that time intermarried with one Hardie,) pursuant to a clause in the decree requiring possession to be delivered to the purchaser, which was refused, whereupon plaintiff applied for a writ of assistance. The court below denied the writ upon the grounds that Mrs. Chalmers was not individually a party to the foreclosure suit, and was not made such, or concluded by the answer made in her representative capacity, setting up the homestead, or by the decree rendered therein.

It is well settled that a judgment for or against a party in one right cannot affect him when acting in another right. Thus, a plaintiff, suing as administrator of his wife, is not affected by a judgment against himself in her life-time, in an action to which she was not a party. Blakey v. Newby, 6 Munf. 64. "A decree against one as administrator, on a bill to compel the delivery of slaves claimed as a gift from the intestate, will not conclude his rights as a creditor, on a bill by him against the former plaintiffs, to set aside the gift conveyance for fraud." Freem. Judgm. § 156, and cases cited. Louisa Chalmers was sued as the executrix of the last will of her deceased husband. As such she could only avail herself of such defenses to the foreclosure suit as would have existed in favor of her testator, had he been living, and a party to the action, and had he been living and a party defendant he could not have concluded by a defense or want thereof his wife's right to the homestead. Such result could only be reached, if by action, in a proceeding to which she was a party. Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 66; Same v. Same, Id. 75; Van Reynegan v. Revalk, Id. 76; Cook v. Klink, Id. 347; Stoops v. Woods, 45 Cal. 439. It is true, a party may be before the court in two or more capacities, and in Corcoran v. Canal Co., 94 U. S. 741, an individual, as trustee for certain bondholders, was brought before the court and a decree rendered against him as such, and it was held he could not relitigate the same matter on the ground that he was himself a bondholder of some of the bonds. If he was such holder, it was said he was bound by the former decree, because, as trustee in the former suit, he was representing himself. That, however, is not this case. Louisa Chalmers, as executrix, represented the estate of her deceased husband, and the decree rendered is binding upon such estate; but her right in the homestead, if taken from the community property of herself and husband, vested absolutely in her upon the death of the latter, and as executrix she could not represent it. But it is claimed that defendant did, in effect, make herself individually a party to the action by setting up the homestead right when sued as executrix. The Code specifies but two methods by which, after the commencement of an action, new parties may be brought in; one is by an order of the court and the other by complaint of intervention. No such order was made or proceedings had in this case; hence we conclude she was not individually a party to the cause. It may well be that a party who voluntarily files an answer in a cause without an order of court making him a party defendant, and who goes to trial upon the issues made by his answer to the complaint, will be concluded by the judgment rendered on the trial of such issues, and estopped from denying that he was a party to the action. But in the present case we search the decree in vain for any adjudication of defendant's homestead rights. The conclusion reached by the court below was "that Mrs. Chalmers (now Mrs. Hardie) never was a party to this action, and therefore the judgment and decree do not affect her homestead right, and, being in possession under the homestead right, she is rightfully in possession."

We are of opinion this conclusion was warranted by the premises, and the order denying the writ is affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; TEMPLE, J.; THORNTON, J.; MCKINSTY, J.

PATERSON, J. I dissent. It is true that Louisa M. Chalmers was not, technically speaking, a party defendant in the action, but she voluntarily set up her individual rights in the property, and caused the same to be litigated. Her homestead right was set forth in detail. It was treated as an issue in the case. The trial proceeded upon the theory, by all the parties, that her individual rights were in controversy, and the findings of the court upon that matter were as full as the allegations of the answer. Her individual right was not necessarily, or even properly, in the answer as a part of the defense made by the defendants in their representative capacities. The estate could not in any way be benefited by the determination of the homestead rights of Mrs. Chalmers; on the contrary, if her homestead right had been established, (the court found that plaintiff's mortgage was a lien upon the property described in said declaration of homestead,) the estate would have lost a fund which otherwise would have been devoted to a payment of the debts. She, therefore, in effect and in fact, became a party to the suit in her individual capacity. Her rights were determined, and I think she was bound by the decree rendered in the case. If the name "Louisa M. Chalmers" had been repeated in the title of the cause without the addition of the official designation "executrix," there can be no doubt that judgment would be binding upon her. "A nominal, but not substantial, difference in parties does not effect the estoppel. The general rule that a judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties and the process, and rendered directly upon the point in question, is conclusive between the same parties, is not complied with when the same person, though a party in both suits, is such in different capacities, in the one individually, in the other as administrator. So, if an action is brought by A., as guardian of B., a minor, a judgment against A., as guardian, is in his official capacity, and will not preclude him from maintaining a subsequent action in his own right individually, and vice versa; for, in the prior action, A., properly speaking, had not been a party. The real party in interest was the minor, by A., his guardian. The subsequent action in A.'s own name is not then between the same parties. The person may be the same, but in different capacities, and the former action cannot preclude him from maintaining the subsequent action; but where they litigate their individual rights in the same action, the judgment is conclusive. Thus, where an executrix, who was also the widow of the testator, being sued in the former capacity only, but raising in her defense of the suit the issue of her rights as usufructuary, will be personally concluded by the judgment, and cannot subsequently attack its validity on the ground that she was not cited in her individual capacity." 1 Herm. Estop. § 94.

LOWRIE et al. v. SALZ et al. (No. 12,183.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1888.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—REVOCATION BY DEATH—TRUSTS.

L., leaving home, left one M. in charge of his farm, with general instructions to manage same. M. had business transactions with one H., who was indebted to the estate, and who purchased the goods in question, and who deposited them with warehousemen in the name of M., but for the account and risk of —, no person being named. The warehouseman knew H., but not M. H. never handed the receipt to M., but borrowed money from defendants, to whom, upon surrender of the receipt, a new one was issued by the warehouseman. L. was dead at the time of the transaction. Held, that M.'s agency was revoked by death of principal, and that the goods were never in the possession of M. so as to create a trust for the benefit of the estate.

2. EVIDENCE—OPINION—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for the value of goods deposited, a witness was asked "whom he understood was the depositor." Held, such question is objectionable, as requiring the opinion of the witness, and should have been excluded.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Action of trover and conversion, brought by Mary Lowrie and M. B. Sturges, plaintiffs and appellants, against S. Salz and E. Niehaus, defendants and respondents. Verdict for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal.

T. C. Van Ness, for appellants. Thos. C. Huxley, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying a new trial. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment must be granted. The judgment was entered January 11, 1886, and the appeal was taken April 26, 1887, more than one year after the entry of such judgment.

The proof of service of notice of appeal was sufficient, under the rule enunciated in Reed v. Allison, 61 Cal. 461, and the motion to dismiss is denied as to the appeal from the order denying a new trial.

One of the grounds specified in the notice of motion for new trial is "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and judgment." The statement fails to specify any particular in which the evidence is insufficient; and hence to that extent, under section 659, Code Civil Proc., the statement must be disregarded. There was evidence tending to show that one John Lowrie was a ranch-owner in Alameda county, and was engaged in the business of farming and fruit-growing. In the summer of 1883 he departed from this state for Alaska, leaving in charge as general superintendent and manager of his lands one John Munson, who was authorized to carry on the business, sell the product of the ranch, etc. John Lowrie was lost at sea on or about October, 1883, but his death was not known here until July, 1884. In the mean time Munson had conducted the farming business. James Hogan, who was engaged in the business of purchasing and packing fruit at Centerville, Alameda county, had purchased fruit from the Lowrie ranch through Munson; and on or about August 23, 1884, was indebted therefor to the extent of about $1,500. It would seem that Hogan had agreed to pay some money on the fruit, from time to time, to pay for picking, and the residue of the purchase price when he (Hogan) sold the fruit. In August, 1884, Hogan deposited in the warehouse of Mortimer & Wamsley, at Niles, in Alameda county, five loads of canned fruit, amounting to 300 cases, and directed the warehouseman to give him a receipt as if deposited by Munson. A receipt was accordingly given in the following words and figures:

"NILES, August 23, 1884.

"Received in Niles Warehouse from Jno. Munson the following cases of canned goods on storage, for account and risk of ———. (Not transferable or negotiable;) Three hundred and sixty (360) cases canned goods. Storage charges one cent. per month, or for any fractional part of a month.

"MORTIMER & WAMSLEY, Proprietors."

The receipt should have been for 300 cases, but by mistake was made 360. The warehouseman knew Hogan, did not know Munson, and supposed the deposit was in the name of the latter to avoid danger of legal proceedings by the creditors of the former. Hogan had previously informed Munson that he should deposit fruit in this warehouse, (indeed, he had already deposited some,) "and when he had got enough in there to secure me [Munson,] he would give me the warehouse receipt, and that was all the talk we had about it. * * * I never asked him for the receipt, and he never gave it to me." Hogan never gave the receipt to Munson, but borrowed money on it from defendants, to whom, upon the surrender of this receipt, a new one was given by the warehouseman. Defendants afterwards received the amount due them from Jones & Co., to whom they assigned their security, and the fruit was sold by the latter for $1,200. Plaintiffs are the executors of the last will of Lowrie, and, as such, sue for the value of the fruit; and their right to recover was the question involved in the nonsuit.

1. The agency of Munson ceased with the death of his principal. From that time forward he could not bind the estate of the latter by contracts in the name of his former principal, for the reason that a dead man cannot have an agent, in the ordinary acceptance of the term.

2. If Munson, assuming to be the agent of Lowrie, received property or benefits accruing by reason of such assumed or supposed agency, and which property belonged to the estate of one for whom he assumed to act, he could be treated as a trustee, and would be liable as such.

3. The goods were deposited by Hogan in the name of Munson as depositor, it is true, but not for him or for his account, but for account and risk of ———; that is, of some person not named. The receipt was given to Hogan, who had delivered the goods, and was never delivered to Munson. Had this receipt been filled out so as to show that the deposit was for the account and benefit of Munson, it would have been evidence of his right to the property; but in the form in which it was issued it failed in this particular. Had Hogan filled the blank by the insertion of the name of any given person, as we think he might lawfully have done, it would, upon delivery to such person, have entitled him, upon return of the receipt, to the possession of the goods. What he did do was to return the receipt, and procure another in the name of and for account of defendants. As the first receipt and deposit did not entitle Munson to possession, or give him constructive possession, of the property, he could not, without delivery of the receipt to him, have recovered the property, and the representatives of Lowrie, whom we may suppose he was assuming to represent, were in no better condition. The case of Honig v. Bank, 15 Pac. Rep. 58, relied upon by appellants, is not in point. There the money was deposited by Peyser in the name of, and for the account of Honig, and the certificate of deposit issued by the bank read as follows: "N. Honig has deposited in this bank two hundred and fifty dollars in gold coin, payable to self or order on the return of this certificate, properly indorsed," etc.; and this court held the bank liable in having paid the certificate without the indorsement of Honig. Had the receipt in this case specified Munson as the person for whose account the deposit was made, the analogy would have been complete, and, so far as like rules apply to the two cases, they would have been parallel. Had the Honig certificate failed to name any person to whom it was payable, we may safely assume the decision would have been different. It would then have been payable to bearer upon return and surrender of the certificate. So, here, the goods were subject to delivery upon the return of the receipt. The receipt was not negotiable, and that fact was impressed upon its face, substantially as provided by section 8 of the act of March 1, 1878, relating to warehouse receipts, etc., (St. 1877-78, p. 949.)

The exceptions founded upon the rulings of the court touching the testimony of the witness Wamsley, who was recalled by plaintiff pending the motion for non-suit, are not, we think, either important or tenable. It was first sought to be shown, by the witness, for whom he delivered the receipt in question. Upon objection, the court held that plaintiff might show all that was said between him and the boy (Hogan's boy) fully. This was all that was proper. No occult theory of the witness on the subject, no mental reservation or intention of his, not expressed, could alter the rights of the parties. The witness was then asked whom he understood to be the depositor of the fruit, and the court permitted the question, and the witness replied: "Do you mean the owner?" And the court said: "Depositor. You know what that means, don't you?" And the witness answered: "The man that put it in there." The court thereupon asked the witness if he understood the meaning of the term, and received for response: "Well, I understand the use of the word 'depositor' to mean the owner of the fruit." To which the court responded: "You can answer it in that light if you see fit. But that is not necessarily the construction of the word. The man who delivered the fruit there is the depositor, as a matter of law. Now, with that view of it, answer the question." Answer. "Why, Hogan was the man that delivered the fruit." The witness certainly gave his own views upon the subject, and later answered as to the fact in the view presented by the court. The question as put was objectionable, so far as it called for the opinion of the witness, rather than for the facts upon which his understanding was based; and, had the court sustained defendants' objection, there would have been no error in the ruling, and there was no error in the explanations and inquiries of the court and witness.

Taking the case as a whole, we think the testimony failed in establishing a predicate for recovery, and that the nonsuit was properly granted, and the motion for a new trial was properly denied. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, because not taken within one year from the entry of such judgment, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

Ex parte McDONALD. (No. 20,405.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1888.)

EXECUTION—SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDINGS—CONTEMPT—HABEAS CORPUS.

Where, in proceedings supplementary to execution, defendant pleads a previous discharge in insolvency, and refuses to answer questions as to her property, and is committed for contempt, her remedy is by appeal, and not by habeas corpus.¹

In bank. Petition for writ of habeas corpus.

Petitioner, Maggie McDonald, was intrusted by another with several thousand dollars to purchase mining stock for her. Petitioner received the money to invest on account of such person, and so agreed to invest same. On demand for delivery of the stock, the petitioner refused, and afterwards sold the stock for which judgment was given against her. Execution issued, and court ordered petitioner to answer certain questions as to her property, which she refused, pleading a discharge in insolvency previously given her, and she was committed for contempt. Petitioner sued out this writ.

¹See note at end of case.

Geo. W. Tyler, for petitioner. Chas. F. Hanlon, in opposition.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner, being restrained of her liberty, sues out a writ of habeas corpus, praying to be discharged, upon the ground that the judgment under which the proceedings were had which resulted in her imprisonment for contempt had been discharged by subsequent proceedings under the insolvent laws of this state. The superior court had jurisdiction to hear and determine this question, and, it would appear, did determine it adversely to the petitioner. If wrong in so doing, it is but error, and petitioner's remedy, if any, is by appeal. The application is denied, and petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco.

NOTE.

HABEAS CORPUS—WHEN LIES. Habeas corpus will not lie to correct errors of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the person charged, Zelle v. McHenry, (Iowa,) 2 N. W. Rep. 264; nor to retry issues of fact, or to review the proceedings of a legal trial; that can only be properly done by writ of error on appeal, Ex parte Lemkuhi, (Cal.) 13 Pac. Rep. 148. But an appellate court may make use of the writ as one means of exercising its supervisory power. In re Hamilton, (Mich.) 16 N. W. Rep. 327. The acts of an officer de facto not being void, the right of the justice issuing the commitment to hold his office cannot be inquired into on habeas corpus. Ex parte Johnson, (Neb.) 19 N. W. Rep. 594. Habeas corpus is not the proper remedy to procure the discharge of a person arrested in a civil action on an affidavit which merely alleges, in the language of the statute, that defendant fraudulently contracted the debt sued on, without alleging the facts tending to show fraud; such defect in the affidavit rendering the proceedings voidable only, and not absolutely void. Barton v. Sanders, (Or.) 16 Pac. Rep. 921. Where one held in custody under the judgment of a court institutes habeas corpus proceedings, he must show that the judgment is not merely irregular or erroneous, but absolutely void. Rolfs v. Shallcross, (Kan.) 1 Pac. Rep. 523; In re Turner, (Cal.) 16 Pac. Rep. 898. In such case the petitioner for the writ assails collaterally the judgment under which he is imprisoned, and, to entitle himself to a discharge from such imprisonment, he must show the judgment, either by his petition or by his proof on the hearing, to be an absolute nullity. Willis v. Bayles, (Ind.) 5 N. E. Rep. 9. Respecting the grounds upon which a judgment may be collaterally attacked, see McCarter v. Neil, (Ark.) 6 S. W. Rep. 731, and note.

FISHER et al. v. SLATTERY. (No. 12,185.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 22, 1888.)

1. EJECTMENT—WHEN LIES—LANDLORD AND TENANT.

A lessee, under a written lease for a year, renewable at his option, and prohibiting him from letting or subletting without the written consent of the lessors, after six months' possession, sold his business, and permitted the purchaser to go into possession of the premises leased, retaining, however, the right to keep certain personal property there, and himself paying the rent. At the end of the year, without having sublet the premises, or assigned the lease, he surrendered the premises to the lessors who had refused to accept rent from the purchaser. Held, such findings, in an action of ejectment, entitle the lessors to judgment for possession.

2. SAME—INADVERTENT FINDING.

A finding in an action of ejectment that plaintiff was in possession at the commencement of the action, being evidently a mere inadvertence, as the pleadings admitted, and the other findings indicated that defendant was then in possession, will not defeat a judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; PHILLIP W. KEYSER, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Phillip and Anna M. Fisher against P. C. Slattery. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

J. H. Craddock, for appellant. E. A. Davis, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This is an action in ejectment. One of the plaintiffs, Anna M. Fisher, obtained a judgment in the court below for the possession of the premises sued for, etc. From that this appeal is prosecuted upon the judgment roll. The appellant urges that the findings are conflicting and contradictory; that they do not sustain or justify the judgment; and that the judgment is against law. It appears that Anna M. Fisher was on the 26th day of October, 1885, the owner of the premises sued for, that upon that day she, jointly with her husband, who had no interest in them, leased the premises to one Sullivan by a written lease for one year, commencing on said date, it being agreed therein that Sullivan might, at his option, continue the lease until the 26th day of October, 1888. The lease also contained a clause to the effect that Sullivan was prohibited from letting or underletting the premises without the written consent of the lessors. Sullivan thereupon entered into possession of the premises, but about the 1st of May, 1886, he sold a butcher business, of which he was the proprietor, in Yuba City and Marysville, to the defendant; also certain personal property in the former place. A deed to the latter was executed and delivered by Sullivan to Slattery, acknowledged and recorded. Slattery entered into its possession at once; also the shop, fixtures, meat, etc., therein included. Upon the same day, with Sullivan's consent, the former also entered into possession of the premises sued for in this action, together with the shop, meat, and fixtures therein contained, Sullivan retaining the right to keep therein certain goods not sold to Slattery, until it should be found convenient to remove them. A bill of sale of the personalty was also given to Slattery by Sullivan. The court further finds that Sullivan did not sublet the premises, nor assign his lease of them to Slattery.

We see nothing in this which renders the findings contradictory. It is true that Sullivan allowed Slattery to go into possession of the premises in Marysville, leased from Mrs. Fisher and her husband, but the former retained the right to keep certain property there, and himself paid the rent to the lessors for two months, and when Slattery applied to be allowed to pay the rent to them it was refused, and his tenancy was repudiated. Sullivan, the lessee, paid the rent up to the end of the first year's tenancy, and then, on the 26th of October, 1886, handed over his lease to the attorney for the plaintiffs, and stated that he did not desire to occupy the premises any longer, and his tenancy was at an end, and Mrs. Fisher was entitled to the possession of her property as against Slattery, who was as to her a mere trespasser. Mrs. Fisher never acknowledged Slattery as her tenant, refused to do so when he applied for recognition and offered to pay rent, and never received any rent except from Sullivan. There is nothing which indicates any acquiescence on her part, with any letting, subletting, or assignment of the lease by Sullivan to Slattery. She seems to have looked to Sullivan, and Sullivan only, as her tenant, and not in any way to have waived her right not to have the premises sublet without her written consent. There is no indication from these facts that any subletting by the written consent of the lessors was given, or that any parol assignment of the lease was made. The appellant claims further that the court has found that Mrs. Fisher was actually in possession of the premises she sued for when her action was brought, and that therefore he could not have been in the wrongful possession thereof at that time. Ordinarily a finding in an action of ejectment that the plaintiff was in possession at the commencement of the action would be fatal to a judgment for the plaintiff. But in this case it was admitted by the pleadings that the defendant was in possession at the commencement of the action. The finding that plaintiff was in possession at the commencement of the action was evidently a mere inadvertence. The pleadings and the other findings indicate that defendant was in possession, and claimed a right to the possession.

We perceive no prejudicial error in the record; and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

I concur: HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

SIMPSON v. APPELGATE. (No. 12,040.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1888.)

1. VENDOR AND VENDEE—PAROL CONTRACT—RESCISSION—WHEN ABSOLUTE.

Plaintiff, being in possession of certain public land, contracted by parol to sell it to defendant, who paid for it, took possession, and improved it. Afterwards, the contract having been rescinded in order to enable plaintiff, under the pre-emption laws, to make final proof, and defendant to act as witness for him, a patent was obtained to this with other land, and plaintiff then agreed by parol to convey it to the defendant. Held, the rescission enabling plaintiff to make final proof must be taken as effectual, and defendant has no equitable title.

2. SAME—TENANT AT WILL.

Defendant in ejectment, although tenant at will, as vendee in possession, after rescission of the contract of sale, waives his right as tenant to notice to quit by a denial of plaintiff's right in his answer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Action of ejectment by James E. Simpson against George W. Applegate. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff and defendant appeals.

Hale & Craig, for appellant. C. A. & F. P. Tuttle, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Ejectment. The plaintiff claims under a United States patent. The defendant set up an equitable defense, and prayed for a conveyance from plaintiff of the legal title. The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. The case comes up on the judgment roll.

Certain points are made by the respondent as to the construction of the findings, but for the purposes of this opinion we shall assume that the finding that the plaintiff was "the owner" of the premises at the commencement of the action is a conclusion of law, within the rule laid down in Levins v. Roegner, 71 Cal. 273, 12 Pac. Rep. 161, 343.

The facts as disclosed by the findings are as follows: The appellant and respondent were respectively in possession of adjoining pieces of public land. In 1862, the respondent made a parol agreement to sell to the appellant the tract in controversy for $75. This sum was paid, and the appellant took possession of the property, and improved the same; thus bringing himself fairly within the rule as to specific performance of partially executed parol agreements for the conveyance of real property. But no deed was made. Afterwards the respondent applied for a patent from the United States for a tract which included the premises in controversy. This was with the knowledge and acquiescence of appellant, who drew up the declaratory statement, at respondent's request. What then occurred is stated by the findings as follows: "Thereafter, and within the time allowed by the pre-emption laws to make final proof and payment, plaintiff applied to defendant to go with him to said land-office as a witness for him, to make proof of his right to his said land. The defendant then explained to plaintiff that he could not become such witness while there existed any contract or agreement between them for a conveyance by plaintiff to defendant, or to any one else, of any part of the land so to be pre-empted; and, further, that the plaintiff himself could not take the oath prescribed by law while any such contract or agreement existed; and that before defendant could become such witness, or plaintiff himself could take such prescribed oath, it was indispensable that all existing contracts and agreements in respect to a conveyance of any part of the land should be canceled and rescinded; and it was then and thereupon agreed between them that all said contracts and agreements then or theretofore existing between them should be, and then were, canceled and rescinded, and said defendant then became such witness." A patent was accordingly issued to the plaintiff. It is further found that "after the making of said final proof and payment for said land, and after the issuance of said patent, there were conversations between plaintiff and defendant as to a conveyance of said land by said plaintiff to said defendant; and therein defendant requested plaintiff to convey the same to him, and plaintiff verbally consented and agreed so to do, for the sum of $1.25 per acre, the defendant's proportion of the expense of procuring the patent." The plaintiff, however, subsequently changed his mind, and brought the present action to remove the defendant from possession.

The finding that the parties rescinded their contract in order to qualify the defendant to become a witness on the application for the patent must be taken to mean an effectual rescission. There is nothing in the record to show that they did not intend it to be such; and, if the record had shown that such was not their intention, it cannot for a moment be supposed that any court would countenance such a trick upon the officers of the land department, or such trifling with the obligations of an oath. The contract was therefore entirely rescinded and gone; and for the purposes of this branch of the case this left the parties as if no contract had ever existed. The subsequent "conversations" amounted to nothing. If we assume that there was a consideration for any subsequent agreement, such agreement was not valid, because it was not in writing, and there was no subsequent part performance. The appellant appears to have relied entirely upon the honor of the respondent, and, if he has been disappointed in such reliance, he is without a remedy.

It is argued for appellant, however, that, if his equitable defense fails, he is a tenant at will, and that, since he has received no notice to quit, the action must fail. The court below found that he was "not the tenant at will of the plaintiff." We are inclined to think, however, that this must, in view of the other facts found, be considered to be a mere conclusion of law, and that he must be held to be a tenant at will, because he was a vendee in possession after the rescission of the contract to sell. Frisbie v. Price, 27 Cal. 253. But, if we assume this to be so, it does not help the appellant, because the answer denies the right of the plaintiff; and it is found that the defendant, in 1882, executed a conveyance of the premises to one Seaver, and about a year afterwards received a reconveyance from him, and "at all times claimed to be the owner of said demanded premises, except during the time that Seaver held the deed from defendant." These things constituted such a disclaimer of the relationship as dispensed with notice. Taylor, in his work on Landlord and Tenant, after stating the general rule as to denials by the tenant of the landlord's right, says: "But if the tenancy is from year to year, or at will, the law is otherwise; for these tenancies are always determinable by notice, and, as notice would be waived by a denial of the relation of landlord and tenant, the tenancy is in fact forfeited." 8th Ed. § 522. And this is the law in California. Smith v. Ogg Shaw, 16 Cal. 88; Dodge v. Walley, 22 Cal. 225; Bolton v. Landers, 27 Cal. 104.

We do not think the findings, when properly construed, are contradictory. It may be remarked with reference to the transcript that it is not the practice in this state to change the title of a case when it is appealed. There is no propriety here in making the defendant in the court below appear as the plaintiff on appeal. Such a course, being against usage, has a tendency to produce confusion, both on appeal and in the court below.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

LEVISTON v. RYAN et al. (No. 9,271.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1888.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—PATENTS—VALIDITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A patent, under which plaintiff claims in ejectment, is prima facie valid; and, if its validity can be attacked at all, the burden of proof is upon the defendant.

2. SAME—PROVINCE OF THE COURT.

In ejectment, where there is some evidence to establish the validity of a patent under which plaintiff claims title, the court should not declare such patent invalid on the ground that there is not sufficient evidence to determine the question of its validity.

3. SAME—LAND SUBJECT TO ENTRY.

Where, in ejectment, plaintiff claimed under a patent, the selection having been made under Act Cong. March 3, 1871, (16 St. 581,) providing that a selection may be made from land subject to pre-emption under any laws of the United States, with certain specified exceptions, the defendant, in order to defeat the patent, if he can attack its validity at all, must show that the land was not subject to acquisition in any mode allowed by any law.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Action of ejectment, brought by plaintiff, William Leviston, against William Ryan and others, to secure possession of certain lands situate in the city and county of San Francisco. The superior court found for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Wm. & Geo. Leviston, for appellant. Tobin & Tobin and Thos. F. Barry, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. Ejectment. The plaintiff claims through a patent from the state of California, issued under the act of 1862 and amendatory acts in relation to agricultural colleges. The defense is that the patent is void. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. Two points are made by the defendant in support of the judgment.

1. It is said that the tract in controversy is part of the four leagues confirmed in the city and county of San Francisco as successor of the pueblo. If this were true, there could be no doubt but that the plaintiff's patent is void; but there is nothing in the findings or the evidence to show that it is true. The finding is that "it is impossible to determine whether or not the lands in controversy are within the limits of the lands so confirmed to the city and county of San Francisco." It may be remarked, in this connection, that we see nothing impossible in the determination of the question. There is no question of fact which is material to the decision of a cause,—that is to say, which the law requires to be decided,—which cannot be settled by proof or presumption. The machinery of a court must be supposed to be equal to any demand which the law permits to be made upon it. The law does not require impossibilities. In the present instance the description in the decree of confirmation is clear, and it was a mere question of applying it to the ground. If sufficient evidence to satisfy the mind of the court was not produced by the parties, it should have found the fact against the party on whom was the burden of proof, (Speegle v. Leese, 51 Cal. 415,) and the burden in this case was upon the defendant. It was not required to make an official survey, but simply to decide as between the parties before it, whether the tract in controversy was within the description contained in the decree of confirmation. The facts which the court did find showed a valid patent, and, this being the case, the supposed impossibility of finding further facts showing it to be invalid was no reason for holding it to be so. In the absence of a showing that the land was part of the four leagues, we must conclude that the patent is valid, unless there be some other ground upon which it can be attacked.

2. The defendant contends that such other ground is furnished by the fact that the land was, at the date of the selection, within the limits of an incorporated city. It is alleged in the complaint, and not denied by the answer, that the land "is situate in the city and county of San Francisco." This averment, of course, speaks only from the time of the commencement of the action. But we know as a matter of law that the act establishing the corporate limits has not been changed since the date of the selection, and the land has certainly not moved since then; so that it must be taken as an established fact that the land was within the limits of the city and county of San Francisco at the date of its selection. This does not necessarily mean that it was a part of the four leagues. It is well known that the corporate limits extend somewhat beyond the four leagues; so that the tract might be "in the city and county of San Francisco," without being a part of the four leagues. And the respondent's argument upon this point is based upon the assumption that such is the case. The argument is that the statute of the United States provides that "lands included within the limits of any incorporated town, or selected as the site of a city or town," shall not be subject to pre-emption. Rev. St. § 2258, reproduced from act of 1841. But pre-emption is not the only mode in which public lands may be acquired. For example, the prohibition against pre-emption of lands within the limits of a city or town does not prevent the issuance of a patent for public mineral land within such limits. Steel v. Smelting Works, 106 U. S. 447, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389. And upon the same principal we suppose that, if the land be public land, the prohibition against pre-emption does not prevent its acquisition in any other mode that may be applicable, (see Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 322,) unless the acts under which the proceedings were had contain something to the contrary. It is obvious, therefore, that it is necessary to examine the acts under which the proceedings were had. The original act was passed on July 2, 1862. It provided that "there be granted" to the several states a certain quantity of land for the purpose of providing colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. The provision in relation to the lands to be selected as part of the grant was as follows: "Whenever there are public lands in a state subject to sale at private entry at $1.25 per acre, the quantity to which said state shall be entitled shall be selected from such lands within the limits of such state." 12 St. U. S. p. 503, § 2. This act also contains a proviso that "no mineral lands shall be selected or purchased under the provisions of this act." On June 8, 1868, an amendatory act was passed, whereby it was provided that the selection could be made "from any lands within said state subject to pre-emption and sale," with the same proviso as to mineral lands, and a further proviso excepting lands already subject to rightful claims. 15 U. S. St. p. 68, § 4. On March 3, 1871, another amendatory act was passed, whereby it was provided that the selection could be made "from any lands within said state subject to pre-emption settlement, entry, sale, or location under any laws of the United States," with the same proviso as to mineral lands and lands subject to rightful claims. 16 St. U. S. 581. The selection was in 1872, and was therefore under the last-mentioned act. It is obvious that its provisions on the subject are different from those of the prior acts. As we construe it, the selection is not confined to lands which are subject to pre-emption, but may be made from public lands which are subject to acquisition in any mode, except mineral lands and lands subject to rightful claims; or, in the language of the statute, from any land which is subject to "settlement, entry, sale or location under any laws of the United States," with the exceptions mentioned. The language of the statute being express that the selection may be made from public lands subject to acquisition in any mode, (with specified exceptions,) we do not see how it can be construed to mean that the selection must be made from land subject to acquisition in one particular mode. This being the proper construction of the statute, it is not sufficient for the respondent to show that the land was not subject to pre-emption. He must go further, and show that the land was not subject to acquisition as public land in any mode. In other words, he must show that the land was not of such character as to bring it within any law of the United States providing for the acquisition of public land. To apply this principle, he must show that the land was not timber land, desert land, or land of any special character which would subject it to acquisition under any law of the United States. The court cannot take judicial notice of the character of the land. In all the cases which we have seen in which patents have been held to be invalid, the defendant has proved by evidence the facts showing such invalidity. Whether a patent is conclusive or not, it is at least prima facie valid; and if a defendant in ejectment can attack it at all, the burden is on him to show the invalidity. Minter v. Crommelin, 18 How. 88; Collins v. Barlett, 44 Cal. 381. The findings in this case set out the patent in full, and do not show that the land was of such a character as not to be subject to selection. They, therefore, do not support the judgment. The question, therefore, as to the conclusiveness of the patent,—which is the main one argued,—does not arise upon the record. We do not suppose it probable that the land was of such a special character as to bring it within any special mode of acquisition, and if the parties can stipulate that such is the fact, and agree to resubmit the cause, we suppose it would be proper (following the precedent of Soto v. Kroder, 19 Cal. 94, 95) to take up the case again, and determine what seems to be the main question involved; the controversy being undoubtedly genuine. In the present condition of the record, however, the judgment cannot stand. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to file a stipulation, and proceed as above mentioned.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to file a stipulation, and proceed as above mentioned.

SWAMP-LAND RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 407 v. WILCOX. (No. 11,782.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1888.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—SWAMP LANDS—ASSESSMENT—ALTERATION OF ORDER OF BOARD OF SUPERVISORS.

In an action to enforce payment of a swamp-land assessment, an entry in the record of the board of supervisors appointing the assessors, which is conceded to have been altered without authority by one who was, at the time of the entry, but not at the time of the alteration, clerk of the board, is admissible in evidence, where it appears that the record as altered conforms to the original entry book from which it was made, and the party making the alteration testifies that it was done to amend a clerical error. Reversing 14 Pac. Rep. 843.

2. SAME—ASSESSMENT LISTS—DESCRIPTION.

Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3461, requiring certain assessment lists to contain "a description by legal subdivisions, swamp-land surveys, or natural boundaries, of each tract assessed," a description naming the adjoining proprietors on their respective boundaries is sufficient. Following 14 Pac. Rep. 843.

3. SAME—EXPENSES AND BENEFITS—DUTY OF COMMISSIONERS—PRESUMPTION.

Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3456, providing that assessments for swamp-land improvements shall be in proportion to the whole expense and to the resulting benefit, and section 3461, requiring the assessment list to contain, among other things, "the amount of the charge assessed against each tract," where a list conforms to the requirements of the latter section, it will be presumed that the assessment was made in compliance with the former, there being no evidence to the contrary. Following 14 Pac. Rep. 843.

4. SAME—AMOUNT OF ASSESSMENT—OMISSION OF DOLLAR-MARK.

In an action to enforce payment of a swamp-land assessment, it appeared that, in the assessment list, there was no dollar-mark before the figures opposite defendant's name, under the heading "Amount of Charges Assessed," but such mark preceded the figures in the same column in other places. Held, that the figures must be construed to represent dollars. Following 14 Pac. Rep. 843.

5. SAME—OATH OF COMMISSIONERS.

The commissioners of swamp-land assessments were verbally sworn before viewing the land, but it did not appear that they subscribed their oath and filed it in the county clerk's office, as required of all "officers" by Pol. Code Cal. §§ 904, 909. Held that, even if the commissioners were "officers" within the meaning of those sections, a failure of strict compliance with their requirements would not avoid official acts fully performed. Following 14 Pac. Rep. 843.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; T. B. McFARLAND, Judge.

Action by swamp-land reclamation district No. 407 against William Wilcox, to enforce payment of a swamp-land assessment. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. For former opinion in this case on appeal in department 1, see 14 Pac. Rep. 843.

Freeman, Johnson & Bates, Armstrong & Hinkson, and W. H. Beatty, for appellant. A. P. Catlin, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial in an action to enforce payment of a swamp-land assessment. After alleging that it is a corporation organized for the purpose of reclaiming certain swamp land, and that in the month of March, 1882, it became necessary to construct in said district, levees, embankments, ditches, drains, and other reclamation work, the plaintiff alleges that in order to provide for such reclamation works, and the maintenance, protection, and repair thereof, the board of trustees of said swamp-land reclamation district No. 407 employed Jim C. Pierson, a competent engineer, to survey, plan, locate, and estimate the costs of the works necessary for such reclamation, and of the maintenance, protection, and repair thereof. That thereafter the said Pierson did plan, locate, and survey said works, and estimated the cost thereof, and made a report in writing thereof to the said board of trustees, which report was approved and adopted by the said board, and was afterwards, on or about the —— day of August, 1882, by the said board, presented to the board of supervisors of Sacramento county, together with an estimate, made by said board of trustees, of the amount necessary for the incidental expenses of superintendence, repair, and other expenses. That said report was received by the said board of supervisors, and filed with the clerk thereof on the 25th day of August, 1882. From said report it appeared that the aforesaid works of reclamation, together with the incidental expenses of superintendence, repairs, etc., would cost the sum of $78,000. That thereupon, on the day last mentioned, the said board of supervisors approved the said report, and adopted an order appointing three disinterested persons, residents of said county, commissioners to assess the charge upon the said land, of which order the following is a copy: "Ordered that J. M. Upham, James Stephenson, and John Miller, three competent and disinterested persons, and residents of Sacramento county, be and are hereby, appointed commissioners, who must, in the manner provided by law, view the lands of said district, and assess thereupon the proper assessments and charge for the reclamation of said lands, to-wit, the sum of $78,000, in the manner and at the cost surveyed, planned, and estimated by J. C. Pierson, engineer of said district, and by the board of trustees of said district, as exhibited by the report of said trustees filed this day with the clerk of this board." These allegations were denied by the defendant, and the plaintiff, for the purpose of proving them, offered in evidence the entry in the record of the board of supervisors of the county of Sacramento, being page 558 of the Minute Book K of the records caused to be kept by the board of supervisors, in which the clerk of the board was required to record all orders and decisions made by the board, and the daily proceedings had at all regular and special meetings, and when offered in evidence the entry therein read as follows, to-wit:

"OFFICE OF THE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS, Friday, August 25, 1882.

"Swamp-Land District No. 407.

"The report of the trustees of Swamp-Land District No. 407 was received, and following reports adopted: Ordered that J. M. Upham, J. M. Stephenson, and John Miller, three competent and disinterested persons and residents of Sacramento county, be, and are hereby, appointed commissioners, who must, in the manner provided by law, view the land of said district, and assess thereupon the proper assessment, and charge for the reclamation of said land, to-wit, the sum of $78,000, in the manner and at the cost surveyed, placed, and estimated by J. C. Pierson, engineer of said district, and by the board of trustees of said district, as exhibited by the report of said trustees filed this day with the clerk of this board."

The attorneys for defendant objected to said entry as evidence on the ground that it appeared to have been altered and changed since it was made, and that it was an order appointing commissioners to view and assess a charge on lands in swamp-land district No. 341, and not upon land in swamp-land district No. 407. Thereupon the plaintiffs admitted that on the 17th day of June, 1885, the day before the trial, Thomas H. Berkey changed the figures designating the number of the district from 341 to 407. It was then shown that said Thomas H. Berkey was the county clerk of Sacramento on the 25th of August, 1882, but that his term of office had expired at the time he changed said records as above stated; that the record of the proceedings of the board of supervisors of the 25th day of August, 1882, of which said page 558 of Minute Book K was a part, was signed by P. R. Berkey, the president of the board of supervisors, but not signed by Thomas H. Berkey, who was county clerk, and, by virtue of his office, clerk of the board of supervisors of said county at the time said entry was made, nor was said record signed by any of his deputies. And it appears that said change was made by said Thomas H. Berkey without the direction or permission of said board of supervisors. Said Thomas H. Berkey, at the time he made the said alteration, was a deputy of the clerk of the county of Sacramento, and as such was acting clerk of the board of supervisors when sitting as a board of equalization. The board of supervisors was not in session when the alteration was made. Berkey testified that he made it as soon as his attention was first called to what appeared to him, by a comparison of the records and examination of different pages of said book K, to be a clerical error made by John H. Parnell, deceased, who, in August, 1882, was deputy of witness, and acting clerk of the board of supervisors. A book was introduced in evidence, described by the witness "as the book of original entry," in which the clerk first entered the minutes of the proceedings of the board of supervisors, from which the Minute Book K was made up. In that book, under date of August 25, 1882, appeared an entry of which the following is a copy: "The Board of Swamp-Lands Commissioners No. 407. Report of Trustees filed and ordered adopted. See order." The bill of exceptions states that, "the testimony of the witness Berkey and inspection of the papers, among which was the original report of the trustees of swamp-land district No. 407, tended to show that the order was made upon the report of the trustees of the swamp-land reclamation district No. 407, and that the figures "341" was merely a clerical error of said Parnell in making up the minutes or records in said Book K." The testimony of said Berkey was duly objected to by defendant, on the grounds that a record cannot be altered, changed, or contradicted by parol, and his testimony was only an opinion, conclusion, or inference from circumstances, and was irrelevant, immaterial, incompetent, and so the admission in evidence of the said rough minute book, because the entry therein was indefinite, and the same was not a record, and was irrelevant and incompetent. The court overruled both objections, and admitted the testimony of said Berkey and said book in evidence, to which rulings, and each of them, the defendant then and there excepted. The plaintiff then offered said entry in evidence again, to which the defendant then and there objected on the grounds: (1) That said order was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent; (2) that said record has been changed since this action was commenced, in a material respect, under the direction and with the knowledge of the attorneys for the plaintiff; (3) that the order made by the board of supervisors, as it appeared and was in fact before changed by said Berkey, was an order appointing commissioners to view and assess a charge upon the lands in swamp-land district No. 341, and not an order appointing commissioners to assess a charge upon the land in swamp-land district No. 407. The court overruled the objection and admitted said entry, so changed, in evidence. The defendant excepted.

We discover no error in that. The evidence tended to prove that the board of supervisors approved the report of the board of trustees, and appointed commissioners to view and assess the land of reclamation swamp-land district No. 407. The entry made in book K was prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein. Code Civil Proc. § 1920. But it was not conclusive of those facts. Proof of its having been altered might affect the credit and weight to be given to it, but did not render it inadmissible. Wayland v. Ware, 104 Mass. 46; Sprague v. Bailly, 19 Pick. 436. If the evidence proved that the entry in the official book, as it appeared when offered in evidence, contained the order made by the board, the circumstance of its having been altered after it was originally entered did not render it inadmissible. In Sprague v. Bailly, supra, it became necessary for the defendant to prove that he had taken the oath required to be taken by a collector of taxes. The records of the town were produced at the trial, and contained an entry of his having taken the oath of office as "treasurer." The defendant moved that the town clerk should be permitted to amend his record. This was objected to by the plaintiff. The objection was overruled, and the clerk amended by striking out the word "treasurer" and inserting the words "collector of taxes, according to the best of my knowledge and belief." On appeal to the supreme court the counsel for plaintiff insisted that this was error. SHAW, C. J., said: "Upon this point the court are of opinion that there was competent evidence to go to the jury to find whether the defendant was sworn as collector or not. The entry in the book is a memorandum, not a record, and may be left to the jury with other evidence upon the fact." In the case now before us it was necessary for the court to find whether the order introduced in evidence related to district No. 407, or to district No. 341. Evidence tending to prove that that related to either, was, in our opinion, admissible. The original entry of the clerk was prima facie evidence that the order was entered, as it passed, but not conclusive. The alteration did not prove or disprove that the original entry was erroneous. The validity of the assessment depended on the order made by the board, not upon the order entered by the clerk in his book. The entry of the order was prima facie evidence that it had been duly made as entered. But this might be contradicted and overcome by other evidence. Code Civil Proc. § 1833. We think it was clearly shown that the original entry of the order was erroneous, and that the order made by the board is correctly expressed in the amended entry. It was upon this point that the judgment and order of the court below was reversed by department 1 of this court, and upon this point the case was ordered to be heard in bank. Upon the other exceptions we are satisfied with the views expressed in the opinion filed by the department, which are as follows: "The defendant also objected to the assessment list, offered in evidence by the plaintiff, upon several grounds, and his objections were overruled. One ground of objection was that the land was not properly described. The Code required the list to contain 'a description by legal subdivisions, swamp-land surveys, or natural boundaries of each tract assessed,' and 'the number of acres in each tract.' The land assessed to the defendant was described as a portion of two swamp-land surveys, 'bounded on the north by the lands of Mrs. R. F. Davis, on the east by the lands of L. C. Rube, on the south by the lands of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, and on the west by Old river, number of acres, 100.' This should be held, we think, to be a sufficient description, as otherwise it would seem impossible to describe the land so as to comply with the statute. Evidently it could not have been described by legal subdivisions, nor, being a portion of two surveys, by swamp-land surveys. If, then, the words 'natural boundaries' are to be construed as excluding all artificial boundaries, or boundaries made by man, it must follow that no sufficient description of the land could be made. We do not think such a result was intended or should be declared. In our opinion any description which clearly identifies and marks out the land is sufficient. Another ground of objection was that it did not appear, from the face of the assessment list, or from any other evidence, that the assessment or charge was made in proportion to the whole expense, and to the benefits which would result from the works of reclamation, nor that the charge was estimated in gold and silver coin of the United States, nor in any kind of money. Section 3456 of the Political Code requires the commissioners to 'view and assess upon the lands situated within the district a charge proportionate to the whole expense, and to the benefits which will result from such works, and estimate it in gold and silver coin of the United States.' And section 3461 provides what the list must contain, as follows: 'The list must contain, (1) A description by legal subdivisions, swamp-land surveys, or natural boundaries of each tract assessed. (2) The number of acres in each tract. (3) The names of the owners of each tract, if known; and if unknown, that fact. (4) The amount of the charge assessed against each tract.' The list returned was signed by the supposed commissioners, and complied with the requirements of section 3461, and there is nothing to show that the assessment was not made in full compliance with section 3456. The commissioners were not required to report that in making the assessment they had complied with the requirements of section 3456; and if they had done so, their certificate to that effect would not have been even prima facie evidence of the fact. People v. Hagar, 49 Cal. 232. They were, however, charged with an official duty, and, in the absence of all evidence to the contrary, must be presumed to have regularly performed that duty. Section 1963, subd. 15, Code Civil Proc. It is true that there was no dollar-mark before the figures '4,764.45' placed opposite the name of the defendant under the heading of 'Amount of Charges Assessed;' but the record shows that this was only one of a number of assessments contained in the list, and that 'in a number of cases there was a dollar-mark ($) preceding the figures in columns headed with the words "Amount of Charges Assessed," and in a number of instances, as in this, the dollar-mark did not appear.' It is not shown when, or in how many places, the dollar-mark did appear, but if it was prefixed to some of the items in the column, then all the figures standing in the same column and in the same relation to other similar items must be construed to be dollars, without a repetition of the mark before each item. People v. Mining Co., 33 Cal. 171. Still another ground of objection was that it did not appear that Upham, Stephenson, and Miller took, subscribed, and filed their oath of office in the office of the county clerk before they assessed the land and made the assessment list. It did appear that they were sworn verbally by a justice of the peace before they went out to view the land. It is not necessary to decide whether or not they were such officers as sections 904 and 909 of the Political Code refer to; for, if they were, their official acts, after being fully performed, were not rendered void by the fact that they had failed to comply strictly with the requirements of those sections."

Judgment and order affirmed.

MITCHELL v. AMADOR C. & M. CO. (No. 12,387.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1888.)

1. MORTGAGES—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—IMPROVEMENTS.

Plaintiff obtained a decree of foreclosure, and a deed for a canal and water-right, of which defendant was a pendente lite purchaser. Defendant after purchasing, and before the decree, constructed a new canal to take the place of the old one. Held, in an action to try title, that plaintiff has no right to the new canal, as simply an improvement, where the description of the property in the mortgages, lis pendens, decree of foreclosure, and deeds embraced only the old canal and appurtenances.

2. SAME—SUBSEQUENT PURCHASER—WASTE.

Where plaintiff obtained a decree of foreclosure and deed for property of which defendant was a pendente lite purchaser, he may recover actual damages for waste committed by defendant while in possession of the property, in an action to try title, and for rents, issues, and profits.

3. ESTOPPEL—IN PAIS—EVIDENCE TO REBUT PRESUMPTION.

In an action for possession of a canal, which plaintiff claims as simply an improvement upon a canal for which he has obtained a decree of foreclosure and deed, where plaintiff is permitted to show, as matter of estoppel, declarations of officers of the defendant corporation to the effect that they regard the new canal as subject to plaintiff's mortgage, evidence on the part of defendant tending to show that plaintiff did not so regard it, and did not rely upon such declarations, is admissible.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Amador county; C. V. GOTTSCHALK, Judge.

Action to try title, and for other relief, brought by Thomas Mitchell against Amador Canal & Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

M. A. Wheaton and A. C. Adams, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden, (Lindley & Spagnoli, of counsel,) for appellee.

PATERSON, J. A full statement of the facts found by the court is filed herewith. This is an action to determine the title to, and recover possession of, a canal of great value, "formerly known as the 'Butte Ditch,' or canal, afterwards called the 'Amador Canal,' as the same is now held and used by the defendant, together with all of the franchises and water-rights belonging thereto, and all the appurtenances and rights connected therewith;" also to recover the rents, issues, and profits, and damages, amounting to the sum of $1,000,000. Plaintiff claims title to the property under a decree of foreclosure entered October 4, 1873, and a sheriff's deed given in pursuance of a sale thereunder, dated June 6, 1884. The foreclosure suit was commenced on April 6, 1870, and a lis pendens was filed the same day. The mortgages upon which the decree was based were executed and delivered to plaintiff by Stickles and others, who then owned the property, in August and September, 1868. Respondent claims that the new line of ditch was constructed to take the place of the old ditch, under the rights, privileges, and franchises acquired from the mortgagors for the purpose of using those rights, privileges, and franchises to better advantage, and that the property as it now exists is but an improvement upon the old ditch, and as such subject to the mortgages. Appellant claims that the property affected by the decree of foreclosure is not the property for the recovery of which judgment against appellant has been rendered in this case; that it is not the Butte Ditch extended or improved, but another and different aqueduct, called the "Amador Canal," and that a comparison of the descriptions in the decree of foreclosure and in the judgment herein makes this apparent.

In the mortgages, lis pendens, decree of foreclosure, and sheriff's deed the property is described as follows:

"That certain ditch commonly called the 'Butte Ditch.'"

"Commencing at the Old Pine-Log crossing on the North fork of the Mokelumne river."

"Conveying water thence to Slab Town, Butte City, and other localities in Amador county; also to the vicinity of Jackson, Scottsville, and other points in said Amador county."

"Together with all the appurtenances, flumes, aqueducts, branch ditches, reservoirs, pipes, and cabins connected with, or in any manner belonging to, the ditch property above mentioned, with the right to take water from the north fork of the Mokelumne river."

In this case the court found that plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to the possession of the following described property:

"All that certain property now known as and called the 'Amador Canal,' with all its appurtenances as the same is now used, together with the water-rights and franchise thereunto belonging, which is more particularly described as follows:

"All the canal and works known as the 'Amador Canal,' situated in the county of Amador, commencing at the north side of the North fork of the Mokelumne river, at a point where said canal taps and takes the waters of said North fork of the Mokelumne river, about two hundred rods above the point which is known as 'Pine-Log Crossing.'

"And thence running in a westerly direction down the north side of said stream about eighteen miles, more or less, to a tunnel, and to the placer mines in the vicinity of Slab Town.

"From thence through a tunnel, in a general north-westerly direction, following the sinuosities and meanderings of said canal, twenty-two miles, more or less, to a point on Tanner's ranch, in the town of Sutter, Amador county, and in the vicinity of the Amador mine.

"Together with all the flumes, ditches and branch ditches, iron-pipe, aqueducts, buildings, cabins, reservoirs, dams, and tunnels belonging to said works, or in any nature connected therewith, and including the branch ditches extending to Jackson and Plymouth, and also all franchises, rights of way, and all water-rights, and all locations for the taking of water, with the right to the waters of said north fork of the Mokelumne river, and all hereditaments, and appurtenances in any way belonging to said property."

There is nothing in the language of these two decrees to indicate that the property described is the same in each. The names of the ditches, the courses, and the termini are different, and the branches, extensions, and franchises named in the decree herein are manifestly not included in the language used in the decree of foreclosure. Furthermore, it is true, as a matter of fact, that the Butte ditch and the Amador canal are not, and never were, physically identical at any point between their termini. The learned judge of the court below did not base his conclusion as to the legal identity of the two ditches upon any assumption of identity in fact, but upon the propositions that the Sutter Canal Company and the Amador Canal Company, in their constructions of the new ditch and its branches, always considered them subject to Mitchell's mortgages; that the property was treated as the same ditch, though under a different name; and that the new ditch was built for the purpose of using to better advantage the water-rights and franchises of the old Butte ditch,—was constructed to take its place. In a written opinion, the court thus clearly states the fact in this regard, and defines the issue of law upon which, in its opinion, the case turned: "As soon as the Sutter Canal & Mining Company came into possession of the Butte-Ditch property, July 16, 1870, it commenced the construction of a new ditch of larger capacity than the old Butte ditch on the same general line, but higher up the hill, and of a lesser grade; the new ditch having a grade of eight feet to the mile, whereas the grade of the Butte ditch was thirteen feet four inches. In digging the new ditch, the old Butte ditch, being lower down the hill, was filled up, the flumes were broken down, and the lumber of which they were built was used by the Sutter Canal & Mining Company to build cabins for their workmen, blacksmith shops, etc. The new ditch was built principally in the ground excavated; the old ditch consisted chiefly of flumes. In blasting out the new ditch, the rocks rolled down the hill, and broke down the flumes of the old ditch. In fact, no attention was paid to the old ditch. At a place called 'Bald Rock,' the new canal connected with the old Butte ditch, and for a distance of two miles below Bald Rock the new ditch was right over the Butte ditch. In 1872, the Sutter Canal & Mining Company became insolvent, and such proceedings were had that its property was sold, by order of the United States district court, to the Amador Canal & Mining Company, free and clear of all liens and incumbrances, except from a mortgage lien claimed by Thomas Mitchell on certain franchises of said bankrupt. The Amador Canal & Mining Company completed the ditch commenced by the Sutter Canal & Mining Company, in the prosecution of which it pursued the same course as its predecessors, filling up the old Butte ditch, breaking down the flumes, treating it, in fact, as of no value at all. In 1868, subsequently to the execution of the two mortgages to the plaintiff, the Butte Ditch Company extended their ditch by means of an iron pipe some thirteen hundred feet long, with a carrying capacity of fifteen hundred inches of water, to a place on the Mokelumne river about two hundred rods above Pine-Log crossing. * * * Considerable has been said about the subsequently acquired title, but there is no question in this case of any future acquired title, neither by the mortgagors nor by their grantees. It is future acquired property, not future acquired title to the property mortgaged, which is the issue in this case. * * * Plaintiff's contention is that his mortgages on the Butte-Ditch property, franchises, and water-rights covered the property of the defendant; not because the mortgagors, or their grantees and successors in interest, have acquired any better title to the property mortgaged subsequently to the execution of the mortgage, nor yet on the ground that the Amador canal should be considered as an appurtenance to the Butte ditch, but because the new canal was constructed to take the place of the old Butte ditch, and for the purpose of using to better advantage the water-rights, privileges, and franchises belonging to the last-mentioned ditch; in fact, because, as plaintiff contends, the Amador canal is an improvement of the mortgaged property, and goes to feed the mortgages. * * * It was the intention of the Sutter Canal & Mining Company to use, by means of the canal it was constructing, the water-right and franchises purchased by Bowman of the Butte Ditch Company. It was for this purpose it commenced the building of the new canal. The Amador Canal & Mining Company, after its purchase of the property, completed the work inaugurated by the Sutter Canal & Mining Company, and extended the ditch from Bald Rock up to the place on the north fork of the Mokelumne river, about two hundred rods above Old Pine-Log crossing, the same place to which the Butte Ditching Company removed their water-right location in 1870, claiming 5,000 inches of water. At this place the Amador canal tapped the river, and took out the water, and at the same place it has taken out and used the water ever since. Bowman went into possession of the Butte ditch and water-right under the title acquired from the Butte Ditch Company. The Sutter Canal & Mining Company commenced the construction of the new canal for the purpose of using such water-right. The Amador Canal Company, upon the completion of the canal, did use such water-right, and has used it ever since. If the water-right and franchises of the Butte Ditch company had not been purchased by Bowman, no new canal could have been constructed; because neither Bowman nor the Sutter Canal & Mining Company or this defendant ever took up, located, or acquired any water-right other than that of the Butte Ditch Company. * * * Counsel for defendant says the new canal is about thirty miles in length, and from the tunnel extends in an entirely new direction to the Tanner reservoir, near Sutter creek; that no part of this new canal had ever been owned by the mortgagors,—no part of it covered by the description, or terms, or language of the mortgage. All this is true, but, as I said before, the new canal would not and could not have been constructed without having first obtained the water-right of the Butte Ditch Company, (the mortgagors,) and it was built for the purpose of using such water-right. * * * Although the Amador canal is not, strictly speaking, the old Butte ditch, extended and enlarged, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and is in fact a new ditch, it was built for the purpose of using to better advantage the water-rights and franchises of the old Butte ditch; it was constructed to take its place,—in lieu of it,—and is in law subject to plaintiff's mortgages."

The findings of fact and conclusions of law are in consonance with the opinion of the court. At the trial, evidence was admitted, over the objection of the defendants, upon the questions whether the officers of the Sutter Canal & Mining Company, or of this defendant corporation, ever claimed that the ditch they were constructing was separate property, and not subject to the mortgage, and for what purpose the plaintiff lent the money. Evidence was admitted, also, of declarations made by the officers of the corporation, at the time the new ditch was being constructed, to the effect that the new ditch "was improving the property all the time, and helping the security, and that it was for this reason that proceedings in the foreclosure suit were delayed." This evidence was allowed on behalf of the plaintiff as matter of estoppel; and we are unable to perceive, in view of the evidence thus admitted, upon what theory evidence offered by the defendant tending to show that no reliance was placed by the plaintiff upon such declarations, and that he did not in fact consider the property as subject to the mortgage, was excluded. Thus, plaintiff's objection was sustained to defendant's offer to prove by Joseph Naphaly that "while he (Naphaly) was assignee, Mr. Mitchell stated that his mortgage did not cover anything of the bankrupt estate except the Butte ditch and the water-right connected with it; that it did not cover any portion of the new ditch; * * * and that Mr. Mitchell repeatedly, in conversation at Mr. Naphaly's office, (private conversation, as well as in testimony in the United States district court,) stated that his mortgage only covered the Butte-Ditch property, and for that reason requested these parties to stipulate that he might withdraw, upon the ground that they really had no interest in objecting to the withdrawal of his claim from the United States district court in the bankruptcy proceedings." Defendant offered to show that plaintiff, Mitchell, had called Judge Thompson as a witness in the bankruptcy proceedings to prove by him that the mortgage only covered the Butte ditch and water-right of the bankrupt estate, that the Butte ditch and water-right were at that time of no value, and that it would cost more to put the Butte ditch in repair than it would be worth after it was repaired; but the offer was excluded. If it was material and proper for plaintiff to prove that he believed the property was subject to the mortgage, it would seem to be proper and just to allow the defendant to show that he never believed any such thing. But we cannot see how any such evidence can be material in this case. The mortgage has been foreclosed. It has become merged in the decree. The decree has been executed. The sheriff's deed has passed to the plaintiff. The action which culminated in that decree was commenced for the purpose of subjecting the property liable therefor to the satisfaction of plaintiff's claim,—the $6,000 and interest; the issue therein raised the question what property was thus liable; and the determination of that issue by the findings and judgment therein conclusively settled the rights of the plaintiff and defendant herein as to the ditches, reservoirs, and franchises which could be taken, and which were to be sold in satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage. The plaintiff had his day in court upon that issue. He offered his proof. The court determined the matter, and described the property as we find it in the decree. With that determination plaintiff was satisfied, for he took no appeal. If the description of the property in that decree was insufficient or uncertain, it seems to us it was the duty of the plaintiff to ask the court in that case to make it sufficient and certain. The court followed the description contained in the mortgage. If there were any equities entitling the plaintiff to property not included in the language of the mortgage, or if there were matters of estoppel in pais, extending the rights of the plaintiff to other ditches and franchises than those named in the mortgage, those matters ought to have been pleaded and proved in that action. Marshall v. Water Co., 5 Pac. Rep. 101. It is important in such cases that the pleadings, the mortgage, and the decree should be certain as to the property affected; otherwise, purchasers pendente lite would be at the mercy of the mortgagor and mortgagee. The security offered by mortgages would be destroyed. The decree would determine nothing as to the property pledged, and would be the commencement of endless litigation, instead of a final determination of the rights of the parties interested. The policy of the law with regard to mortgages requires that they give definite information, not only as to the debt secured, but as to the property mortgaged. The rule of law which declares that to be certain which can be made certain is not applicable in a case like this. If there is any uncertainty as to the property described in the mortgage, and which is subject to the mortgage, it should be made certain in the pleadings and the proof, so that the decree may leave nothing in doubt. The information which the law requires to be given to creditors and purchasers by the mortgage and the foreclosure proceedings is that certainty as to the location and description which will enable one to know where the property is, and to distinguish it from other property of the same character which may be adjacent to it. Herman v. Deming, 44 Conn. 125.

We cannot see how the inquiry in this case, considered as an action of ejectment or to quiet title, can properly extend any further than to determine the identity of the property named in the decree of foreclosure. The defendant and the Sutter Canal Company, it must be remembered, were purchasers pendente lite. They were not made parties to the suit, and, of course, were bound by the decree against their grantors only to the extent of the property described in the complaint, decree, and the lis pendens. These, as we have seen, described the property exactly as it was described in the mortgage. Nothing is said in the complaint, lis pendens, or decree about any new water-right acquired after the execution of the mortgage. It matters not whether the water-right is appurtenant to the ditch, or the ditch appurtenant to the water-right. If there was any other ditch than that commonly known as the "Butte Ditch," commencing at Pine-Log crossing, etc., it ought to have been described so that the sheriff and creditors might know that it passed by the decree; and, if there was a new or additional water-right of 5,000 inches, it could not be appurtenant to the Butte ditch, which already had the right to all it could carry,—about 750 inches.

Respondent claims that the Butte Ditch Company had the right to all the water of the stream; that the new works were simply intended as a new and improved method of enjoying the rights and franchises held by that company; and that "this case is not to be determined by simply referring to the descriptive language in the various instruments; but all of the facts and circumstances are to be considered, as well as the declarations and acts of the parties in their dealings with the property, illustrating their object and intention. The assertion that there are two descriptions does not determine whether one was built to use to better advantage the franchises and rights of the other; nor does such assertion determine whether the present property is, in law, an improvement of the property mortgaged." It is true, the court found "that said Butte Canal & Ditch Company was the owner of said water, water-rights, privileges, and franchises, and the right to construct canals and ditches to convey the waters of said stream;" but, if this is a finding that the Butte Ditch Company was entitled to all the waters of the north fork of the Mokelumne river, it is a finding which is not supported by the evidence. We have searched the record in vain for evidence of such fact. In the articles of incorporation it is stated that the object of the Butte Ditch Company is to take the waters of the north fork of the Mokelumne river; but, in the absence of proof of an actual appropriation and diversion, this evidence is not sufficient to show that the Butte Ditch Company enjoyed the franchise to the extent claimed for it. The right mortgaged was the right to take water from said stream, no mention being made of the quantity. Conceding that this language used in the mortgage is broad enough to cover all subsequently acquired franchises, without the necessity of an averment in the complaint in foreclosure of such additional right, we do not perceive any advantage to the plaintiff. In January, 1870, a notice was posted at a point 200 rods above Pine-Log crossing stating that the owners of the Butte Canal & Ditching Company had removed their location, or point of tapping the north fork of the Mokelumne river, to that point, and "appropriated of the waters of the north fork of the Mokelumne river, at this point, 5,000 cubic inches;" and that they were going on with due diligence to construct a canal of sufficient capacity to carry and distribute said amount of water. The company, however, never succeeded in tapping the river at that or any other point, so as to secure the benefit of this notice. The company became insolvent long before they reached that point, and their failure to proceed operated as a forfeiture of their right. The mere act of commencing a ditch, with the intention of appropriating the water, of itself gives no right to the water of a stream. The right depends upon the effectual prosecution of the work. The completion of the ditch and the diversion of the water are necessary elements of title; and the abandonment of the purpose is not so much a matter in avoidance of a title as it is matter showing that no title was ever obtained. The parties prosecuting the work must have the ability to complete the work within a reasonable time, and pecuniary inability to complete the work within a reasonable time cannot be urged as an excuse for not prosecuting the work. Kimball v. Gearhart, 12 Cal. 28. "Appropriation, use, and non-use are the tests of the right." Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 32. The right to the water does not exist when the notice is given, and it may never vest. "The most that is in esse is a right to acquire by reasonable diligence a future right to the water." Canal Co. v. Kidd, 37 Cal. 316. The right to 5,000 inches of water did not exist at the time the mortgage was executed; and if such right was acquired, being an additional right,—a franchise, a new property,—it was not covered by the mortgage, because not in existence at the time the mortgage was executed. If the Sutter Canal & Mining Company forfeited its right to 5,000 inches by a failure to prosecute the work, no additional water-right passed to the defendant here by the assignment in bankruptcy; and defendant's right to the additional quantity of water, if any, must depend upon its own appropriation and diversion. It is unnecessary for us to inquire, in this case, whether the defendant has ever properly acquired a right to 5,000 or more inches of water. The question before us here is, how much water—what property—the plaintiff is entitled to under the description given in the decree of foreclosure. It is proper to say, however, that the defendant offered in evidence the recordation in the proper book of a notice of location of 10,000 inches of water of the Mokelumne river at the point where this ditch connects with the river. This offer was excluded, but there is evidence of an actual appropriation by defendant; and in view of the diversion, and the long and uninterrupted use, of the waters at that point by the defendant, it will be presumed for the purposes of this case, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that a notice was properly posted.

In determining whether the property now known as the "Amador Canal," and its appurtenances is an improvement of the original Butte ditch, and incident to it, or such an addition as may be said to have been contemplated by the parties to the mortgage, and constituting a basis for a decree subjecting it to the payment of the debt secured by the mortgages of 1868, it is important to bear in mind the events which have produced the changes in the character of the property, and the order in which they occurred. At the time the mortgages were given (August and September, 1868) the Butte ditch was about nineteen miles and a half in length, and extended from Pine-Log crossing to Slab Town, just as it is described in the mortgage, lis pendens, complaint, and decree. Immediately after the Butte Ditch Company received the money from the plaintiff, and gave mortgages therefor, the ditch was extended by means of a pipe 1,200 or 1,300 feet above Pine-Log crossing. This pipe carried 1,500 inches, which was double the capacity of the Butte ditch. On January 26, 1870, a notice was posted on behalf of the Butte Ditch Company claiming 5,000 inches of water at the point where the new ditch heads. In July, 1870, work was begun upon the first extension, but several miles north-west of the tunnel. This work was done by the Sutter Canal & Mining Company. The company worked towards the tunnel, leaving spaces for flumes. July 15th the property was conveyed to Bowman, and on July 16th Bowman sold to the Sutter Canal & Mining Company. It was the intention of the company, when it commenced the new construction, to build the ditch to the tunnel, excavate the tunnel, and from there construct the ditch to the point where the new ditch now heads, whenever the company could make sufficient money to enable it to complete the same. It was thought that, when a connection was made with the old ditch above the tunnel, the company could, by turning the water of the old ditch into the new ditch, and by turning the water down to Sutter creek, make sufficient money to complete the ditch to the point where the notice for 5,000 inches of water had been posted. At that time, the company, therefore, knew that it had not sufficient funds to finish the work in a reasonable time, so as to comply with the law applicable to the appropriation of water. The company struggled along with the work, however, completing the greater portion of the ditch to the tunnel, and excavating the tunnel, and built the new ditch along the river, above the old ditch, until it reached the lower end of Bald Rock. Here the lower end of the flume, which constituted a portion of the old ditch, was elevated so that the water from it ran into the new ditch they had built to that point. The water from the old ditch ran into the new ditch for two weeks after the connection thus made, but it never reached further than two miles below the point of connection in the new ditch, while the Sutter Canal & Mining Company held it. At this point the company failed, and was soon adjudged a bankrupt. The work stopped in the fall of 1871, at which time the water was turned out of the ditch, and abandoned until the Amador Canal & Mining Company turned it in again. The Sutter Canal & Mining Company was adjudged a bankrupt in March 1872. On October 4, 1873, the decree of foreclosure was entered in the suit referred to; on the 11th of October, 1873, the deed from Napthaly, assignee in bankruptcy, was delivered to the defendant corporation; and on October 14th, the defendant began work on the ditch at the point where the connection had been made with the old ditch at the lower end of Bald Rock. At this point a flume 80 feet higher than the old flume was placed around Bald Rock to the upper end thereof, and the ditch was constructed to the point where it now heads, and completed in the fall of 1874. Since the completion of the ditch in 1874 many miles of branch ditches have been built in different places, carrying the water in directions and to points different and far from those reached by the Butte Ditch Company.

How, therefore, can it be said that the property as it now stands is an improvement of the property as originally mortgaged by the Butte Ditch Company, or is an incident to it, or is such an addition as may be said to have been contemplated by the parties to the mortgage, or that the new ditch was built for the purpose of using to better advantage the water-rights and franchises of the old Butte ditch, or was constructed to take its place? It may have been the intention of the Sutter Canal & Mining Company to use, by means of the canal it was constructing, the water-right and franchise purchased by Bowman of the Butte Ditch Company, but in its failure to prosecute the work, as we have seen, it never acquired any greater franchise than that which was held by the Butte Ditch Company when it executed the mortgages to this plaintiff. It is said: "If the water-right and franchises of the Butte Ditch Company had not been purchased by Bowman, no new canal could have been constructed, because neither Bowman nor the Sutter Canal & Mining Company or this defendant ever took up, located, or acquired any water-right other than that of the Butte Ditch Company;" but there is nothing in the transcript to warrant the statement. A new canal could have been constructed without regard to the franchises held by the Butte Ditch Company, or by Bowman, or by the Sutter Canal Company; and it is not probable that a ditch of such capacity would be built for the purpose of using the water-right of the Butte ditch only,—about 750 inches. The inability and failure of the Sutter Canal & Mining Company to prosecute the work of construction left the franchise of the Butte Ditch Company no greater than it was at the time the mortgage was executed. The quantity of water to which the company was entitled is somewhat uncertain, and we do not mean to express any opinion upon that matter.

There can be no doubt that the Sutter Canal & Mining Company lost its right to the additional 5,000 inches claimed by it. The provisions of the Code are conclusive. Section 1416 of the Civil Code provides that, "within sixty days after the notice is posted, the claimant must commence the excavation or construction of the works in which he intends to divert the water, and must prosecute the work diligently and uninterruptedly to completion, unless temporarily interrupted by snow or rain." Section 1417 provides that "by 'completion' is meant conducting the waters to the place of intended use." Section 1420 provides that "persons who have heretofore claimed the right to water, and who have not constructed works in which to divert it, and who have not diverted nor applied it to some useful purpose, must after this title takes effect, and within twenty days thereafter, proceed as in this title provided, or their right ceases." See also, cases cited under said sections in Deering's Annotated Civil Code. At the time of the entry of the decree of foreclosure, October 4, 1873, no part of the ditch as it now exists was constructed between the lower end of Bald Rock and the river. Work was not commenced upon that portion of the ditch until 10 days after the entry of that decree. There was at the time of the entry of that decree a continuous line of ditch from Slab Town and the tunnel to the point on the river where the iron pipe had been laid, twelve or thirteen hundred feet above Pine-Log crossing. We cannot perceive how any ditch or ditches which were constructed subsequently can be claimed by the plaintiff under the decree. With respect to after-acquired property, it is only when the parties by their contract intend to create a positive lien or charge upon the property, that the lien attaches as a charge upon the particular property, or where it is an improvement or extension; or where it is expected to be the fruit of an undertaking already commenced, or a thing which, in the ordinary course of events, will exist at a future time, and which may be said, reasonably, to have been contemplated by the parties to the contract. Seymour v. Railroad Co., 25 Barb. 305; Barnard v. Eaton, 2 Cush. 302; 1 Jones, Mortg. § 153. A man cannot grant a thing which he has not. The thing granted or pledged must have an actual or potential existence. There must be something in presenti of which the thing in futuro is to be the product, or necessary for its use, or incident to it. If it were otherwise, all property might be fettered with long-made and unknown mortgages, and the purchase thereof be made extremely hazardous.

In this state "a mortgage can be created, renewed, or extended only by writing executed with the formalities required in the case of a grant of real property." There is no mention made in the mortgage of any water-right to be thereafter acquired; nor is there any language indicating any intention that the mortgage should cover after-acquired property of the character in controversy. The property is described in the mortgage with certainty. It was, at the time of the execution of the mortgage, well known, and there is now no dispute as to what property was at that time in existence. The Amador Canal Company received from the assignee a conveyance which in terms described the property as it then existed. The complaint necessarily alleged, in view of the theory of the plaintiff, that the property in controversy "was, and is in fact, the Butte-Ditch property hereinbefore referred to, although the same had been altered, extended, and improved; and all the franchises, water-rights, and rights of way thereby conveyed to said Amador Canal & Mining Company were the franchises, water-rights, and rights of way formerly owned by said Butte Ditch Company, * * * and that said company continued the work of altering and improving said property, * * * and all the said improvements were made for the purpose of employing to better advantage those water-rights covered by said mortgages, and the said property is and was subject to said mortgages of this plaintiff." But the findings of the court and the evidence show, we think, that the property in controversy is not the old Butte ditch, altered, extended, and improved; and that the Amador canal should not be considered as an appurtenance to the Butte Ditch. It is a singular fact that although the name of the ditch was changed after the purchase by the Sutter Canal & Mining Company, and again after the purchase by this company, yet no mention of these changes was made in the descriptions given in the foreclosure proceedings. In the complaint, lis pendens, decree, and deed it is described as "that certain ditch commonly known as and called the 'Butte Ditch,'" etc. Its place of commencement is fixed, and places to which it carries water are named. There is nothing indicating an intention to cover any ditches thereafter to be constructed; the language being, "Together with all the appurtenances, flumes, aqueducts, branch ditches, reservoirs, pipes, and cabins connected with, or in any manner belonging to, the ditch property above mentioned, with the right to take water from the north fork of the Mokelumne river." The new ditch was not projected at the time the mortgage was executed, and there is nothing to show that it was at that time ever contemplated.

In Ellison v. Water Co. the court considered a mortgage which, by its terms, covered, not only the works completed at the time of the execution of the instrument, but also all work then in progress, and thereafter to be constructed, by the company for conducting and distributing water; and yet Mr. Justice FIELD, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "This broad language cannot, however, we apprehend, give a lien upon ditches for the construction of which no steps had been taken by a survey and location of lines, and which rested merely in contemplation. Some specific right of way, capable of identification from a previous survey or location, would seem to be necessary to constitute such property as is capable of mortgage or transfer, so as to pass subsequently constructed works thereon." 12 Cal. 554. Although this portion of the opinion appears to be dictum, it is nevertheless in accord with the weight of authority, and establishes a safe and certain rule for the protection of mortgagor, mortgagee, and creditor. While there is no evidence that there are in this case any creditors of the present owners of the property, there is no safe principle applicable which does not contemplate the rights of third persons who are bound only by the record. And in railroad cases, where the termini of the road are given in the mortgage, and authority is thereafter given to extend the road, such extension is not subject to the mortgage, unless the language of the instrument clearly and expressly includes such extensions. Randolph v. Railroad Co., 28 N. J. Eq. 49; Chapman v. Railroad Co., 26 W. Va. 310.

It is claimed that Mining Co. v. Moses, 58 Cal. 168, is a case directly in point and conclusive herein. In that case the principal property mortgaged was an extensive set of mining claims known as the "Kelly & Co. Claims." There was mortgaged, in connection with said claims, all the ditches, reservoirs, etc., used for working said claims. The ditches owned by the defendant in that case were used exclusively for the purpose of conveying the waters of Gansner creek and intermediate streams upon said claims. It clearly appears from the facts in that case that all of the works constructed by Gurnee, and all of the water-rights which he acquired, if any, were acquired solely for the purpose of being used in connection with the mines, which were the principal property mortgaged, and as such, were appurtenant to the mines. In his (Gurnee's) deed to the Hungarian Hill Gold Mining Company, he particularly described each parcel of the property, and provided that the whole thereof was subject to the mortgage which he had executed to the defendants, and that plaintiff should fully discharge and pay the same. In 1875, the plaintiff in that case, for convenience in working the claims, moved one of the water-pipes to the Hersey claim, for the purpose of working up the channel to the Kelly & Co. claims, and of working said claims to better advantage. In the foreclosure proceedings the Hungarian Hill Gold Mining Company was a defendant, and duly served with summons. A decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff, Moses, foreclosing said mortgage, and directed the sale of the "said Kelly & Co. mining claims, and all water-ditches, including the Salt Creek ditch, with all the water, water-rights, and privileges belonging to the said water-ditches, and each of them, and all reservoirs used, had, and belonging to said mining claims." In that case Gurnee was the mortgagor, and the owner of all the property in dispute, although the new ditch and reservoir were built by him after he executed the mortgage. The new ditch was clearly appurtenant to the principal property mortgaged. Both Gurnee and the Hungarian Hill Gold Mining Company were made parties to the foreclosure suit. The language employed in the mortgage to describe the property in that case was comprehensive, and, in view of the use made of the water, can be construed fairly to include the new property. It described the mining claims, and "also, all the water-ditches leading water onto said claims, including the ditch from Salt creek, with all the water, water-rights, and privileges belonging to said water-ditches; also all mining tools, implements, tunnels, cuts, flumes, and reservoirs used, had, and belonging to said claims, and every part and portion thereof; together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining." In this case there is no evidence of an agreement on the part of the defendant to pay the mortgages on the mortgaged property. The mortgagors never owned any portion of the property which is here in dispute, and described as the "Amador Canal." The mortgage was given upon the Butte ditch, which was not appurtenant to any other property mortgaged, except to the water-right of Pine-Log crossing. The water here is not used, or intended for use, at any particular place, or for any particular purpose, but is intended for sale to other parties. In this case no part of the property in dispute existed when the foreclosure suit was commenced, and neither the Sutter Canal & Mining Company nor the Amador Canal & Mining Company was a party to the suit. As stated by the respondent in his brief, in Mining Co. v. Moses, the property there in controversy "was clearly but an enlargement of a ditch and water-right, conceded as belonging to the estate mortgaged, or as an improvement thereon. The mortgagor, in making it, looked to the redemption of the property, and made the expenditure for his own benefit. He knew that he could save himself from loss by paying the debt for which the property was mortgaged. With this in view, he conveyed the whole property to plaintiff; expressly providing in the deed that plaintiff took the same subject to such lien, and that it should pay and discharge the mortgage."

In Quirk v. Falk, 47 Cal. 453, the court did not say that the water-ditch, and the water-right thereto appertaining, could not be appurtenant to a mining claim; but simply said that the plaintiff had failed to prove that the larger portion of the water was used in working those claims, and had failed to prove that the water-ditch, and water-right thereto appertaining, became appurtenant to the monitor claims. In Wood v. Whelen, 93 Ill. 153, cited by the respondent, the new gas-pipe works were held to be simply additions, fixtures, and therefore appurtenants to the property mortgaged. It was there said: "The granting clause of the mortgage is very comprehensive, and was, no doubt, intended to, as it does, include everything appertaining to the gas-works." A large number of cases has been cited by the respondent, but we deem it unnecessary, in view of what has been said herein, to review them at length. They are nearly all cases of mortgages upon railroad property. In some of the cases cited, the court held that the mortgage, by its terms, covered after-acquired property; in others, that after-acquired property passed as an incident to the franchise, as an accession to the subject of the mortgage, because essential to the exercise of the franchise, and incident to it. In Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186, it was held, in effect, that the structure—the bridge—was the superior thing, and that the land on either side passed as appurtenant to it. The property conveyed was "a certain bridge located, situated, and lying on the south fork of the Yuba river, etc., known as 'Spark's Bridge,' across the south fork of said river; together with the toll-houses, stables, and also the right and privilege of said Sparks in and to the dug road there made on each side of said bridge; together with all the privileges and appurtenances appertaining and in anywise belonging to said bridge." Where the structure is the principal thing conveyed, under such circumstances as appeared in that case, it will carry with it the title of the grantor in the land upon which it stands, or with which it is connected.

2. The court found that in the action of the Amador Canal & Mining Company against Mitchell the question was litigated as to whether the property acquired from the assignee by the Amador Canal & Mining Company was subject to the said mortgage; and that, after hearing and trial thereof, it was finally determined in favor of this plaintiff. This, we think, is an erroneous construction of the judgment in that case. The plaintiff there did not seek to have construed the decree of foreclosure, nor to determine the scope or effect thereof. The action was brought to set aside the decree of foreclosure on the ground of fraud. The title to the Amador Canal was not there litigated. The court determined that there was no fraud; and that the Amador Canal & Mining Company, being a purchaser pendente lite, was bound by the decree of foreclosure, though not made a party to the suit. The question raised here, namely, what property is included in the descriptions given in the complaint, lis pendens, decree, and sheriff's deed, was not considered. Mining Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 168.

3. There can be no doubt, we think, that the acts of the defendant in destroying the old ditch and flume from Bald Rock towards the river, and in converting the lumber to its own use, were unlawful, and rendered the company liable in an action for damages. It is a question, however, whether such damages can be recovered in this action. It is difficult to determine from the issues herein whether the action can be considered anything beyond one in ejectment, and for rents, issues, and profits. There is, however, an allegation in the complaint that, "in the performance of said work, the said ditch or canal [Butte ditch] as originally constructed has been to a large extent filled up and destroyed," etc. There is also an allegation "that, by reason of the premises and the facts hereinbefore alleged, the plaintiff has been damaged by the defendant in the sum of $500,000;" and there is a prayer for the recovery from defendant of the sum of $500,000 damages. There is also a prayer for the appointment of a receiver, for the possession of the canal and water-rights, and for such other and further relief in the premises as shall be just and equitable. There was no demurrer to the complaint, but defendant answered, denying specifically the allegations of the complaint; and the trial seems to have proceeded upon the theory that it is an action to recover the land, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof. The defendant was not bound to use, improve, or repair the property; but it was the duty of the defendant, when it went into the possession of the property under the deed from Nathaly, as assignee, at least, not to destroy it. It had the right of redemption and actual possession. The defendant was in one sense a bailiff for the plaintiff with respect to such property, and as such during the time it held possession was bound to do no act that would injure it. The defendant destroyed it and must now be held responsible for the waste. We think that the plaintiff may recover in this action the damages occasioned to him by the acts of the defendant, notwithstanding the fact that he has heretofore claimed other relief. The remedy for waste is ordinarily at law, but, where it is for the purpose of preserving the security of a mortgage, equity will interpose, by injunction, to prevent future waste, and in the same action an accounting will be decreed, and compensation given for past waste. For this purpose, "the remedy by bill in equity is so much more easy, expeditious, and complete that it is now almost invariably resorted to." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 917; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 515-518. Both before and after a decree of foreclosure, chancery will interpose to prevent any injury to the inheritance which depreciates the mortgage security; and the court will not "turn the plaintiff round to an action at law," but will require an accounting for waste committed by the one in possession. 1 Hil. Real Prop. 375-377; Sarles v. Sarles, 3 Sandf. Ch. 601. In this respect "the court of chancery does not now treat questions of destructive damage to property exactly as it did forty or fifty years back; its protection being more largely afforded than it then generally was." Add. Torts, 252.

The right of the plaintiff to take water from the north fork of the Mokelumne river still exists to the extent that the Butte ditch owned the same at the time the mortgage was executed; but plaintiff will be entitled to recover the actual damage sustained by reason of the negligent and wrongful acts of the defendant. From the lower end of Bald Rock towards the river the Butte ditch was destroyed, and the flume and pipes were appropriated by the defendant, and plaintiff prevented from using his water-right. The measure of damages, therefore, must be the value of property destroyed, and compensation for the loss of the use of his water-right for such period as would have been necessary to enable the plaintiff to reconstruct his ditch after the same was destroyed from the point where it tapped the river to the lower end of Bald Rock. If the new ditch between these points is constructed upon a line which renders it necessary for plaintiff to build his ditch upon another more difficult and more expensive line than that upon which the old ditch was built, plaintiff will be entitled to additional damages to the extent of the difference in cost of construction upon the old line and the cost of construction upon the most feasible line remaining.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings, if they shall be so advised.

DOANE v. HOUGHTON. (No. 9,732.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1888.)

1. PLEADING—AMENDMENT—STRIKING OUT NAMES OF DEFENDANTS NOT SERVED.

An action was dismissed, on trial, as to certain defendants, and the court directed the complaint to be amended by simply striking out of the caption the names of said defendants. Held no error, there being no showing that the defendants dismissed were ever served.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET ASSESSMENTS—ACTION TO ENFORCE LIEN.

In an action to enforce a street-assessment lien, the work ordered by the board was curbing and sidewalking. The notice, bids, and contract mentioned corners, but it did not appear whether the corners were part of the sidewalk or parts of a crossing. Held, that it would not be presumed that any part of a crossing was included in the assessment.

3. SAME—PLEADING.

Under act Cal. April 1, 1872, relating to the enforcement of liens for street assessment, a complaint in an action to enforce such lien need not set out any of the proceedings prior to the issuance of the assessment, want of jurisdiction to order the work being a matter of defense.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Taylor & Haight, for appellant. J. M. Wood, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action is to enforce the lien of a street assessment. Defendant appealed from the judgment. At the trial, on motion of plaintiff, the action was dismissed as to certain defendants, and the complaint, by direction of the court, was amended by striking out of the caption thereof the names of said defendants, without filing an amended complaint.

1. This method of amending a pleading cannot be commended. It is irregular, and such mutilations are not only slovenly, but dangerous. These defendants, however, were not prejudiced by the action of the court. Upon the evidence, the court found that the property was owned by the remaining defendants only. We think the court committed no error in allowing the amendment. Sections 469, 470, Code Civil Proc. Even if the order had not been made, the judgment on the findings could not have been against the other defendants, whether served or not. There is nothing to show that the defendants dismissed from the case were ever served. The authorities cited, therefore,—Clarke v. Porter, 53 Cal. 410, and Millikin v. Houghton, 4 Pac. Rep. 914,—do not apply. Furthermore, there is no bill of exceptions, and the judgment does not show that there was any objection made by appellant.

2. The work ordered by the board was for curbing and sidewalking Second street, from Folsom to Harrison. The notice, bids, award, and contract mentioned the corners; but it does not appear whether the corners mentioned were a part of the sidewalk, i. e., a part of the work ordered, or whether they were portions of a crossing. They were between the points named, and no mention is made in the assessment of anything except curbs and sidewalks. We cannot say from the judgment roll that any part of a crossing is included in the assessment.

3. Section 13 of the act of April 1, 1872, under which this work was done, provides that "the complaint need not show any of the proceedings prior to the issuance of the assessment, diagram, and certificate; but it shall be held legally sufficient if it shows the title of the court in which the action is brought by the parties, plaintiff and defendant, the date of the issuance of the assessment, the date of the recording thereof, the book and page where recorded, a general statement of the work done, a description of the lot or lots sought to be charged with the assessments, the amount assessed thereon, that the same remains unpaid, and the proper prayer for relief." Want of jurisdiction to order the work is one of the defenses allowed by the act. St. 1871-72, p. 816. We think the complaint states sufficient facts. The judgment is affirmed.

QUAN CHICK v. COFFEY. (No. 12,486.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 27, 1883.)

CERTIORARI—WHEN LIES—OFFICER IN CUSTODY OF RECORD.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1070, providing that the writ of certiorari must be directed to the tribunal, officer, or person having the custody of the record or proceeding to be certified, the action of a magistrate in issuing a search-warrant cannot be reviewed on certiorari directed to him, after he has returned all papers and proceedings had before him to the proper superior court.

In bank. Application for writ of review.

This is an application by Quan Chick for a writ of certiorari to review the action of Hon. J. V. Coffey, judge of the superior court, acting as a magistrate, in issuing a search-warrant on which certain proceedings were afterwards had.

H. H. Lowenthal, for applicant. Matt. I. Sullivan, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. On September 23, 1887, the respondent, Hon. J. V. Coffey, who was a superior judge, acting as a magistrate, issued a certain search-warrant, and certain proceedings were afterwards had thereon. The warrant was issued upon the affidavit of a complainant, made upon information and belief. It is contended that no witnesses were examined, and no depositions were taken which "set forth the facts tending to establish the grounds of the application, or probable cause for believing that they exist," as required by sections 1526, 1527, Pen. Code. It is also contended that for this reason (as well as for other reasons not necessary to be here stated) the respondent exceeded his authority and jurisdiction in issuing said writ; and it is sought, in this proceeding, to review his action through a writ of certiorari. It appears, however, that long before the date of the filing of the petition for this writ, which was January 12, 1888, the respondent, in pursuance of sections 1536, 1541, et seq., Pen. Code, had returned to the proper superior court all the papers and proceedings filed with or had before him in the matter of said search-warrant; that no proceeding in said matter is now pending before him; and that he has no possession of any paper or record therein. Section 1070, Code Civil Proc., provides that the writ of certiorari must be directed to the tribunal, officer, or person "having the custody of the record or proceeding to be certified." It is evident, therefore, that the acts of respondent here sought to be reviewed cannot be reached by this writ. Proceeding dismissed.

PARKE et al. v. FRANK. (No. 9,959.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 27, 1888.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—AGREEMENT NOT TO REVOKE FOR REASONABLE TIME—EFFECT.

Where a principal, for a valuable consideration, agrees with his agent not to revoke the agency for a reasonable time, and from the nature of the contract a rea-reasonable time can be ascertained, the agency is not within Civil Code Cal. § 2356, providing that, unless the power of an agent is coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency, it is terminated by revocation.

2. SAME—REVOCATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for damages arising from the revocation of a contract of agency, where the evidence shows no definite term of agency, but does show an agreement by the principal not to revoke, the refusal of the court to charge that if the jury believe, from the evidence, that no definite time was agreed upon between plaintiffs and defendant for the contract to endure, then said contract could be terminated by either party at any time, is not error.

3. SAME—BREACH OF AGREEMENT NOT TO REVOKE—DAMAGES.

In an action for damages caused by an alleged breach of a contract of agency, the plaintiff failed to prove with reasonable certainty the amount of damage sustained, but left such damages to be fixed entirely by the jury. Held sufficient ground for a new trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by Lyman C. Parke and Benjamin T. Lacy, against A. H. Frank, doing business as A. H. Frank & Co., to recover for damages arising out of a breach of a contract of agency. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Charles P. Eells, for appellant. H. C. Newhall and E. N. Deuprey, for respondents.

McKINSTRY, J. The main contention of the appellant in the court below was that the contract of agency, not being for any definite term, was revocable at the will of the principal. Appellant claims that the rulings of the superior court alleged to be erroneous are exemplified by the portion of its charge to the jury which reads: "No period of time was mentioned. * * * Where employment is proved, and no time is specified, the law presumes it shall last and endure for a reasonable time. What would be a reasonable time is a question for you to determine;" and by the refusal of the court, on request of defendant, to charge: "If the jury believe, from the evidence, that no definite time was agreed upon between plaintiffs and defendant for the contract of agency to endure, then said contract could be terminated by either party thereto, at his option, at any time." The Civil Code provides: "Unless the power of an agent is coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency, it is terminated, as to every person having notice thereof, by its revocation by the principal." Section 2356. The interest which can protect a power after the death of the person who creates it must be an interest in the thing itself, and not an interest in that which is produced by the exercise of the power. Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174. It may be conceded that, by the section of the Civil Code, a revocation by the principal terminates the agency in every case where his death terminates it, and that the plaintiffs herein had no such interest in the subject of the agency as rendered the agency irrevocable. Nevertheless, if, for a valuable consideration, the defendant agreed not to revoke the agency for a reasonable time, and in view of the circumstances and nature of the contract a reasonable time could be ascertained, he had no legal right to revoke it during such time. "Although a letter of attorney depends, from its nature, on the will of the person making it, and may, in general, be recalled at his will, yet if he binds himself for a consideration, in terms, or by the nature of his contract, not to change his will, the law will not permit him to change it." Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 203. In such case, if he fails to comply with his contract, he becomes liable to the agent as such. Even if, however, it should be conceded that, under the Code, the principal retains the right to revoke a power, at his option, in every case where the agent is not vested with an interest in the subject of the agency, this would not render illegal a collateral agreement whereby the principal should agree, for a consideration, not to exercise the power for a definite period, or for a reasonable time ascertainable. In case of such an agreement, if the agency is revoked by the principal, and the agent is thereby deprived of authority further to act as such, the principal is liable in damages by reason of the breach of his promise not to recall the agency. Whether, therefore, it be considered that the defendant violated his contract by refusing to make consignments to the plaintiffs, or violated it by revoking the agency, he would be liable upon proper pleading. And in each case the rule of damages would be the same, that is, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover the direct or approximate damages sustained by reason of defendant's depriving them of the benefits of the agency.

The court below did not err in refusing to give the instruction asked by defendant, because that instruction ignores all evidence tending to show that the defendant agreed not to revoke the agency. But the instruction given, while abstractly correct, suggests that, independent of any express promise or implied promise arising out of the nature of the contract, the defendant had no legal right to put an end to the agency until the expiration of a "reasonable time."

There should be a new trial of the issue as to damages. It seems not infrequently to be lost sight of in the trial courts that, in actions upon contracts, the amount of damages caused by an alleged breach is to be proved as a fact. It is impossible to ascertain from the statement for new trial upon what facts, taken as proved, the jury based their verdict for $4,843.90, or why the verdict was reduced by the court to $3,100 rather than to any other sum. We find no evidence which will sustain a judgment for either amount. This is not an action for a tort; the amount of the recovery was not to be left, upon general principles, to the "sound discretion" or "dispassionate judgment" of the jury. It is an action to recover the actual and proximate damages caused to plaintiff by a failure of defendant to perform his contract. Where there is a legal measure of damages the jury must determine the amount as a fact; otherwise the law which so measures the damages would be of no avail. 1 Suth. Dam. 2. It is often said to be a paramount principle that the person injured shall receive compensation commensurate with his injury, and no more. By reason of the breach of his contract, if he did break it, the defendant here became liable for the full amount of damages which resulted "naturally" (that is, in usual course of things) and proximately from the breach. These were to be proved with reasonable certainty. The particulars of damages were so far capable of ascertainment, and upon the plaintiffs was imposed the obligation of proving them. The matter should not have been left to the conjectures of jurymen. The number of shipments, or quantity of machinery to be sent, was not fixed by the parties, and the plaintiffs very properly made no effort to establish the profits they might have made, during any definite period, had defendant complied with his contract. From the nature of the case, such damages must have been purely speculative. But there is nothing in the record to indicate but that they could have proved, with reasonable certainty, what necessary expenses they were induced to incur, by reason of defendant's promise, for the purpose of carrying out their contract with him, as distinct from their contracts, if any, with the R. W. Gardner & Lehigh Valley E. W. Company; or what special damages pleaded, if any, they sustained by reason of loss of profits upon orders of defendant for machinery which the latter refused to fill, in case the evidence showed such machinery had been ordered from them by responsible third parties, or would have been sold had it been received in due course. The plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the difference between the manufacturer's prices for machines and the enhanced prices paid by them for the purchase of machines from other persons in the east. These were independent transactions, which were not the direct consequence of the breach of the defendant's agreement, and cannot, as matter of law, be said to have been contemplated by him.

On the whole case, we think the interests of justice demand a new trial. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

PEOPLE v. COLLINS. (No. 20,378.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1888.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—ENGAGEMENTS OF COUNSEL.

A motion for continuance on the ground that counsel had been prevented from making due preparation for trial by a prior engagement is addressed to the discretion of the court, and will not be reviewed except for abuse.

2. SAME—WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT—HARMLESS ERROR.

Defendant having been called as witness, error in admitting testimony impeaching him will be disregarded where it does not prejudice his case.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Appeal by defendant from a judgment and order refusing a new trial.

John D. Whaley, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. We are urged by appellant's counsel to reverse the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, on two grounds, neither of which, in our opinion, is tenable.

1. The defendant's motion for a continuance on the ground that his counsel had been unable, in consequence of another and prior engagement, to make due preparation for the trial of defendant's case, was one which addressed itself to the sound discretion of the court below, and ought not to be interfered with unless we could see clearly that there had been an abuse of discretion, which is not in this case apparent to us.

2. Defendant was examined as a witness in his own behalf; and for the purpose of impeaching him the prosecution called one Adams as a witness, and, after he had testified to having known the defendant about four years, the prosecuting attorney asked him if he knew the defendant's general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he lives. The witness answered: "I don't know, as I never heard." The witness was then asked by said counsel to say whether he knew it or not. He answered: "I do not." Some other questions elicited from him the statement that he did not know where the defendant lived, and therefore could not state what his reputation was where he lived. The district attorney then asked the witness this question: "Do you know his reputation for honesty and integrity in this community of San Francisco?" The question was objected to, and the court overruled the objection. The witness answered in the affirmative; and to the question, "What is it?" answered, "Bad." This question is not in the approved form, and the court should have sustained the objection to it. But the error, in our opinion, did not prejudice the defendant's case, and therefore must be disregarded. The other witnesses to whom the questions were put in proper form testified that defendant's reputation was bad in the community where he lived. In view of the character of the other evidence in the case, we think the evidence as to the defendant's reputation superfluous.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MYER. (No. 20,383.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1888.)

1. LARCENY—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ASPORTATION.

Evidence that defendant was found in possession of an overcoat taken from a dummy, but still fastened to it by a chain through the sleeves, the dummy being on the sidewalk, and tied to the building by a string, as there was no asportation, does not show larceny under Pen. Code Cal. § 484, defining larceny to be the felonious stealing, taking, or carrying away the personal property of another.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—DEFENDANT AS WITNESS—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Pen. Code Cal. § 1323, provides that defendant in a criminal action cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but, if he offer himself as witness, may be cross-examined as to all matters about which he was examined in chief. Defendant testified in chief merely that he had been drinking, and, as he was walking along, fell over something, and the first thing he knew somebody grabbed him. Questions, on cross-examination, if he had ever gone under an alias, or had ever been convicted of felony, held permissible. McFARLAND and PATERSON, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco;

D. J. MURPHY, Judge.

On information against defendant, Frank Myer, for stealing an overcoat, defendant was convicted, and appeals.

John D'Arcy, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The defendant was tried on an information in which it was charged that he willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously stole, took, and carried away one overcoat of the value of $20, the personal property of Harris Joseph and Lewis Joseph. On the trial Lewis Joseph testified as follows: "I had, as usual, placed and buttoned an overcoat upon a dummy which stood on the sidewalk outside of my store. I was inside the store, and heard the chain of the dummy rattle, and on coming outside found defendant with said coat unbuttoned from the dummy, and under his arm, the same being entirely removed from the dummy, and about two feet therefrom and from the place where it had been originally placed on the dummy by me; and the accused was in the act of walking off with said coat when grabbed by me, he being prevented from taking it away because said coat was chained to the dummy by a chain which ran through the coat-sleeve, and the dummy was tied to the building by a string." This was the only evidence introduced to prove the charge of larceny. The jury, on this evidence, returned a verdict of guilty of petit larceny as charged; and the defendant, having pleaded guilty of prior convictions of other petit larcenies, was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of two years. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from that order and the judgment this appeal is taken.

Appellant insists that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, which, it is claimed, does not prove that the defendant carried away the coat which he is charged with having stolen, but proves that he did not. "Larceny," as defined in the Penal Code of this state, "is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another." This is substantially the common law definition, under which it was held that it must be shown that the goods were severed from the possession or custody of the owner, and in the possession of the thief, though it be but for a moment. Thus where goods were tied by a string, the other end of which was fastened to the counter, and the thief took the goods and carried them towards the door as far as the string would permit, and was then stopped, this was held not to be a severance from the owner's possession, and consequently no felony. 3 Greenl. Ev. § 155. "In the language of the old definition of larceny," says Bishop, "the goods taken must be carried away. But they need not be retained in the possession of the thief, neither need they be removed from the owner's premises. The doctrine is that any removal, however slight, of the entire article, which is not attached either to the soil or to anything not removed, is sufficient; while nothings short of this will do." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, 794. The attorney general admits that this is the doctrine of the English cases. In State v. Jones, 65 N. C. 395, the court says: "There must be an asportation of the article alleged to be stolen, to complete the crime of larceny. The question as to what constitutes a sufficient asportation has given rise to many nice distinctions in the courts of England, and the rules there established have been generally observed by the courts of this country." People v. Williams, 35 Cal. 671, was not so clearly within the rule as this case is; but the court said that it did not feel at liberty to depart from a rule so long and so firmly established by numerous decisions. Tested by that rule, the evidence in this case was clearly insufficient to justify the verdict, and the defendant is entitled to a new trial on that ground.

There is another alleged error which we deem it our duty to pass on, particularly as the case must be remanded for a new trial. The defendant testified, in his own behalf, that he had been drinking, and as he was walking along fell over something, and the first thing he knew somebody grabbed him. This was all he testified to on his examination in chief. On cross-examination he was asked what was his true name. He replied, "Frank Myer." He was then asked, against his counsel's objections, the following questions: "Did you ever go by the name of Frank Miller? Did you ever go by the name of Frank Smith? Did you ever go by the name of Otto Meyer? Have you ever been convicted of a felony in this city and county?" These questions were all answered in the affirmative, and had a tendency to throw discredit on defendant's testimony. "A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but, if he offer himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief." Pen. Code, § 1323. In People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597, the defendant, on cross-examination, was asked if he had not previously been convicted of a certain felony. He answered that he had not, and the district attorney was permitted, against the objection of defendant's counsel, to introduce in evidence a record of such prior conviction. The ruling of the lower court was sustained by this court, and we think the case directly in point here. There are expressions to be found in the opinions of courts for which we entertain the highest respect which seem to militate against this view of the matter, but none in which the precise question here presented was involved. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; MCKINSTRY, J.; THORNTON, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment; but I dissent from the latter part of the opinion of the court, which holds that certain questions were properly allowed to be asked defendant on his cross-examination. The limit of cross-examination of ordinary witnesses is not marked with any great accuracy or distinctness. Questions are frequently allowed which strictly do not refer to the matters about which the witnesses testified in chief. Great latitude is given trial courts in passing upon the admissibility of such questions; and their discretion is rarely interfered with by appellate courts. Now, if the legislature had intended to put a defendant in a criminal case, testifying for himself, upon the same footing as other witnesses, it could easily have signified that intention in one of two ways: First, by saying nothing about it; or, second, by saying, affirmatively, that he should be subject to cross-examination as other witnesses. But the language of section 1323, Pen. Code, is that he may be cross-examined "as to all matters about which he was examined in chief." Therefore either no signification at all must be given to this language,—which would be to violate a cardinal rule of construction,—or else it must be held to be a limitation of the general practice on cross-examination, and the establishment of definite boundaries within which the cross-examination of a defendant must be confined. And that the latter is the true construction seems to me to be most obvious and clear. I cannot understand how the language can be held to mean anything else. It must be remembered that the privilege given a defendant in a criminal case to testify for himself is by no means an unmixed blessing. There are cases where an innocent defendant could do himself no good, and might do himself harm, by going on the witness-stand. But his refusal to do so will be construed to his injury by the average jurymen, in spite of any instruction the court may give on the subject. And, then, if he does testify, his temptation to commit perjury will be considered so great that he will rarely be credited with telling the truth. But if he cannot go upon the stand for the mere purpose of stating a fact which will explain some suspicious circumstance, without being forced, upon cross-examination, to lay bare the whole history of his life, he had better keep away from it, unless, indeed, instead of having a human character, he is a miraculous bundle of virtues, with no vice, and with nothing which men call a vice. And, no doubt, these and similar considerations induced the legislature to throw around him the slight protection, at least, which is contained in the section of the Code under consideration. I do not understand that in People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597, anything more was intended to be decided than that, when a defendant is a witness, he may be impeached, by independent evidence, of his bad reputation for truth, etc., or of his conviction of a felony, as provided in section 2051, Code Civil Proc. But other provisions inconsistent with section 1323, Pen. Code, should be construed as not including those who have the dual character of witness and defendant. I think that the objection to each of the questions asked of defendant on cross-examination should have been sustained.

Judgment against A. W. Vigoureux, defendant and appellant, on action by A. S. Barney to recover debt on promissory note. Affidavit of service did not allege that affiant was over 18 years of age at time of service.

I. N. Thorne, for appellant. W. H. Allen, for respondent.

McKINSTRY, J. The summons was not served on the defendant A. W. Vigoureux. Maynard v. MacCrellish, 57 Cal. 355; Howard v. Galloway, 60 Cal. 10; Weil v. Bent, Id. 603; Doerfler v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 265; Lyons v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 43, 4 Pac. Rep. 938. Nor did A. W. Vigoureux appear in the action before or after the judgment. The superior court had no jurisdiction to enter the judgment against him.

W. A. Vigoureux, calling himself "one of the defendants" in the action, gave notice of a motion to vacate the judgment, quash executions issued thereon, etc. The notice was accompanied by an affidavit made and subscribed.

scribed W. A. Vigoureux, wherein the affiant swore that he was one of the persons named as defendant in the action B. A. Barney v. A. W. Vigoureux et al.; and that the summons in that action was on the 30th September, 1878, returned and filed, "with an affidavit of a pretended service thereof on the affiant;" that a judgment was entered "in favor of plaintiff, and against this affiant;" that an execution was issued on the judgment, under which the sheriff had sold "all the right, title, and interest of this affiant, defendant as aforesaid," in certain described land and premises, of which the affiant is owner and in possession. The affidavit proceeds to state facts showing that the affiant was not served at all, and to aver that he had no notice or knowledge of the action, or that a judgment had been entered against him, until after the sale of certain personal property of his, under an execution running to Santa Clara county. However persistent the effort of W. A. Vigoureux to make himself by affidavit a defendant in the judgment, he did not succeed in the attempt. A. W. Vigoureux has appealed from the order of the superior court denying the motion of W. A. Vigoureux. He can hardly complain that, under a judgment against him, the sheriff has levied upon and sold property of W. A. Vigoureux. Had W. A. Vigoureux been served with summons, the judgment would perhaps have bound him, notwithstanding a misnomer, if there was one, in the absence of a plea in abatement. But there was no service upon any defendant in the action other than Banks, and no judgment was entered against W. A. Vigoureux. Nevertheless, as the complaint was not answered by A. W. Vigoureux, nor by any person served as A. W. Vigoureux, the affidavit or proof of service was a necessary part of the judgment roll. Code Civil Proc. § 670. Thus it appears on the face of the judgment roll that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant Vigoureux. On this fact being called to the attention of the court below in any manner, the judgment should have been vacated; but, under the circumstances, no costs should be allowed appellant, who took no steps to set aside the judgment in the court below, but acquiesced in the making of his debt out of the property of another person. The foregoing assumes that A. W. and W. A. Vigoureux are two men, and not the same man, because such is the fact, so far as appears from the judgment roll.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter an order vacating and setting aside the judgment, and the proceeding taken under it, without costs to the appellant, either in this court or in the superior court.

In re ROMERO'S ESTATE. (No. 12,366.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1888.)

HOMESTEAD—WHO ENTITLED—ADOPTED CHILDREN.

On an application to set apart a homestead it appeared that petitioner was the child of a woman who was divorced from her husband. It did not appear that at the time of his birth his mother had separated from her husband, and was living with deceased, nor was there any evidence of his adoption by the latter. Held, that the petitioner must be taken to be the child of the lawful husband, and therefore not entitled to the order claimed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Edwardo Romero presented a petition asking to have a homestead set apart for himself and Carrie Romero, alleging themselves to be the minor children of Ramon Romero. Petition refused. Petitioner appeals.

N. A. Dorn and W. M. R. Parker, for appellants. R. M. F. Soto and Hermann & Soto, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal from an order refusing to set apart a homestead. Edwardo Romero presented a petition to the court below, asking to have a homestead set apart for the use of himself and his sister, Carrie Romero, who were alleged to be the minor children of Ramon Romero, deceased. A brother and sister of the deceased objected to the homestead being set apart, and, as the ground of their objection, alleged that the said Edwardo and Carrie were not the children of deceased; that he was never married, and that he left surviving him at the time of his death no child or children, either legitimate or illegitimate. At the hearing it was shown for the petitioner that Ramon Romero died intestate, in the county of Monterey, on the 18th day of May, 1884, and that administration on his estate was afterwards taken out, and an inventory was returned, showing personal property belonging to the estate of the value of $381, and real property of the value of $700. A declaration of homestead made by the deceased was then introduced in evidence. The declaration was dated April 30, 1881, and was properly acknowledged and filed for record on the same day. In it the claimant declared "that I am the head of a family, consisting of myself and my two minor children, Edwardo and Carolina, and I do now, at the time of making this declaration, actually reside with my said family on the land and premises hereinafter described." The petitioner was then sworn as a witness, and testified as follows: "I knew Ramon Romero in his life-time; he was my father. Myself and my sister, Carrie Romero, lived with him all the time, up to the time of his death, on the land described in the petition. We lived there for the last ten years. We were living on said land on the 30th day of April, 1881, and for a long time before. We have lived on said land ever since the death of my father, and live there still. I am twenty years of age, and my sister is sixteen years of age. At the time my father made his declaration of homestead, in 1881, myself and my sister were living with my father on the said land, and there were no other children living with him. My mother is still living with us on the same land. Her name is Maria de Los Angeles Botiller." For the contestants a witness was called who testified that he had lived in the town of Monterey for about 25 years, and had been well acquainted with Ramon Romero, who had also lived in the town the greatest portion of that time; that he never knew or heard that Romero was married; that he knew the mother of Edwardo Romero, and her name was usually called Maria de Los Angeles Botiller. The judgment roll in a case commenced by Maria de Los Angeles Botiller against José Joaquin Botiller, in the district court of Monterey county, was then introduced and read in evidence. The complaint was filed on the 6th day of November, 1872, and alleged that the parties were married in 1855, and were still husband and wife, and asked for a divorce on the ground of desertion. The summons was personally served on the defendant on the 12th day of the same month. The court found, among other things, that plaintiff had "in all respects conducted herself towards the defendant as became a kind, affectionate, and faithful wife." The decree was entered March 20, 1873, and granted the plaintiff the divorce prayed for. The foregoing are all the facts appearing in the record, and upon them the Court denied the petition. If the petitioner and his sister were the minor children of the decedent, they were entitled to have the homestead set apart for their use. Code Civil Proc. § 1465. But if they were not his children in fact, or by adoption, they were not entitled to have the homestead set apart. Whether they were his children or not, was then the single issue to be determined. The evidence shows that the youngest of them was born more than 16 years prior to the time of the hearing, which was on the 28th of February, 1887. They were the children of Maria de Los Angeles Botiller, who, at the times of their birth, was the lawful wife of José Joaquin Botiller. They are presumed, therefore, to be legitimate and the issue of their mother's husband. Civil Code, §§ 193-195. There was no evidence showing that they had been adopted by their alleged father in the manner prescribed by law, (Civil Code, §§ 221-230,) and in the absence of such proof no presumption that they had been adopted can be indulged. No written findings were filed, but the court must have found all the material facts against the appellants, and there are no specifications of errors or particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision. The decision is presumed to be right, and the order must be affirmed unless error is affirmatively shown by the record. We find no error in the record, and therefore advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment, because it does not appear (although it was probably the fact) that at the time of the birth of the children their mother had separated from her husband, and was living with the deceased. Had this fact appeared, it would, with the other evidence, have been sufficient to overcome the presumption, (not conclusive,) based upon the marriage, that they were the children of Botiller. It seems to be a hardship to take this little home away from these children, for whom the deceased intended it, and give it to mere collateral kin; but I see no way to avoid it. If the court below had given judgment the other way, even upon the meager evidence offered, I should not have felt like disturbing it. If they are the children of the deceased, they were publicly recognized as provided in section 230, Civil Code, and no other adoption was necessary.

PEOPLE v. BENTLEY. (No. 20,364.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1888.)

1. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

On a trial for assault to commit murder, evidence as to acts and declarations of a third party, tending to show a conspiracy between him and defendant to commit the crime, is admissible as part of the res gestæ.¹

2. SAME—CONVICTION FOR LESSER OFFENSE.

Under an information charging assault to commit murder, defendant may be convicted of assault with a deadly weapon.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

W. A. Gray and Oregon Sanders, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SEARLS, C. J. The defendant was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, upon an information charging him with an assault to commit murder. The evidence at the trial tended to show that the prosecuting witness, Moore, and one Baker were, on the evening of May 3, 1887, at Tulare, and were desirous of going to Broder's ranch, which was in the direction of, but not on, the direct road leading from Tulare to Visalia. One Ward was speaking of going to Visalia, and Moore contracted with him to take him (Moore) and Baker to the ranch in his (Ward's) buggy. On reaching a point on the road towards Visalia, where the road to the ranch diverged, Ward made some objections to going to the ranch, affecting to believe that it was further than had been represented; the outcome of which was that the parties agreed to go to Visalia direct. On the way, and after passing the forks of the road, Ward stopped at the house of a Mrs. Bentley, where, leaving Moore and Baker in the buggy, he entered, and stayed some 10 minutes. The defendant and one Ridgeway, arrested with him, were stopping at this house, which was really not on the most direct road to Visalia. All these things occurred in the night. After leaving the Bentley house, Ward turned from the Visalia road, and drove off for perhaps 150 yards, changed his course, and affected to be lost; turned back towards the Visalia road; drove a short distance, when his passengers got out of the buggy, he told them to go up to some trees, and he would "drive on to see," and would be back in a minute. He did not return, and was not again seen that night. Moore and Baker walked to the trees, about 150 yards distant, where they met two men, who commanded them to hold up their hands, turn their backs, and give up their money. The robbers had pistols, and threatened to shoot if resisted. Moore succeeded in getting a knife out, resisted the man who had him more particularly in charge, cut him, knocked him down, and seems to have been in a fair way to conquer, when his antagonist called upon his companion, who came to the rescue, struck Moore with a pistol over the head, and rendered him senseless. Two shots were fired by the would-be robbers; one by the assailant of Moore, which struck the latter, and the other by Baker's assailant. The assault occurred about 2 o'clock A. M. Moore recognized Ridgeway, whom he cut, and swore that in size and general appearance the other man resembled defendant. Ridgeway and defendant were arrested the next morning at the Bentley house, the former wounded by cuts. Their pistols were found each with a shot discharged, and that of defendant bloody and broken. The assault was made within a quarter of a mile of the Bentley house, which latter place seems to be about one mile from Visalia. Bentley and Ridgeway were seen together at Visalia as late as 9 P. M. on the night of the assault, and were usually seen together. Ward was a frequent visitor at the Bentley house. The foregoing statement contains so much of the testimony as is essential to an understanding of the legal propositions involved in the case.

It is objected here, as it was at the trial, that the declarations, acts, and knowledge of Ward were not admissible in evidence, for the reason that no proper predicate had been established by showing the existence of a conspiracy, between him (defendant) and Ridgeway. A conspiracy, like most other facts, may be proved by circumstantial evidence; indeed, it is not often that the direct facts of a common design, which is the essence of a conspiracy, can be proven otherwise than by the establishment of independent facts, bearing more or less remotely upon the main, central object, and tending to convince the mind, reasonably and logically, of the existence of the conspiracy. In the language of Greenleaf: "If it be proved that the defendants pursued by their acts the same object, often by the same means,—one performing one part, and another another part of the same, so as to complete it,—with a view to the attainment of the same object, the jury will be justified in the conclusion that they were engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object." 3 Greenl. Ev., § 93; U. S. v. Doyle, 6 Sawy. 612, 5 Fed. Rep. 680. The evidence to which the defendant's counsel objects under this head was almost exclusively directed to the establishment of the fact of a conspiracy by the inferential or circumstantial method, and beyond such result had no tendency to convict the defendant. The details of the agreement with Ward, and their travels towards Visalia, were well enough to an understanding of the surroundings of the main facts, and as showing the minor facts which led up to and illustrated the former, and thus constituted a part of the res gestæ. They were not, however, acts which would or could militate against the defendant, except to show the probability of an understanding between him and Ridgeway, on the one hand, and Ward, on the other, that the latter should afford an opportunity, and the former should embrace it by attempting to rob Moore and Baker. These acts did not prove, or attempt to prove, the attempted robbery. That was proven by other and direct evidence as to the fact, and identity of Ridgeway, and by circumstances tending to show defendant as one of the perpetrators. The acts complained of tended to establish the conspiracy, and were therefore admissible.

There was no error in the withdrawal from the jury of the instruction given inadvertently to the effect that they must find the defendant guilty of an assault with an intent to commit murder, or acquit him. Under the information, the defendant could be found guilty of an assault to commit murder, an assault with a deadly weapon, or acquitted. The court had already, and in other parts of his charge, instructed the jury fully as to the necessity of being convinced of the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt; had explained to them the meaning of a reasonable doubt; and had covered everything involved in the instruction withdrawn, except as to the various forms of verdict which they were authorized, under the information, to render. We need not stop to discuss the propriety of the instruction given by the court below upon the question of an assault to commit murder, for the reason that, if conceded to be erroneous, (which we do not decide,) the defendant, who was convicted of the lesser offense of an assault with a deadly weapon, could not have been injured thereby.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. March 23, 1888.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—DESCRIPTION OF LEGATEE.

The residuary clause of a will was as follows: "I devise the remainder of my estate to the Old Ladies' Home, at present near Rincon Hill, at St. Mary's Hospital." It was shown that a corporation named the "Sisters of Mercy" conducted an establishment generally known as "St. Mary's Hospital," of which one department was called the "Old Ladies' Home," and that there was no other Old Ladies' Home in the vicinity of Rincon Hill. Held, that testatrix meant to make such corporation her residuary legatee, and that the bequest was valid. TEMPLE, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

W. S. Goodfellow, for appellants. John M. Burnett and James Gartlan, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. The will of the testator contained the following residuary clause: "I give and devise the remainder of my estate, after the above legacies have been paid, to the Old Ladies' Home, at present near Rincon Hill, at St. Mary's Hospital." The evidence, against the introduction of which there was no objection, shows that the establishment conducted by the corporation respondent was generally known as "St. Mary's Hospital," and that one department thereof is called the "Old Ladies' Home," and is devoted to the care and protection of old ladies. The Old Ladies' Home was originally in the same building with the hospital, but was recently removed into another building, erected by the corporation on the same lot, about 50 feet from the hospital. The expenses of the Old Ladies' Home have always been paid by the corporation, and it is under its control. There is no other Old Ladies' Home in the vicinity of Rincon Hill. The name of the corporation is the "Sisters of Mercy." It is claimed by the appellant that there is no legatee competent to take, and, no trust having been created, the bequest to the Old Ladies' Home fails.

Our Code provides that "the misnomer of a corporation in any written instrument does not invalidate the instrument, if it can be reasonably ascertained from it what corporation is intended." So long as the testator sufficiently indicates the institution intended, the bequest is good; and if from the will itself, or evidence abunde, the object of the testator's bounty can be ascertained, a misnomer of a legatee or devisee, whether a natural person or a corporation, will not invalidate the provision. Lefevre v. Lefevre, 59 N. Y. 434. It was held in a case quite similar to this that a charitable gift to a hospital should be sustained notwithstanding the misnomer of the corporation, and that it would take and hold the gift on the trust named by the donor. Lanning v. Sisters of St. Francis, 35 N. J. Eq. 392. The court found "that the testatrix meant and intended by her said will, and especially by the twelfth article thereof, to make said corporation, called the 'Sisters of Mercy,' her residuary legatee, intending thereby especially to benefit the department thereof which provides for the care, protection, and comfort of old ladies; and the testatrix knew that the only conduit of her charity was the corporation called the 'Sisters of Mercy.'" We think these findings of the court are justified by the evidence. Judgment affirmed.

FRICK v. SINON. (No. 9,868.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1888.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RUNNING OF THE STATUTE—TENANTS IN COMMON.

Plaintiff's predecessor was in actual, exclusive, adverse possession, under color of title, of certain land the fee of which was in three persons as tenants in common. Before such adverse possession ripened into absolute title under the statute of limitations, one of the co-tenants brought suit in ejectment for the land against plaintiff's predecessor, the complaint alleging that said co-tenant was sole owner thereof. While the action was pending, said co-tenant, for a valuable consideration, executed to the defendant therein a deed of the whole of the premises in dispute, and dismissed the action. Held, that the reception of this deed did not make the grantee therein a tenant in common with the two co-tenants of the grantor; and plaintiff's predecessor, having held actual, exclusive, adverse possession of said land for five years after the reception of said deed, acquired a complete title thereto, under the California act of limitations of 1863.¹

2. SAME—OFFER OF COMPROMISE—ESTOPPEL.

An offer to buy out a hostile claim, after one has acquired title by adverse possession, will not estop the party making such offer from asserting his title so acquired.

3. SAME—ADVERSE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

In an action to quiet title, where plaintiff claims under one who acquired title by adverse possession, it is not error to admit evidence of the payment of street assessments and insurance premiums on the property. Although not admissible to prove the fact of possession, such evidence tends to show that the actual possessor claimed the whole title.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action to quiet title, brought by Fredericke Frick against William Sinon. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Wm. Pierson, for appellant. J. Foulds, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. An action to quiet title, commenced October 29, 1883. The court below adjudged, in effect, that the plaintiff had acquired the legal title to the land described in the complaint by an adverse possession continued for the statutory period. Appellant contends, it appears from the evidence, that the plaintiff and defendant were at the commencement of the suit, and at the trial, tenants in common of the premises. There was evidence that the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff had the actual, exclusive, and adverse possession, under color of title, of the whole of the land in controversy, from the year 1862 up to the 17th day of April, 1868, at least. Such possession, however, unless it continued to April 21, 1868,—five years from the approval of the act of limitations of 1863,—did not bar the right of possession of defendant's grantors. On the 17th day of April, 1868, W. H. Campbell, J. B. Crockett, and Gwyn Page were the owners in fee-simple, as tenants in common, of the land the title whereof is here in dispute. On that day Campbell commenced an action of ejectment against the predecessor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the possession of the land, averring in his complaint that he was the sole owner thereof. The defendant in the ejectment, by answer, denied the title of the plaintiff therein. While the ejectment was pending, and on the 6th day of March, 1869, Campbell, for a valuable consideration, executed and delivered to the defendant therein a deed "of the whole of the premises" described in the complaint therein and herein. The action of ejectment was thereupon dismissed.

It is contended by appellant that the reception of the deed by plaintiff's predecessor made him a tenant in common with defendant's grantors, Crockett and Page. Had Campbell been in the sole possession of the premises, and had he delivered the possession of the whole to the plaintiff's predecessor, the entry by the predecessor would have been in the assertion of an exclusive right in severalty, and equivalent to an express declaration on the part of the grantee that he entered, "claiming the whole to himself." It would have been such a disseizin as would have set the statute of limitations in motion in his favor. Bath v. Valdez, 11 Pac. Rep. 727. The grantee in the deed was in the adverse possession of the whole of the land prior to the execution and delivery of the deed. Crockett and Page could not say, nor can their successors say, that they had no knowledge of the deed, and, in the same breath, that the deed made the grantee a tenant in common with them. Taking notice of the deed, the subsequent possession of plaintiff's predecessor was, to their knowledge, referable to the deed, and was a possession with a claim of the whole title. The continued possession under the deed was as much a disseizin as would have been an entry under it. The mere commencement of the action of ejectment by Campbell, subsequently dismissed, did not deprive the plaintiff's predecessor of the benefit of his adverse possession begun in 1862, and which was continued for a period of five years,—a period completed before the deed was executed by Campbell. Even if the taking of the deed was any evidence tending to prove that the possession, begun in 1862, was not previously adverse, yet the taking of the deed, and possession under it, was a denial of any right in Crockett and Page from the date of its delivery and acceptance. It follows that plaintiff's predecessor did not become a tenant in common with Crockett and Page by receiving the deed from Campbell.

There is ample evidence that plaintiff's predecessor was in the actual, exclusive, and adverse possession of the land in controversy, claiming title to the whole thereof under the deed aforesaid, for five years next succeeding the 6th day of March, 1869. The defendant testified that, say, in November, 1876, (more than seven years after the execution and delivery of the Campbell deed,) he suggested to plaintiff's predecessor that they together should buy "the outstanding one-fifth" of the property; to which the latter responded he could not afford it,—had no money. Also that, shortly before the commencement of this action, (more than 14 years after the Campbell deed,) the agents of the plaintiff asked defendant what he would take for his interest in the property; that he replied "$600;" and that the agents thereupon declared they would not give him $60 for it. It was for the court below to determine the credibility of the witness. An offer to buy out a hostile claim in 1876 or 1883 could not invalidate the title of plaintiff or her predecessor. Furlong v. Cooney, 14 Pac. Rep. 12. Here is no question of estoppel. Having acquired the title by adverse possession, plaintiff, while she remained in possession, could be divested of such title only by conveyance in writing. And even if it should be conceded that the declaration was made by plaintiff's predecessor in 1876, as testified to, and that it constituted some evidence tending to show that, during the five years of possession immediately following the Campbell deed, the occupant had not intended to hold adversely, it was but evidence, and very slight evidence; and the court below was justified in holding it did not overcome the effect of the clearly established, open, notorious, and exclusive possession of the land under the deed purporting to grant the entire title.

Nothing was decided in Carpentier v. Mendenhall, 28 Cal. 484, which is in conflict with the views above expressed. There, the adverse possession of the defendants commenced in 1858. A special verdict found that the defendants "became tenants in common" with the plaintiff in 1860. The supreme court said that, when the defendants became tenants in common with the plaintiff, their possession lost its hostile character. In Miller v. Myers, 46 Cal. 535, the appellant did not complain of the judgment letting the plaintiff into the possession as tenant in common, but for a judgment for mesne profits, claiming there was no ouster of the plaintiff prior to the commencement of the action.

The court below did not err in admitting evidence of the payment by plaintiff and her predecessor of street assessments and insurance premiums. Although, perhaps, not admissible as evidence of the fact of possession, they tended in some degree to show that the claim of the actual possessor was to the whole title. Judgment and order affirmed.

BATCHELDER v. BRICKELL et al. (No. 11,185.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1888.)

MORTGAGES—DECREE OF FORECLOSURE—MODIFIED DECREE—EFFECT.

A decree of foreclosure was defective only in providing for a personal judgment against one of the defendants. A modified decree, prepared and entered as of the date of the original decree, as directed by an order of the supreme court, was in the language of the original decree except that the word "defendants" was changed to "defendant," and the name of the defendant, wrongfully included in the personal judgment, was omitted from the clause providing for such judgment. Held, that the original decree, or a sale made thereunder, was not vacated or set aside by the modified decree, the manifest intention of the court being to correct the error, and not to constitute a new decree.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Quint & Newman and Fox & Kellogg, for appellant. E. J. & J. H. Moore and A. N. Drown, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action of ejectment, and the only question is whether defendants succeeded in showing title under certain foreclosure proceedings in which Brickell, the principal defendant here, the others being his tenants, was plaintiff, and this plaintiff and her husband were defendants. In that case a decree was duly entered and a sale of the mortgaged premises had, at which Brickell, the plaintiff in that action, became the purchaser. After the sale the case was appealed to this court by the defendants in that suit, but no stay-bond was given, and, pending that appeal, the sheriff's deed was executed and Brickell entered into possession under it. The decision on the appeal in the foreclosure case is reported in 62 Cal. 623. The conclusion of the court is as follows: "It follows from the above that the court below erred in rendering a personal judgment against Mrs. Batchelder on the note of June 1, 1874, and the interest on it, and the decree will be modified in that regard. In other respects the judgment is correct, and is affirmed. Counsel for respondent will prepare a decree, modified in accordance with the views herein expressed, and present it, on notice, to the chief justice of this court." There was no personal judgment against Mrs. Batchelder, and, so far as we can ascertain, no such point was made on the appeal. The decree, however, contained the usual provision for docketing judgment for any deficiency, and did direct such judgment to be docketed against Mrs. Batchelder. Of course it is this provision which is referred to as a personal judgment against Mrs. Batchelder, and the intent that the decree shall stand except as to that provision is quite plain. The direction to respondent's counsel to prepare a decree modified in accordance with the views expressed, meant simply to write out the decree as modified, more plainly to indicate to the court below the modification intended. Under the circumstances it cannot be justly claimed that it was intended to vacate the decree or set it aside. A contrary intent is expressly stated: "The decree will be modified in that regard. In other respects the judgment is correct, and is affirmed." It was not directed that the modified decree should be submitted to the court for approval, and apparently it was not. This supports the idea that it was not intended to constitute a new decree. The chief justice approved the form of the decree as modified, and it was transmitted to the lower court and there entered, and no steps whatever were ever taken by any one to have the decree as there entered corrected and made to conform to the judgment of this court, if, in fact, it was not in conformity with the judgment here. That decree, entered as modified, after briefly reciting the conclusion of this court, states: "Now, therefore, in accordance with said judgment and order of the supreme court, on motion of E. J. & J. H. Moore, counsel for plaintiff, and on due notice thereof to counsel for defendants, it is ordered and adjudged the decree of the former district court of the Twenty-Third judicial district of this state, of date November 25, 1878, be modified as of that date so to read and stand modified in the words and figures following, which the court below is ordered to enter as of the date of the judgment above mentioned, to-wit." Then follows the original decree in totidem verbis, except that the word "defendants" is changed to "defendant," and the name of Mrs. Batchelder is omitted from the clause providing for docketing judgment for the deficiency. We think the decree was not vacated or set aside or the sale rendered void by the judgment of this court. The record does not seem to justify the point that the San Francisco property was sold for more than the decree ordered.

Judgment and order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial affirmed.

CUMMINGS v. CUMMINGS et al. (No. 11,881.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1888.)

1. DIVORCE—DECREE FOR ALIMONY AND ACCOUNTING—CONFORMITY WITH PLEADINGS. The plaintiff, in an action for divorce and an accounting, alleged in her complaint that a conveyance, purporting to be a deed, was made with the intent to defraud plaintiff and was without any consideration whatever; but the court, upon the trial, found that the conveyance was a mortgage, based upon a valuable consideration.

Held, that a decree under this complaint ordering a division of the mortgaged property in payment of plaintiff's claim for alimony is inconsistent with the case made out and should be reversed.

2. SAME—PARTITION OF LANDS—MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION.

A decree in an action for divorce cannot order a partition of the common real estate of the parties thereto, where a mortgagee is in the lawful possession of the property under a mortgage covering the whole of the land.

3. SAME—NECESSARY PARTIES.

In an action for divorce, wherein plaintiff asked for an accounting, a nonsuit was granted to one of the defendants, whom the decree showed held a mortgage on the property of the defendant husband, and was a necessary party to the accounting. Held that, although the decree might be valid as to the other defendant, yet it should be reversed, and the discharged defendant made a party to the suit, in order to settle the rights of third persons.

4. SAME—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

A mortgagee, in the lawful possession of mortgaged lands, and authorized to receive the rents and profits of the same to apply on his mortgage, cannot, in the absence of evidence showing he has committed waste or abused his position, be succeeded by a receiver, who is given the power to subordinate the claims of the mortgagee to claims of the divorced wife of the mortgagor, for alimony, etc.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; McCANN, Judge.

Action for divorce and an accounting by Mary R. Cummings against William N. Cummings, Morgan L. Ketchum, James L. Simpson, and the Bank of Watsonville. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Morgan L. Ketchum appeals.

A. P. Kittredge, for appellant. Goldsby & Jettie, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. The appeal is by the defendant Morgan L. Ketchum from portions of the judgment, and no point is made by respondent that the judgment of the superior court is not final and appealable. It is not necessary to decide whether the court below did or did not err in overruling the demurrer to the complaint of the defendants Ketchum and the Bank of Watsonville. If it be conceded the demurrer was properly overruled, the portions of the judgment appealed from must still be reversed. And even if, upon the complaint, a judgment decreeing an accounting and for a redemption from the mortgages of the defendants Ketchum and the bank would, under any circumstances, have been justified, the portions of the judgment from which an appeal has been taken must be reversed. The superior court decreed a dissolution of the marriage between plaintiff and the defendant William N. Cummings; that plaintiff was entitled to the custody of the infant daughter, sole issue of the marriage; and that defendant Cummings pay to the plaintiff $50 a month as alimony, and a sum as suit money. And further decreed that the property described in the complaint was at the commencement of the suit charged with the mortgage in the judgment afterwards referred to; that the said property or tract of land be divided equally, share and share alike, etc., between the plaintiff and the defendant Cummings, and, in case they cannot agree upon a partition, Bart Burke, Esq., be appointed a commissioner to make and report such a partition, etc.; that the share set apart to the defendant Cummings be charged with the payment of costs, alimony, and counsel fees awarded to the plaintiff, and the same be a lien thereon; that the instrument of the 18th of May, 1876, purporting to be a deed from defendant Cummings to defendant Ketchum is, and was intended to be, a mortgage to secure the payment of $1,500 and interest, and not a deed conveying the land, otherwise than as security, and that the instrument was and is a valid and binding mortgage, free from fraud; that the property is subject to and bound for the payment for the unpaid portion of the mortgages of the Bank of Watsonville and Ketchum; that Ketchum is entitled to a lien on the land for the sum of $1,500 and interest thereon from 10th day of June, 1874, to the 10th day of February, 1876, at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month, and with legal interest thereon from the last date to the entry of decree, "less whatever sums of money he may have received as rent or otherwise from the premises held by him under the said instrument, herein declared to be a mortgage, over and above what he has expended thereon for taxes, repairs, and in payment of the principal or interest on the Bank of Watsonville mortgage;" that, for the purpose of ascertaining, etc., Bart Burke is appointed a referee to ascertain and report the amount of reductions, if any, to be made, "and to make and state said account between said Ketchum and his said receipts from said property," etc.; that, as between said plaintiff and defendants Cummings and Ketchum, and those claiming under them, the part or half of the premises awarded to plaintiff be chargeable with the payment of "one-half of the Ketchum and Bank of Watsonville mortgages;" that Bart Burke, Esq., be appointed a receiver to receive the rents, profits, and issues of the land, until further order, to be paid out by him under direction of the court—First, for taxes; second, for repairs; third, for the support of plaintiff and her child; fourth, for costs and counsel fees; fifth, for interest due and accruing on the Bank of Watsonville mortgage. The judgment recites that the plaintiff, having introduced her evidence in chief, a nonsuit was granted as to the defendant the Bank of Watsonville. The dismissal, or nonsuit, in favor of the bank, of itself, might, perhaps, only show that the bank had no interest in or lien upon the property. But the final judgment declares that the property described is subject to and bound by the unpaid portion of the mortgage of the Bank of Watsonville, and that the defendant Ketchum is entitled to a lien for the amount of his mortgage, less what he may have received as rents, etc., over and above what he has expended for taxes, repairs, and in the payment of principal or interest "on the Bank of Watsonville mortgage." Further, that the referee ascertain what Ketchum has paid for principal or interest of the bank mortgage. And the receiver is directed to pay out the rents by him received, the alimony, and the costs and counsel fees awarded, before paying interest on the mortgage of the bank.

It is apparent that the bank is a necessary party to the accounting. Its mortgage is recognized as valid in the judgment, and no decree could properly be entered determining what sums had been paid to it by the defendant Ketchum, or giving priority to the alimony or suit money, in the absence of the bank. The mortgage of the bank would seem to be a mortgage executed by defendant Ketchum; and, in view of the nonsuit and the recognition of the mortgage in the decree, it cannot be presumed that it was taken with notice that the instrument from the defendant Cummings to Ketchum was other than it purports to be,—a deed absolute. Even, therefore, if the decree, as between the plaintiff and appellant Ketchum could have been upheld if the bank had not been a party defendant, it should be reversed with directions to the court below to cause the bank to be brought in and reinstated as a defendant, as being a necessary party without whose presence the rights of the other parties could not be finally determined. The portion of the decree which provides for a commissioner to make partition of the land described would, in any event, be reversed. In an action for divorce the court may, in certain instances, "divide" the common real estate. Civil Code, § 146. But this does not authorize an actual partition of the land in every instance. Here the land was in the rightful possession of Ketchum, who had a valid lien extending to every portion of it, and there should have been no decree for a partition until the lien was satisfied or redeemed. Aside from the fact that such entry and partition would be an unlawful interference with the occupation of a mortgagee in the rightful possession, the rights of the respective spouses in the property may depend upon and be affected by the fact that the one or the other shall redeem the mortgages. Nor, in any view of the case, could that part of the decree which provides that the one-half of the property awarded to the plaintiff shall be chargeable with the payment of only one-half of the Ketchum mortgage, be permitted to stand. The defendant Ketchum having a valid mortgage upon all the land, the court was not justified in attempting to limit or change the liability created by it, or in altering in any way his rights or the obligations of the community under his contract. And so of that part of the decree relating to a receiver. Ketchum, a mortgagee in good faith, and in possession, was authorized to remain in possession with the equitable right of protecting his security by paying the taxes and keeping the property in repair, and of applying the excess of the rents and profits to the payment, first, of the interest, and then of the principal of his mortgage. Yet, without any averment or finding that he had committed waste or abused his position, the court appointed a receiver to collect and receive the rents and profits, and to pay them out, giving priority to alimony and counsel fees over the claim of the mortgagee. But the portions of the decree above specified must be reversed for another reason: They are not based upon any pleading in the cause. The complaint, filed April 28, 1888, avers that the defendants Cummings and Ketchum combined and confederated together for the purpose and with the intent of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff out of her rights and interests in a certain described tract of land,—part of the community property of herself and defendant Cummings; and that, to carry out such fraudulent design, on the 18th of May, 1876, the defendant Cummings executed and delivered to the defendant Ketchum, and the latter received, an instrument purporting to be a deed of conveyance of the property described, the consideration therein recited being $8,000; that, in truth and in fact, no consideration whatever was paid therefor, the sole purpose of the parties to the instrument being to cheat and defraud the plaintiff as aforesaid, and to cover up and conceal the title of the community in said land. The answer of the defendant, Ketchum, denies the allegations of the complaint. The court found that, in the execution and acceptance of the deed of the 18th of May, 1876, there was no design or plan on the part of William N. Cummings and Morgan L. Ketchum, or either of them, to impair or defeat or affect in any way the rights of the plaintiff. But the court also found that the deed, although absolute in form, was executed by said Cummings and received by said Ketchum as security for a debt of $1,500, which sum, and the interest thereon, remains unpaid; and, as conclusion of law, that there was no fraud in the deed from Cummings to Ketchum, but that the same was a mortgage and a valid lien for $1,500, and interest. The complaint herein is not framed as a bill to redeem the Ketchum and Bank of Watsonville mortgages, or either of them, and it contains no averments on which can be founded a decree for redemption. Nor are there allegations that defendant Ketchum is a mortgagee in possession on which could be based a decree that he account for the rents and profits. This, independent of the mere fact that the plaintiff does not offer to redeem. No supplemental complaint was filed or offered containing allegations such as would justify the decree entered as against the defendant Ketchum. On the contrary, the complaint expressly denies that Ketchum has any interest in the premises, averring that the deed purporting to convey the legal title was void, made in fraud of the plaintiff's rights, and without consideration. Where a defendant has answered, the court may grant the plaintiff "any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint, and embraced within the issue." Code Civil Proc. § 530. Here the relief which the court below attempted to grant the plaintiff, as against the appellant, was neither consistent with the case made by the complaint nor embraced within the issues made by the answer. In Gregory v. Nelson, 41 Cal. 278, it was held that if a judgment in equity decrees the existence of facts not within any issues made or tendered by the pleadings, and then pronounces the judgment of the court upon such facts, such part of the judgment "is superfluous and nugatory." In Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 474, the supreme court said: "The province of the court with respect to facts is to determine, but not to raise the issue." A judgment for the plaintiff must be limited by the facts stated in the complaint. Where the defendant has answered, the court may, under the general prayer, grant any relief consistent with the complaint, with the facts alleged in the complaint; but, under the general prayer, no relief can be granted in equity beyond that which is authorized by the facts stated in the pleadings. Carpentier v. Brenham, 50 Cal. 549. The court below would have been justified in decreeing that the property specifically described was, as between the plaintiff and defendant Cummings, at the commencement of the action, community property of the spouses, to the extent of any estate therein which had not been conveyed or transferred by the defendant Cummings. The cause is remanded, and the court below is directed to modify as above indicated the part of the judgment which decrees the property described as community property, or by otherwise expressly saving and preserving the estates in the premises, if any they have, of the defendants other than defendant Cummings, and all or any rights the said defendants, or either of them, other than Cummings, may have in or upon said premises by way of mortgage, lien, or incumbrance. The other portions of the decree appealed from are reversed, and the court below is directed to enter instead thereof a judgment in favor of the appellant.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment; although I have great doubt about plaintiff's right to make Ketchum and the bank defendants at all. The only proper parties to a divorce suit are, generally, the husband and wife. If, when such a suit has been commenced, or is about to be commenced, one of the parties, having such suit in view, colludes with a third party, with intent to cover up community property, such third party may, perhaps, be made a defendant for the purpose of keeping the property in statu quo until after the determination of the action. But I am not clear that in this case either of the other defendants was properly joined with the husband.

75 Cal. 496

MOGK v. PETERSON. (No. 12,381.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1883.)

1. INSOLVENCY—ASSIGNMENT—PROPERTY EXEMPT FROM EXECUTION.

In an action by the assignee of an insolvent to recover the value of property claimed to have been transferred to defendant in fraud of creditors, the findings stated that a certain part of the property was exempt from execution. The judgment gave plaintiff none of such part. After more than 60 days, plaintiff appealed from the judgment. Held, that under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 939, sub. 1, providing that a decision or verdict can only be reviewed as to facts, on appeals from judgments, when such appeal is taken within 60 days, the findings must be taken as true; and under Insolvent Act Cal. 1880, §§ 17, 21, prohibiting assignees of insolvents from taking property exempt from execution, the judgment is correct.

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

An objection that a petition in insolvency proceedings did not sufficiently state the necessary facts cannot be raised by the defendant in a subsequent suit, brought by the assignee of the insolvent, to recover certain property for the benefit of creditors.

3. SAME—BOND OF ASSIGNEE.

The defendant in an action by an assignee of an insolvent estate to recover certain property for the benefit of creditors, cannot raise the question as to whether the assignee's bond was filed properly within the time allowed by statute, the creditors and debtor having acquiesced in such bond.

4. SAME—ASSIGNMENT BY CLERK OF COURT.

Insolvent Act Cal. 1880, § 17, provides that "the clerk of court shall * * * assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor." The clerk in an assignment, after styling himself "party of the first part," proceeded to convey "all the property, etc., of the said party of the first part." The instrument is entitled, "In the matter of A. B., an insolvent debtor." It recites the steps in the insolvency proceedings, and that the instrument is made by the assignor as clerk of the court; also that it is in obedience to the insolvent act. Held, that it is evident, from the recitals in the instrument, that it was intended to convey the insolvent's property, and that the words "part of the first part" may be held to mean the clerk acting under the statute as assignor of the insolvent's estate.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGFORD, Judge.

Action by John C. Mogk, as assignee of William J. Coombs, an insolvent debtor, against Peter Peterson, to recover certain property for the benefit of creditors.

H. M. Albery, for plaintiff. Richard Bayne, for defendant.

HAYNE, C. Action by the assignee of an insolvent to recover the value of certain property which is claimed to have been transferred to the defendant in fraud of the rights of the creditors. The court below gave judgment for a portion only of the amount claimed, and each side appeals.

Upon the appeal of the plaintiff the question is whether the court was right in holding that part of the property transferred was exempt from execution, and therefore not a part of the property to which plaintiff was entitled as assignee. The findings state that all this portion of the property consisted of "farming implements," and that, "at the time of the transfer of said property, said Coombs was by occupation a farmer, and used all of said last described articles in his business of farming;" and that each article thereof "was, at the time the same was sold and transferred by said Coombs to said defendant, exempt from forced sale and execution." The appeal was from the judgment alone, and was not taken within 60 days from its rendition; hence the findings must be taken as conclusive. Code Civil Proc. § 939, sub. 1. Taking the above finding to be true, it is manifest that this part of the judgment was correct. For the statute provides that "such assignment shall operate to vest in the assignee all the estate of the insolvent debtor not exempt by law from execution," (section 17;) and that the assignee shall have power to take possession of "all the estate of such debtor except property exempt by law from execution," (section 21, sub. 2.) The clerk had no authority to transfer exempt property to the plaintiff, and therefore the plaintiff can claim nothing by virtue of the transfer.

Upon the appeal of the defendant several points are made:

1. It is said that the petition in insolvency does not show the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the court in which the insolvency proceeding was commenced. The particular matters in which the petition is claimed to be insufficient are, in the first place, that it merely alleges that the insolvent was "indebted" to the petitioners, etc., without stating the facts out of which such indebtedness arose, and that hence it is within the rule laid down in Re Russell, 70 Cal. 132, 11 Pac. Rep. 622; and, in the second place, that it does not show that the debtor was insolvent within the meaning of the act, because it merely alleges that he "was on the 29th day of September, 1884, insolvent, and has suffered his property to remain under attachment or legal process for more than four days, and attempted to conceal some of his property to avoid its being attached," without showing that he was insolvent at the time he suffered his property to remain attached; and, further, that the allegation as to concealment was not that he did conceal, etc., but that he attempted to conceal. Probably these matters would have been ground for a demurrer by the insolvent to the petition. As to that we express no opinion. But they certainly cannot be raised by a third party in a collateral proceeding. Even if the position that the superior court acts in such proceedings as a court of inferior and limited jurisdiction be assumed to be true of the present statutes, nevertheless it does not follow that the objections to the petition must prevail. The objections are, in effect, not that there is a total absence of essential facts, but only that the facts are not sufficiently stated. That is not an objection which a third party can raise in a collateral action. This conclusion is strengthened by the provision of the act to the effect that, "In suits prosecuted by the assignee, a certified copy of the assignment made to him shall be conclusive evidence of his authority to sue." Section 18.

2. It is said that no bond was filed by the assignee within the time allowed by the act. It appears that the bond filed on December 17, 1884, which was within the time specified, was defective, and that thereupon the court made an order allowing a new bond to be filed "as of date December 17, 1884," and that thereupon a proper bond was filed. We are inclined to think this was sufficient for all purposes. But, however this may be, the defendant cannot raise the question. As was said in Luhrs v. Kelly, 67 Cal. 291, 7 Pac. Rep. 696, "the creditors and debtor were alone interested in the amount and sufficiency of the bond, and they acquiesced in the bond given."

3. It is contended that the assignment was insufficient to pass the title to the assignee. This point is based upon the careless language of the assignment. The act requires that when the assignee is appointed and qualified, "the clerk of the court shall by an instrument under his hand and seal of the court, assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor, with all his deeds, books, and papers relating thereto," etc. Section 17. In complying with this provision the clerk executed an instrument in which he styled himself "the party of the first part," and, after reciting the insolvency proceedings, proceeds to "grant, assign, transfer, and set over unto the said party of the second part * * * all the * * * property, estate, and effects of the said party of the first part." And it is argued that this is an assignment of the property of the clerk of the court, and not of the insolvent. It is apparent from the recitals, however, that the intention was to transfer the property of the insolvent. And, if a suit had been brought to reform the instrument, it would not have been necessary to introduce any evidence to show that such was the intention. And, this being the case, we think it is not straining the language too much to hold that the assignment is an assignment of the insolvent's property. The paper is a paper in the proceeding. It is entitled: "In the Matter of Wm. J. Coombs, an insolvent debtor," and recites the various steps in the insolvency proceedings, referring to the act by its title, and further recites that the assignment is made by the assignor as clerk of the court, and "in consideration of the premises, and of the benefits of said act, and in pursuance of and in obedience to the above recited order and the said act," and "for the uses and purposes in the said act declared." In view of these recitals we think the words "party of the first part," in the beginning of the paper, may be construed to mean, "William H. Miles, clerk of the superior court, acting under the statute as assignor of the estate of the insolvent;" and that the subsequent words referring to the property of the party of the first part, may be taken to mean the property which, by virtue of the authority conferred upon him by the statute, he was authorized to transfer.

4. Finally, it is urged that the evidence is insufficient to show fraud. The court finds that, at the time of the transfer, the said Coombs was insolvent, and unable to pay his debts; and that such transfer "was made with the intent and purpose on the part of said Coombs to hinder, delay, and defraud the general creditors of the said Coombs;" and that the defendant "had reasonable cause to believe that said Coombs was at said time insolvent, and that said assignment, transfer, and conveyance was so made by said Coombs with a view to prevent the last described property from being distributed ratably among his creditors, and to defeat the object of, and to hinder, impede, and delay the operation of, and to evade the provisions of, the insolvent act of 1880." We think this a sufficient finding to avoid the transfer. Insolvent Act, § 55. The counsel, however, says that the finding is not supported by the evidence, and that "appellant's testimony shows positively that he did not have such knowledge or notice." But, as remarked by Judge BALDWIN in Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 645, "we do not understand that the credulity of a court must necessarily correspond with the vigor and positiveness with which a witness swears." And this is peculiarly true of questions of mere knowledge or intent. In the present case it is not much disputed that the intention of the assignor was in fraud of the act. The main contention seems to be that the defendant was not aware of such intention. But, if such was the assignor's intention, it is exceedingly improbable that he would have concealed it from the assignee. And the haste with which the transaction was concluded tends to cast a shade over it. Besides, the defendant admits that he knew Coombs was in want of money; and there was evidence that defendant had made declarations to the effect that some other persons had "got the best of him on the thrashing bill last year, and he didn't propose they would this year; that he had taken wheat enough." Upon the whole evidence we cannot say that the court below was not justified in its conclusions as to the facts.

The other matters do not require special notice.

We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed in all respects.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SCHWARTZ et al. v. WILSON, Auditor. (No. 11,399.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1888.)

COUNTIES—LIABILITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS—EXCESS OVER AMOUNT ALLOWED BY LAW.

Under Const. Cal. art. 11, § 18, which provides that no county shall incur indebtedness exceeding for any year the income provided for such year, without a special election, etc.; and the California county government act, § 36, which provides that the board of supervisors shall not allow, nor the auditor or treasurer pay, any such indebtedness,—a petition for a writ of mandate to enforce the payment of a claim for supplies furnished said county, which had been ordered paid by the board of supervisors, is deficient if it fails to show that the debt was ordered paid out of funds provided for such purpose for the fiscal year in which the supplies were furnished and the claim filed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

J. M. Wilcoxon and R. B. Treat, for appellants. Graves, Turner & Graves, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, Wilson, as auditor of the county of San Luis Obispo, to draw his warrant on the county treasurer in favor of Schwartz & Beebe for $195.30. A demurrer was sustained to the petition in the superior court, and appellants electing to stand upon such petition without amending, judgment dismissing the application was entered, from which judgment this appeal is taken. It appears from the verified petition filed on application for the writ that Schwartz & Beebe, as copartners, on the 20th of March, 1884, sold and delivered goods, wares, and merchandise to the value of $195.30 to the county of San Luis Obispo. That on April 20, 1884, the demand therefor, duly itemized and verified, was filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors of said county. That on the 7th day of January, 1885, the demand was by the board of supervisors allowed for the full amount thereof, and ordered paid "out of the funds of road-district No. 1." At the date of the sale and delivery of the goods, there was money unappropriated, and in excess of all outstanding indebtedness of said road-district No. 1, in the county treasury to the credit of said road-district; and this claim, together with the other liabilities before that time accrued, were not in excess of the revenue actually provided for the year 1884 for said road-district. The goods were sold and delivered to and for road-district No. 1. On or about August 19, 1884, road-district No. 1 was changed to road-district No. 7, which latter district succeeded to all the rights, funds, and liabilities of No. 1. On the 14th day of July, 1885, the claim of petitioner being unpaid, the board of supervisors entered the following order: "It appearing to this board that there is a surplus of money in road fund of road-district No. 7 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and there is no outstanding claims against road-district No. 7 for fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and that $804.75 is remaining in said fund: Now, under the power invested in us under subdivision 20, section 25, of 'An act to establish a uniform system of county and township government,' approved March 14, 1883, we hereby order that $334.85 belonging to and in said road-fund district No. 7 for fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, be, and the same is, transferred to the general road fund, and to pay the claims No. 60, Phelix Dolan, for $26.50; No. 64, Patrick Murphy, for $7; No. 71, Albert Smith, $29; No. 73, Schwartz & Beebee, $195; No. 583, T. J. Williams, $77.35. And the county auditor and county treasurer of San Luis Obispo will make the proper entries in their books, and otherwise comply with this order. By the board of supervisors of San Luis Obispo county, Cal." That on the day last aforesaid the said board of supervisors, by an order duly made and given, made and passed their order in the words and figures following, to-wit: "Whereas, this board did on the 7th of January, 1885, examine, allow, and order paid from the district No. 1 fund (road fund) the following claims, to-wit: No. 60, claim of Phelix Dolan for $26.50; No. 64, claim of Patrick Murphy, $7; No. 71, claim of Albert Smith, $29; No. 73, claim of Schwartz & Beebee, $195; No. 583, claim of T. J. Williams, $77; and whereas, it appears that at the time of said allowance of said claims that there were no funds belonging to or in district No. 1 (road) fund; but that the same was an impoverished fund and road-district: Now, the said orders, so far as they order said claims paid from district No. 1 (road) fund, are hereby revoked, and said claims are examined, allowed, and ordered paid out of the general road fund of the county, as follows: No. 60, claim of Phelix Dolan, for $26.50; No. 64, claim of Patrick Murphy, for $7; No. 71, claim of Albert Smith, for $29; No. 73, claim of Schwartz & Beebee for $195; No. 583, claim of T. J. Williams, for $77.35. By the board of supervisors, San Luis Obispo county, Cal., July 14, 1885." Duplicate lists of the claims allowed, and orders for the payment of money, were prepared as by law provided, and, duly signed, were delivered to the auditor in due time, and a demand was made upon the auditor for a warrant on the treasurer in favor of appellants, which was refused, and thereupon, and on the 9th day of November, 1885, the application for a writ was filed.

From the foregoing statement, it clearly appears that the supplies were furnished, and the claim therefor filed, April 12, 1884; that is to say, during the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1884. There was at that time sufficient money in the fund of road-district No. 1 to pay the demand. The petition shows that it was ordered paid on the 14th of July, 1885, out of the general road fund of the county which had been provided for the fiscal year 1885; or, at least, it fails to show, as it should have done, that the claim was ordered paid out of the funds provided for such purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884. In San Francisco v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641, it was said: "Each year's income and revenue must pay each year's indebtedness and liability; and no indebtedness or liability incurred in any one year shall be paid out of the income or revenue of any future year." The eighteenth section of article 11 of our constitution provides that, in cases like the present, no indebtedness or liability shall in any manner, or for any purpose, be incurred exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year. Section 36 of the county government act contains substantially the same provision as the constitution, and, after providing a method by which to estimate and determine the amount which may be allowed against each fund, then proceeds to declare, in reference to supervisors, as follows: "The board shall have no power to make allowances against any fund which, with allowances previously made, and salaries and liabilities fixed by law payable therefrom, shall exceed the auditor's estimate of revenue for the year. * * * Any allowance made contrary to the provisions of this section shall be null and void, and the auditor shall not draw his warrant therefor, nor the treasurer pay the same."

Under section 2651 of the Political Code, it was proper for the board to order petitioners' claim paid out of the general road fund, instead of out of the fund of district No. 1; or, what is the same thing, its successor, No. 7; subject, however, as therein provided, to the proviso that the appropriation should not be in excess of the estimated receipts of the current year. Were the question discussed in San Francisco v. Brickwedel a new one, we might hesitate in reaching the conclusion arrived at there; but in view of the very salutary influence it is calculated to exercise over public affairs, and in view of the fact that since 1882 all persons having dealings with these municipalities must be presumed to have done so in view of the constitutional construction given in that case, we are not inclined to overturn it. We deem it conclusive of the present case, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 11,456.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1888.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANTS—CONFIRMATION AND SURVEY—EFFECT OF PATENT.
Where the survey of a Mexican grant has been confirmed by the general land-office, a patent issued in pursuance thereto, setting out such survey, cannot be collaterally impeached on the ground that the survey does not conform to the boundaries fixed in the decree of the United States circuit court confirming the grant. PATERSON, J., dissenting.
2. SAME—WHO ARE THIRD PARTIES—ACT CONG. MARCH 3, 1851.
A party claiming title to certain California lands in opposition to a government survey and patent, such alleged title having been acquired since 1850, the time when the rights of the government attached thereto, is not a third person, within the meaning of act Cong. March 3, 1851, providing that a patent shall be conclusive between the United States and claimants only, and shall not affect the interests of third persons.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Suit by the people of the state of California against the city and county of San Francisco, to quiet the title to certain lands claimed by plaintiff. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

E. Marshall, Atty. Gen., (Phillip G. Galpin, of counsel,) for appellant. John Lord Love, City and Co. Atty., and Garbee, Thornton & Bishop, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendant, based upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint. The prayer of the plaintiff is that the title of the plaintiff to the premises in question be forever quieted against adverse claims of the defendant, etc., and for other and further relief. The complaint avers that the land in controversy is "swamp and overflowed," and also that it is "tide land," lying below the line of ordinary high tides. It cannot be both "swamp and overflowed" land, included in those ceded by the United States to the state by the act of congress extending the "Arkansas Act," and tide land, so called; but as the title relied upon by plaintiffs in argument is the title in the state, by virtue of her sovereignty, to all lands within her borders lying below the line of ordinary high tides, we shall disregard the averment with respect to the land being swamp and overflowed. This we are justified in doing, because every consideration in favor of the right of the state to the land as swamp and overflowed applies with redoubled force in favor of the state's claim to the land as tide lands.

It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant, as the successor in interest of the pueblo of San Francisco, "a Mexican citizen, claiming to have existed before said conquest," (July 7, 1846,) filed its petition before the board of land commissioners appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, "to ascertain and settle private land claims in the state of California," to procure a determination by them "of its rights to four leagues of land situated upon the peninsula where now stands the city of San Francisco;" that said tribunal, after due proof taken, duly made its decree in regard to the matters set forth in said petition; that said cause was subsequently appealed to the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California; that said cause was again transferred under a special act of congress, passed on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1864, and entitled "An act to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California," to the circuit court of the United States for the circuit of California; that said cause in said court was entitled "The City of San Francisco vs. The United States;" that such proceedings were thereafter had and taken in said cause that a decree final was ultimately rendered by said court, whereby, as between the government of the United States and the city of San Francisco, it was adjudicated and determined "that the claims of the petitioners, the city of San Francisco, to the land herein-after described, is valid, and that the same be confirmed. The land of which confirmation is made is a tract situated within the county of San Francisco, and embracing so much of the extreme upper portion of the peninsula above ordinary high-water mark (as the same existed at the date of the conquest of the country, namely, the 7th of July, 1846) on which the city of San Francisco is situated as will contain an area of four square leagues,—said tract being bounded on the north and east by the bay of San Francisco, on the west by the Pacific ocean, and on the south by a due east and west line drawn so as to include the area aforesaid; subject to the following deductions, namely: Such parcels of land as have been heretofore reserved or dedicated to public uses by the United States; and also such parcels of land as have been, by grants from lawful authority, vested in private proprietorship, and have been finally confirmed to parties claiming under said grants by the tribunals of the United States, or shall hereafter be finally confirmed to parties claiming thereunder by said tribunals, in proceedings now pending therein for that purpose; all of which said excepted parcels of land are included within the area of four square leagues above mentioned, but are excluded from the confirmation to the city. This confirmation is in trust for the benefit of the lot-holders under grants from the pueblo, town, or city of San Francisco, or other competent authority, and, as to any residue, in trust for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the city." And the complaint further alleges that the premises therein described, the title whereof the plaintiff asks to have quieted, "are without the boundaries of said pueblo, as given in said decree. The same were at the date of said conquest below high-water mark." The complaint further alleges that, "for the purpose of carrying said decree into execution," a survey was made and approved by the surveyor general of the United States for the district of California in the year 1867-68, of which notice was given as provided in the act of congress of July 1, 1864, and the same was duly advertised; that objections were made to the survey, and the commissioner of the general land-office approved the survey, but allowed an appeal to the secretary of the interior; that the secretary disapproved the survey, and ordered a new survey to be made; that a new survey and plat was made by the surveyor general for California, and transmitted to the commissioner of the general land-office, the same being certified by said surveyor general as having been made in strict accordance with the instructions of the commissioner, the said instructions having been given under direction of the secretary of the interior. And the complaint further avers: "Thereafter a patent in due form of law, based upon the said last-mentioned plat and survey, was issued under the great seal of the United States, and signed by the president thereof, which purported, by virtue of the authority of said decree, and in pursuance thereof, to grant and convey to the city of San Francisco the tract of land embraced and described in said last-mentioned plat and survey, and embracing four square leagues, and including said premises within the exterior boundaries thereof." It is also again directly alleged that the premises here in controversy are included in the plat and survey so as aforesaid made under the direction and supervision of the department of the interior; that the defendant claims some interest under the patent and otherwise in the premises adverse to plaintiff; and that the patent is a cloud on plaintiff's title. Then follows a description by metes and bounds of the tract of land (containing 150 acres more or less) of which the plaintiffs claim to be the owners.

It is contended on the part of appellants that as the surveyor general had no power to include in a survey any land, the claim to which was not confirmed by the decree of the circuit court, so neither the commissioner of the land-office nor the secretary of the interior had any power to direct or approve such a survey; that the powers of these officers are defined and limited by law, and, as the law gave them no power to include in the survey or patent land the claim to which was not confirmed to San Francisco, the patent must read as relinquishing only the right of the United States in the land included in the description in the decree. Furthermore, that the United States had no interest to relinquish in lands below ordinary high-water mark, inasmuch as the title to such lands attached to the state of California.

There was never any demarkation of the boundaries of the pueblo lands by the authorities of Mexico. The right or title of the defendant in the pueblo lands was therefore incomplete when California was ceded to the United States; but it is unimportant whether the right to the pueblo lands, such as it was, was complete or incomplete, perfect or imperfect. If a claimant under a Mexican grant, which gives a perfect title, has presented his claim to the land commissioners appointed under the act of congress of 1851, and it has been confirmed and surveyed, and patent issued, but by the survey a portion of the land included in the judicial measurement of the Mexican authorities was excluded, the claimant is estopped from asserting title to land not included in the survey made by the United States, (Cassidy v. Carr, 48 Cal. 339;) not only the claimant, but all other persons, except such as may have derived a title from the Mexican government before the grant or cession upon which the claimant secured a confirmation. In Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal. 487, it was said: "The title to the grantees to the land contained within the map (deseno) may be admitted to have been perfect, and yet no conclusion follows against the claim of the plaintiffs. If they have accepted the land described in their patent as satisfying their claim, no other persons can object that a portion of the land thus taken is without the boundaries of the grant, unless their prior rights are interfered with." Whatever may be rights of the respective parties to this action, their rights are not affected by the circumstance that the right of the pueblo to lands was or was not perfect or complete. In Moore v. Wilkinson a portion of the lands surveyed, and patented by the United States, was without the limits of the tract to which, it was claimed, the predecessors of the plaintiff had received a perfect title from Mexico.

We are to inquire what were the powers of the surveyor general and land department under the acts of congress relating to claims to land derived from Mexico, or existing under the laws of that state. We need not consider the act of June 14, 1860, as none of the proceedings for the confirmation of the pueblo title were taken, so far as appears, under that act. The fourth section of the act of July 1, 1864, provides that in certain circumstances the district court may order a case appealed from the commissioners to be transferred to the circuit court. The pueblo claim was so transferred. But, with reference to such cases, the powers of the circuit court and of the surveyor general and officers of the land department were the same as were, in other cases, the powers and duties of the district court and surveyor and other officers of the land department. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the United States had stipulated that property rights acquired under the former sovereign should be respected. The act of congress of March 3, 1851, "to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the state of California," made provision for the appointment of commissioners, to whom should be presented all claims to land derived from the Spanish or Mexican government. It further provided that when a case should be ready for hearing, etc., the commissioners should proceed promptly to examine the same, "and to decide upon the validity of said claim." The act allowed an appeal to the district court, and thence to the supreme court of the United States; each court in turn to decide upon the validity of the claim. Section 13 of the act provided: "For all claims finally confirmed by said commissioners, or by said district or supreme court, a patent shall issue to the claimant upon his presenting to the general land-office an authentic certificate of such confirmation, and a plat or survey of said lands, duly certified and approved by the surveyor general of California, whose duty it shall be to cause all private land claims which will be finally confirmed to be accurately surveyed, and furnish plats of the same," etc. The first section of the act of 1864 provides that "whenever the surveyor general shall, in compliance with the thirteenth section of 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the state of California,' approved March 3, 1851, have caused any private land claim to be surveyed, and a plat to be made thereof," he shall give notice of the same by a certain publication, and, if no objections are made to such survey within the time named in the publication, he shall approve the same, and transmit a copy of the survey to the commissioner of the general land-office at Washington for his examination and approval; but, if objections are made, he shall transmit such objections, together with affidavits or proofs, that, if the commissioner disapprove of the survey, then, when a new survey is made in accordance with the directions of the commissioner, and the commissioner shall approve of the same, he shall cause a patent to issue, etc. By the acts of 1851 and 1864, the commissioners or the district or circuit or supreme court, as the case may be, have power to determine whether a claim is valid, and such as should be confirmed. The power of locating the confirmed claim is conferred upon the surveyor general, his survey being subject to revision by the executive officers authorized to supervise and direct the surveyor's action. There is no provision for a return of the survey or plat to the commissioners, or into court; but when a survey becomes final, and a patent issued, the limits of the claim as confirmed are definitely and conclusively determined by reference to the patent, and the survey therein recited. "The government had provided a board for the determination of the validity of claims to land held under Mexican grants, and a system for the survey and location of the lands, upon the recognition and confirmation of such claim. The survey and location are to follow the decree of confirmation. The approval of the survey by the proper officers is the determination—the judgment—of the appropriate department of the government that the survey does conform to such decree. That determination or judgment is not then a subject of review by the judiciary. * * * The patent, which is the final document issued by the government, is conclusive evidence of the validity of the original grant, and of its recognition and confirmation, and of the survey, and its conformity with the confirmation, and of the relinquishment to the patentee of all interests of the United States in the land." FIELD, C. J., in Moore v. Wilkinson, supra. And in Chipley v. Farris, 45 Cal. 539, our predecessors, speaking by Mr. Justice RHODES, said: "It is contended by the plaintiffs that the survey, which is incorporated into the patent, does not accord with the decree of confirmation, and that they are entitled to rely upon the decree—which is also incorporated into the patent—for title to lands within the decree, but not within the survey. * * * The patent purports to convey the lands described within the survey; and its scope cannot be extended, nor, on the other hand, can it be limited, by showing that the decree comprised a greater or less area than the survey." But section 15 of the act of 1851 declares that the decree of the commissioners, or of the district or supreme court, or any patent to be issued under the act, shall be conclusive between the United States and claimants only, "and shall not affect the interests of third persons;" and it is insisted that plaintiffs are third persons, within the meaning of the clause quoted.

If the Mexican government had power to grant lands below the line of the ordinary tides, the state of California, upon its admission into the Union, became the owner of such tide lands only as had not been previously disposed of by Mexico. No authority has been cited in support of the statement that, by the law of Mexico, tide lands could not be included within pueblo lands; and, as the proper department of our government has determined that a survey which included such lands conformed to the decree of confirmation, that question cannot be reconsidered here. The land department has power to locate all claims confirmed. It follows that the state never had any title to the land here in controversy. Conceding that the United States, from the date of the treaty to the admission of California into the Union, held the legal title to all the tide lands, not previously granted by Mexico, in trust for the state to be created, the title of the United States was not acquired previous to the acquisition of the territory, and when it passed to the state it was taken in subordination to the future action of the United States in determining the location of the older claim and title of the pueblo.

The supreme court of this state has said: "Unless a patent is issued without authority, or is prohibited by statute, or is void upon its face, its operation against the government, and those claiming by title subsequent, cannot be questioned in any collateral suit." As against a patent, issued under the law of 1851, who are parties claiming by title subsequent?

In Leese v. Clark, 18 Cal. 574, the court, by FIELD, C. J., said: "The defendants, taking whatever interest they possess in subordination to the future action of the government * * * in determining the location of the older grant, are in no position to question these proceedings;" that is, proceedings for the location of the older grant. And the same learned judge said: "The term 'third persons' refers, not to all persons other than the United States and the claimants, but to those holding independent titles arising previous to the acquisition of the country." Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 425.

Teschmacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 11, was an action of ejectment, wherein the plaintiff relied on a patent issued upon a confirmed Mexican grant. The premises demanded were, as claimed by the defendant and assumed by the court, below the ordinary high-water mark, covered by the ordinary or neap tides, and the defendant's contention was that they were the property of the state. The court held that the land, at the date of the admission of California as a state, belonged to the state, unless it had been the subject of a previous grant by the Mexican government, which the United States, upon the acquisition of the country, were bound to protect, and which they have since recognized and confirmed. And Chief Justice FIELD, on behalf of the court, said: "Until the acquisition of the country, the land was of course under the jurisdiction, control, and disposition of the former government, and the rights acquired by the limited states were in subordination to the action of that government, so far as such action was entitled to consideration, either from the law of nations or the stipulations of the treaty of cession. In that respect, the land under the tide-waters of the bay, between low and highwater mark, stood in no different position from that of any other land over which the former government possessed the power of disposition." The court, after referring to the obligation imposed upon the government of the United States by the law of nations, and by specific provision of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, proceeds to say that the power of the government of the United States to protect by appropriate legislation, as by the act of 1851, all titles, legal or equitable, acquired previous to the cession of the territory, cannot be questioned. "The power results from the fact that it is sovereign and supreme as to all matters connected with the treaty, and the enforcement of the obligations incurred thereunder. * * * It must determine for itself what claims to property existed at that date, which it is bound to protect, and consequently the lands to which they apply, and the parties by whom they were then held. In protecting those claims, it must necessarily make them good as against others asserting interests from events subsequently transpiring; otherwise, its powers to carry out the stipulations of the treaty, and the obligations imposed by the law of nations, would be limited and dependent, and not sovereign and supreme. Subsequent claimants must therefore take in strict subordination to its action. * * * Nor can subsequent claimants have any just grounds of complaint; for whatever interest they may possess was acquired with full knowledge of the treaty, and of the obligations and powers of the new government." "By the act of March 3, 1851, the government has established a tribunal for the investigation of the validity of the titles asserted to have existed previous to the cession; required evidence to be presented respecting the same; designated law-officers to appear and litigate the matter on behalf of the United States; authorized appeals, first to the district, and then to the supreme court; and appointed surveyors to survey and measure off the land when once the title has been recognized and confirmed. * * * As the last act in the series of proceedings, a patent is to issue to the claimant." The court then holds that the patent, "as the record of the government of the existence and validity of the grant," establishes the title of the patentees from the date of the Mexican grant. If the boundaries of a grant had not been definitely fixed by the authorities of Mexico at the date of the cession of the territory within which California is comprised, the duty devolved upon the government of the United States to make the location. This, by reason of the duty to protect the grant. "The duty of the government attaching at the date of the cession, its performance could not be interfered with or defeated by any matters subsequently occurring. The patent, therefore, to the plaintiff * * * is evidence that the grantees possessed at the date of the session a vested interest in the quantity of land mentioned in the grant,—a right to so much land, to be afterwards laid off by official authority; * * * and that the government of the United States, in discharge of its duty, has, through its appropriate departments, made the appropriation, and thereby given precision to the title of the grantees, and attached it to the tract as surveyed. The 'third persons' against whose interest the action of the government and patent are not conclusive—under the fifteenth section of the act of March 3, 1851—are those whose title accrued before the duty of the government, and its rights under the treaty, attached."

In Ward v. Mulford, 32 Cal. 365, the plaintiff claimed under a decree confirming a Mexican grant, and a survey made under the act of congress of 1860, approved by a decree of the district court of the United States, which included tide lands. But in the opinion of the court (by Mr. Justice SANDERSON) Teschemacher v. Thompson is approved, and it was said that, when the state of California came into the Union with her claim to such lands as she then acquired by virtue of her sovereignty, she acquired such claim in subordination to the prior equities of grantees under the former sovereign, and was bound by such action as the federal government might take in ascertaining and settling such equities. "In this respect no distinction can be made between the lands acquired by federal grants and such as she took by virtue of her sovereignty. In respect to the latter, as well as the former, the United States succeeded to the title, and took it upon precisely the same terms upon which the Mexican government held it at the date of the cession, and so of the state."

Nothing is decided in More v. Massini, 37 Cal. 432, which is in conflict with the views above expressed. There, it was held that, by the true construction of the survey set forth in the patent, the sea-shore was the southern boundary of the land granted. The court said. "The survey mentions the sea-shore as the termination of the fourth course, and the twelfth course commences at the sea-shore; but at the intermediate stations no visible object, nor any monument, either natural or artificial, is mentioned. The call for the sea-shore as the southern boundary must be regarded as the more definite and certain, 'and will prevail over a call for a mere station,' and over the courses and distances." In that case the question was whether the demanded premises were within the survey recited in the patent, and the court held they were not. In the case at bar the complaint avers that the lands described therein are within the plat and survey finally approved, and which include the lands patented. Here, the lands in dispute are embraced by the patent, and by the lines of the survey. Therefore, as said in More v. Massini, (page 435,) Teschemacher v. Thompson, and Ward v. Mulford, supra, are decisive of this case.

Our conclusions are: (1) The land, the title of the United States wherein is granted by the patent to the city and county of San Francisco, is the land embraced in the approved survey set forth in the patent; (2) the patent is conclusive evidence of the right of defendant to all the lands embraced within the survey, except that it does not affect the interests of the "third persons" mentioned in section 15 of the act of 1851; (3) the plaintiffs are not a "third person" within the meaning of section 15 of the act. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; THORNTON, J.

PATERSON, J. I dissent. Conceding that the state is not a "third person" within the meaning of that phrase as employed in section 15 of the act of 1851, there is but one question left for determination in this case. It is a question simply of construction. It is not a question of collateral attack. The decree and patent must be read together. In fact, we know that it is the practice of the land department to make the decree a part of the patent. The case, in effect, is one simply where the plaintiff claims that the defendant's title depends upon a deed describing the property by natural boundaries, and also by metes and bounds; that the description by metes and bounds includes lands not included within the natural boundaries; that defendant claims an interest in the lands lying between the natural and the artificial lines; that plaintiff is the owner of all of the lands between the two lines, and his title thereto should be quieted, because the natural and permanent boundary lines given in the deed should prevail over the description by metes and bounds. The city could in no way be prejudiced by a determination of this question. No survey would be required to fix new lines. The work that has been done would not be undone. The location of the south line would not be disturbed. To determine the issue here, it would be necessary only to draw upon the earth a line corresponding with the metes and bounds given in the patent; and unless the plaintiff could show that some portion of the land in controversy lies between that line and existing, well-defined natural and permanent boundary lines, indicating the line of high-water mark referred to in the decree, they would, of course, fail to make out their case. It cannot be presumed, in aid of the demurrer, that the shore of the sea which bounds the land in question on three sides has been obliterated. The complaint alleges as a fact which must be taken as true, that the lands in controversy lie below ordinary high-water mark. If a patent should describe a tract of land as bounded on three sides by well-known, natural, and perpendicular walls, like those of Yosemite, or should describe it as lying in a triangle at the junction of navigable streams, like that adjacent to the confluence of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, and should also give a description by metes and bounds, the former, for the purposes at least of stating a cause of action,—a prima facie case,—would be preferred to the latter. The lands are described in the decree as being bounded on three sides by the bay of San Francisco and the Pacific ocean. The court cannot say, as a matter of law, that no portion of the land in controversy, although admitted to be below high-water mark, lies in a portion of the peninsula where the ocean or the bay is not a natural, fixed, and certain boundary line, and that therefore the metes and bounds given in the survey are in no way controlled by the natural boundaries. The admission kills the conclusion.

The questions here are not whether the state courts can review the action of the officers of the land department or whether the land department of the United States could divest the state of her title to the land in controversy, or whether the patent protects the grant of the confirmee from collateral attack. The questions are: What is the effect of the action of the land department? Has the state been divested of her title through this patent, in view of its descriptions and recitals? Which description shall prevail,—that by metes and bounds, or that by natural monuments? In determining these questions, there is no violation of the principles which forbid a collateral attack upon such instruments. There is no such attack. Surely, if the surveyor had run his lines through the bay of San Francisco and included lands of the state in the county of Alameda, which she became owner of by virtue of her relations to the paramount source of title, the state, as such owner of land across the bay, would not be bound by the survey so long as that natural monument and limit of boundary, the bay of San Francisco, remained where it is, a notice to all the world; and the decree of confirmation, which is a link in the chain of title, remained as a public muniment of title.

No case has been cited inconsistent with the rule that in cases of this kind the natural and permanent boundaries will prevail. In many of the cases cited there was no variance between the decree of confirmation and the patent. In Teschmacher v. Thompson the grant was assumed to be one of quantity only. The grant was confirmed by the court, and its boundaries as defined in the decree were followed in the patent which was issued in November, 1857; at which time the federal courts controlled the surveys, and were empowered and expected to make them conform to the decree. In none of the cases cited is the question of the power of the officer to issue a patent for land not embraced in the decree considered. More v. Massini, 37 Cal. 432, is directly in point. In that case the patent did not show upon its face that any land below high-water mark was included in the tract granted, but the fact was shown at the trial by witnesses,—surveyors; and it was there held that the clause of the decree of confirmation which confirmed the tract bounded by the sea-shore, should prevail over a description by metes and bounds. In the case of Chipley v. Farris, 45 Cal. 528, upon which respondents place their chief reliance, there were two inconsistent descriptions, but both were descriptions given by a surveyor, and it is expressly admitted by respondent in that case in his written points that if the side line of the tract in controversy were the sea-shore, a different rule would apply and that More v. Massini would be in point; the line of high-water mark in such cases being considered by the government the more certain boundary line. Of course, where both descriptions are lines established by surveyors for the decree and for the patent, the last—that one contained in the survey, and incorporated into the patent—will control. Where water-courses, mountains, or other natural objects are called for in patents, it has been said that distances must be lengthened or shortened, and courses varied, so as to conform to these objects, because mistakes in distances and courses are more probable and more frequent than mistakes as to trees, rivers, mountains, and other objects capable of being clearly and accurately fixed. McIver v. Walker, 9 Cranch, 177. In the case at bar three sides of the triangular tract described are bounded by the shores of the ocean and bay. Unless we must shut our eyes to what every resident of the peninsula can see, we know judicially that a great portion of those lines have remained for ages as they now appear; but if they have changed it is a matter of defense which should be alleged, and which may be easily proved.

ANDRADE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 12,427.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1888.)

PARTNERSHIP—SURVIVING PARTNER—JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT.

In California the probate court has jurisdiction to require a surviving partner, who does not deny that a partnership between himself and the decedent formerly existed, to file an account of the partnership affairs, and, as an incident thereto, to examine such survivor as to the sufficiency of the account filed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Ryland B. Wallace, for petitioner. John A. Wright, for administrator. E. R. Taylor, for absent heirs.

SEARLS, C. J. This is a proceeding to review the action of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco (department 9, in probate) in requiring the petitioner to testify touching certain lands and property. It appears, from the petition, that Philip A. Roach is the duly-qualified and acting administrator of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, which estate was and is being administered in said court, and under the jurisdiction thereof. That on, to-wit, July 25, 1887, said Roach, as administrator, represented to the court in probate that the petitioner was the surviving partner of the said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, in certain lands and enterprises in the republic of Mexico; that thereafter the court made an order requiring petitioner to render an account as to said matters, as such surviving partner; that in obedience to said order petitioner rendered an account as required by said order; that thereafter, and on the 18th day of November, 1887, the said court ordered this petitioner to be sworn, at the instance of the administrator, and to answer questions concerning said account, and concerning said lands and enterprises. Counsel for petitioner objected to the examination upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to so order, or to examine the petitioner as to the matters aforesaid; and the objection being overruled, and the court having proceeded to such examination, and continuing the same, petitioner sues out a writ of review. An examination of the record shows that the court proceeded upon the theory that Andrade was a surviving partner of Blythe. The petition of the administrator upon which the order for an accounting was made avers such to be the fact; the order of the court requiring him to account describes him as such; and, while his account is preceded and followed by a protest against being required to render such account, he nowhere, so far as we can see, expressly denies his status as such surviving partner. The report as rendered the court by petitioner was objected to by the administrator as affording no adequate information in respect to the matters of and concerning which petitioner was required to account; and on the 11th day of November, 1887, the matter coming on regularly for hearing, upon the objections of the administrator to the sufficiency of the account, counsel for the administrator called Andrade as a witness, claiming the right to examine him, under oath, touching the matters involved in said account. Counsel for Andrade objected to his being sworn, or compelled to testify, upon the ground that the court, while exercising probate jurisdiction thereof, had no jurisdiction to compel such oath, or the giving of such testimony. The court overruled the objection, to which ruling an exception was noted. Counsel for petitioner put certain questions to him with a view to showing, as he claimed that there had been since the death of Blythe, certain breaches of a contract or contracts by the estate, existing between Blythe and the petitioner, whereby the partnership, or trust relation, between petitioner and the estate of Blythe had ceased, and, therefore, that the estate had no further interest in the property. Objection was made to this testimony upon the ground, as nearly as we can see from the record, that, if there was a partnership at the date of Blythe's death, the right to an accounting existed, etc. Objection sustained. But little progress was made when a continuance of the examination was had, and, pending such continuance, the application was made to this court for a writ of review as in the petition stated.

"When a partnership exists between the decedent, at the time of his death, and any other person, the surviving partner has the right to continue in possession of the partnership, and to settle its business; but the interest of the decedent in the partnership must be included in the inventory, and appraised as other property. The surviving partner must settle the affairs of the partnership without delay, and account with the executor or administrator. * * * Upon the application of the executor or administrator, the court, or a judge thereof, may, whenever it appears necessary, order the surviving partner to render an account, and, in case of neglect or refusal, may, after notice, compel it by attachment, and the executor or administrator may maintain against him any action which the decedent could have maintained." Code Civil Proc. § 1585. The probate court has no authority to settle and adjust accounts between a surviving partner and the representative of a deceased one. Its power is limited to requiring the survivor to account. The right to demand and have an account includes the right to have all that the term imports, viz.: such a detailed statement of the partnership affairs as will afford information of the condition of the business,—the assets, the credits, and indebtedness of the firm as such, and the condition of the accounts as between the partners themselves. Under the authority conferred by section 1585, supra, we have no doubt but that, upon the coming in of an account by a surviving partner which is lacking in the essentials imported by the term, the court may require and enforce such other and further account as may be in the power of the survivor to furnish, and necessary to a correct understanding of the affairs of the partnership. This duty performed, and the limit of power is reached. The court cannot settle and adjust the account. If unsatisfactory, this can only be done by a court of equity. In Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447, it was said: "The probate court has no more jurisdiction to provide for a partnership account, and decree a balance, where the partnership has been dissolved by the death of a partner, than where it has been dissolved by any other cause." The assets which pass to the executor or administrator consist of the individual estate of the decedent. Partnership assets, as such, form no part of such individual estate; the residuum only, after satisfying liabilities and advances, if any, made by the survivor, becomes the property of the estate. If questions arise, in the course of settlement of partnership affairs, which cannot be adjusted without recourse to the courts, the probate court is not the forum in which such questions can be solved, but, like other questions cognizable in courts of equity, they must be determined in the last-named courts. If the existence of a partnership between a decedent and survivor is denied by the latter, the probate court cannot adjudicate the question, and decree the existence or non-existence of the relation. The status being admitted, the court may be called upon to render an account. As ancillary to the right of the court to enforce an accounting by the surviving partner, and to enable it to determine whether what purports to be an account is such in reality, or whether another and further account is requisite, the right to examine the surviving partner under oath, or any other witness or witnesses, who may possess information germane to the question, would seem proper. The court cannot be supposed to know intuitively, when such an account is presented, whether or not it is, in substance and detail, such as should be furnished under the statute. The needed information can only be acquired through the medium of testimony. Petitioner was a competent witness by whom to establish facts which the court had a right to possess before approving the account rendered. Assuming then, as we do, that the record shows the existence of a partnership between Blythe and petitioner at the time of the death of the former, we hold that the court had authority to require the latter to file his account of the partnership affairs; and, as an incident thereto, to examine witnesses, the petitioner included, for the purpose of determining the sufficiency of the account as filed.

The judgment of this court is that the proceedings of the court below be, and they are hereby, affirmed.

DAVIS v. COUNTY OF YUBA. (No. 11,880.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1888.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—BONDS—PAYMENT—INTEREST ON COUPONS.

Bonds issued in pursuance of the California act of 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 662,) authorizing "the county of Yuba to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing and repairing wagon roads and bridges in said county," are not authorized to be paid prior to the expiration of 20 years from their issue, except out of a surplus remaining after payment of interest due, in the "wagon road and bridge interest and sinking fund" provided for in the act; and an attempt by the county to pay such bonds before maturity in any other manner than out of such surplus is void as against a non-assenting holder, and such holder, having presented his coupons to the county treasurer for payment, is entitled to interest thereon from that time.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; PHIL W. KEYSER, Judge.

For statement of facts, see former opinion in same case, 13 Pac. Rep. 874. W. C. Belcher, for appellant. E. A. Forbes and A. L. Hart, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing was granted and the case resubmitted. After carefully considering the matter, we still adhere to our former opinion, except that we think the plaintiff should recover interest on his coupons from the time he presented them to the county treasurer for payment. Judgment and order reversed, and a new trial ordered.

HUGGINS et al. v. HANDY et al. (No. 11,347.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1888.)

APPEAL—PRACTICE—FAILURE TO APPEAR—REHEARING.

That a case was set for the last day of the session of the supreme court, and the court for years past had never been able to finish the calendar, and that defendants' attorney did not expect the case to be reached, is not sufficient to justify setting aside a judgment of affirmance, made because there was no appearance, or points or authorities on file, for defendant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; D. BELDEN, Judge.

This case was set for hearing at the January term, and, on being reached on the calendar, there was no appearance, and no points or authorities on file, for appellant. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Subsequently, on motion, an order was made to show cause why the order of affirmance should not be set aside, and the accompanying affidavit was filed on the hearing of the order to show cause:

"I, W. S. Goodfellow, being duly sworn, depose and say as follows: I am the attorney for the appellants in this cause. On Thursday last the judgment and order appealed from were affirmed by this court, for the reason that there was no appearance by counsel for appellants, and no points and authorities on file. My failure to appear personally, or to file points and authorities, was due to the following causes: On the day on which this cause was reached on the calendar of this court I was engaged in the actual trial of a case in the superior court of Tulare county at Visalia, and had been so engaged all of that week. Moreover, I did not expect this cause to be reached on the calendar. When the calendar of this court in bank and in departments was published last January, I noticed that there were only three causes to which I would be required to give my personal attention,—one in bank, one in department 1 early in February, and this cause, which I found to be set for the last day of the session. The other cases I knew would be heard, and I made preparation, and argued them in due course. I felt almost certain that this cause would not be reached this session. Since 1880 this court has been so much overburdened with work, and with the hearing of cases of public importance, and the returning of prerogative writs, which are specially set and do not appear on the regular calendar, that, as I believe, neither department has hitherto been able to finish its regular calendar at the San Francisco session. I am told by a deputy in the clerk's office that this is the first occasion in his experience in which the court has been able to dispose of all the cases on the San Francisco calendar. As I have said, therefore, on reading the calendar in January I concluded that this case would not be reached, and I was afterwards confirmed in that opinion when the order was made postponing all cases on the calendar two weeks. I would perhaps have noticed the progress the court was making had I not been absent in the country a considerable portion of the time. During the past five weeks I have been absent attending to cases in four different counties outside of San Francisco, namely, in Contra Costa, Tuolumne, Santa Clara, and Tulare. I was absent from San Francisco—on the trial of the case at Visalia, and afterwards for one day attending to a case in Fresno,—from Saturday, the 3d day of March, until the afternoon of Saturday last, the 10th day of March; and on my return on the last-named day I discovered for the first time from the Law Journal that this case had been reached, and disposed of in my absence. The same afternoon I tried without success to find the presiding justice of this department, intending to make application for an order to show cause why the judgment should not be set aside. If I had not been absent in Tulare county, as above stated, I certainly would have been in attendance in the supreme court on the day this cause was reached. There is now, and for more than thirteen years there has been, published in this city a daily Law Journal in which appears the calendar of the day of every court of record holding court in this city and county. I have always been accustomed to rely upon the Law Journal for information as to what cases will be called for trial each day. I keep a diary of prospective events, but its chief purpose is to note the expiration of time to plead, etc. I sometimes, though not always, note upon that diary the dates of causes set for trial. [This cause was not noted on the diary.] I depend and have always depended upon the Law Journal to ascertain what causes are set for trial each day, and to protect me from allowing them to go by default. When cases are specially set, that fact also appears in the Law Journal. The calendar of this court, as a whole, was not published, as I believe, after January 23d, but there was published each day the list of cases to be heard on that day. My invariable practice is and has been to consult the Law Journal on my first arriving at the office in the morning. As an evidence that this system is sufficiently safe I may say, as the fact is, that in my experience of nearly thirteen years I have never omitted to be present in the supreme court when any case in which I was interested was called for hearing; nor, as far as I can remember, have I ever failed to be present on the trial of any cause in any of the other courts of record in this city and county. If I had not been absent in Visalia I would have seen the calendar of this department for March 8th, which was duly published on that day, and I would, of course, have been in attendance. When I am absent I have some one to attend to my cases, of course, but for the reasons above stated I gave no directions as to this particular case. The clerk who was with me when the case was tried in the superior court, and who attended to preparing the appeal, left me nearly three years ago, and nothing has been done in connection with the case since. Although, therefore, the case appeared in the Law Journal of Thursday last, in my absence it was not recognized by any one as a case in which the office was interested.

"I further depose and say that this appeal was taken and has been prosecuted in perfect good faith in the belief that the judgment of the court below is erroneous, and not in any degree for the purposes of delay, or from other unworthy motives. The amount involved is $2,000, with several years' interest. The action is upon a written contract for the payment of money upon certain contingencies, and the only question is whether upon facts almost undisputed the contingencies have happened or not. The judgment below was in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendants are fully solvent, and have, besides, given an adequate bond conditioned to stay execution. The defendants, as I believe, fully and fairly stated to me as their counsel the facts of the case. I also heard all the evidence given in open court. After such statement, and also after such hearing, I believe, and so advised them, and, so far as I can know, they each believe, that they had a good and sufficient defense to the action and grounds of appeal on the merits. I reside in the county of Alameda, and, so far as this is an affidavit of merits, or such affidavit as required, I make it on behalf of the defendants, for the reason that I do not know where at present they can be found. The transcript in this cause is not long, nor are the questions involved specially intricate. If the judgment herein be vacated I will be prepared to argue the cause orally at a moment's notice, or I can file a brief in five days' time, or even less, if time be material. I know no reason why the judgment entered on Thursday last cannot be vacated without prejudice or injury to the rights of the respondents or either of them.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of March, 1888."

The following order was then entered by the court: "Upon reading and filing the affidavit of W. S. Goodfellow in the above-entitled cause, it is ordered that the respondent show cause before this court, department No. 2, on the 22d day of March, 1888, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of that day, why the order heretofore made affirming the judgment and order of the court below should not be vacated and set aside, and it is further ordered that a copy of said affidavit, and of this order, be served upon the attorney for the respondents five days before the said 22d day of March, 1888."

W. S. Goodfellow, for appellants. S. F. Leib, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The showing made is not sufficient to justify the setting aside of the judgment of affirmance herein, and the motion is denied. So ordered.

HEILBRON et al. v. FOWLER SWITCH CANAL CO. (No. 11,800.)

Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1888.)

1. INJUNCTION—TO RESTRAIN DIVERSION OF WATER.

Plaintiffs owned a ranch bounded for 30 miles by a river, a branch of which flows through the land, and used the water for irrigation and to supply about 10,000 cattle. The river at its lowest stages carried about 1,000 cubic feet per second, all of which flowed through the branch, and during the time of melting snows a much larger volume, sometimes as much as 15,000 feet. Held, that to divert from 300 to 1,500 cubic feet per second would produce a material injury, to prevent which an injunction will be granted.

2. SAME.

In a suit against a corporation to enjoin it from diverting water from a river by means of a canal, the fact that it had instructed its head-gate keeper that, whenever the water was low in the river, and there could be cause of complaint by any one, to shut down the gate at the head of the canal, and only take water when it would make no appreciable difference in the quantity, is no defense.

3. SAME—INTEREST TO MAINTAIN PERPETUAL INJUNCTION—LEASEHOLD.

Possession of land under a lease for years is sufficient to enable the tenants to sustain a suit for perpetual injunction to restrain the diverting of water necessary to the enjoyment of the land, the injunction necessarily ending with the estate.

4. PLEADING—AMENDMENT—PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

Originally the parties to two suits for injunction pending at the same time were precisely the same, and the latter suit differed from the former in that no judgment for damages was asked. After a plea in abatement was filed, plaintiffs, by leave of the court, amended by making new parties coplaintiffs. Held that, the parties not being the same, the plea in abatement could not be sustained.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Suit for an injunction by August Heilbron, Adolph Heilbron, and others, against the Fowler Switch Canal Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Edward J. Pringle and E. C. Winchell, for appellant. Brown & Daggett and Terry & Terry, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. The facts constituting the plaintiffs' case in this action are pretty much the same as in the case of Heilbron v. Ditch Co., 17 Pac. Rep. 65, recently decided by us. Plaintiffs are in possession of the Rancho Laguna de Tache, containing about 50,000 acres of land, under a lease for 10 years, with the privilege of purchasing during their term. Kings river forms a boundary of this farm for 30 miles, and, dividing at a point within this distance, one channel of the river, called "Cole Slough," flows through the rancho for a distance of 10 miles. Plaintiffs claim under a Mexican grant made January 10, 1846. The claimant filed his petition for the confirmation of his title with the land commissioners to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, February 15, 1853; and, the title being confirmed, a patent was issued for the same March 6, 1866. Kings river rises in the Sierra Nevada mountains, and carries at its lowest stages only about 1,000 cubic feet of water per second, and at the highest stages, during the time of melting snows in the spring and summer, a much larger volume, sometimes as much as 15,000 cubic feet per second. During ordinary stages of water Cole slough carries the larger portion of the waters of Kings river, and during the period of low water all that reaches the point of divergence. For more than two years before the bringing of this action, the plaintiffs had maintained and cultivated about 3,000 acres of alfalfa upon the land; and to irrigate the alfalfa, water their stock, and increase the productiveness of their land, they had built a dam in Cole slough, and constructed canals and ditches leading out of Cole slough, conducting the water over their land, increasing its productiveness, and furnishing water for their cattle, amounting to 10,000 head, which were entirely dependent upon the river for water to drink. The defendant is a corporation, organized to appropriate and divert the water of Kings river, and avers in its answer that it has taken all the steps required under the Civil Code to authorize it to appropriate 1,500 cubic feet per second, flowing continuously, and at great expense has constructed a canal with a capacity of from 1,000 to 1,500 cubic feet per second, sufficient for irrigating 240,000 acres of land; that the stockholders own about 60,000 acres of land along the canal and its branches. The land owned by the stockholders is a long distance from the river, none of them being riparian owners, and no portion of the water would ever find its way again into the river. It was found as a fact that the defendant threatens, and unless enjoined will, divert 300 cubic feet of water per second, and as much as 1,500 cubic feet of water per second when there is the last-named quantity flowing in the river at the head of defendant's canal, and the Rancho Laguna de Tache will be deprived of a material and substantial quantity of water; that plaintiffs will be deprived of the use of water with which to irrigate said land, their cattle of sufficient quantity to drink, and that great damage and injury will occur annually, and of such extent that the same cannot be justly computed or estimated, and an action for damages would not afford an adequate remedy. The defendant does not deny that it threatens to divert from the stream 1,000 cubic feet of water per second, but denies that it proposes to take all the water of Kings river, or a sufficient quantity to injure the lands of plaintiffs, and alleges that defendant claims the right of withdrawal of water only in proportion to the supply which may be flowing in the river, and does not intend to divert the whole amount provided in its articles of incorporation, nor 300 cubic feet as alleged in the complaint. The answer also avers that defendant was incorporated for the purpose of acquiring the title to 1,000 cubic feet of water per second, which amount they purchased from one Dusy; and that since they have taken under the Code 500 additional cubic feet per second; and that it has commenced the construction of a suitable dam and head-gate sufficient to divert the amount of water, the canal being 80 feet wide and 5 feet deep, and had so far completed the work as to be able to divert 1,500 cubic feet of water per second, "so appropriated and owned by defendant, into its canal, and to conduct the same along and through its said canal a distance of 21 miles;" and that they have expended in its construction $110,000. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The appeal from the judgment, not having been taken within one year, must be dismissed. On the trial the defendant attempted to prove its right as an appropriator by showing its compliance with the provisions of the Code. This evidence was excluded, on the objection of plaintiffs, and defendant excepted. The court also excluded, against the exception of the defendant, evidence tending to show that there was no appreciable difference in the quantity of water in Kings river at a time when defendant was taking water, and at a time when it was not taking water, from the river. In like manner the court refused to permit the defendant to show that its officers had instructed its head-gate keeper that, whenever the water was low in the river, and there could be any cause of complaint by any one, or it would make an appreciable difference in the quantity of water in the river, he was not to take water, but to shut down his gate, and only take water when it would make no appreciable difference in the quantity flowing in the river.

The first point made by appellant is that where a party suffers no appreciable injury, and is threatened with none, he cannot invoke the aid of a court of equity to restrain a trespass, but will be left to his remedy at law. Perhaps this proposition might be admitted without affecting the merits of this appeal. It does not follow because the injury is incapable of ascertainment, or of being computed in damages, and therefore only nominal damages can be recovered, that it is trifling or inconsiderable. It is doubtful if it can properly be said that there is any evidence in the case which tends to show, or if that which was offered would have tended to show, that the injury to plaintiffs was inconsiderable. That it was unascertainable, and in that sense inappreciable, may be a good reason why an injunction should issue. This question is, however, not an open one in this state, but has been repeatedly passed on and settled in unmistakable terms. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 258, 10 Pac. Rep. 674; Moore v. Water-Works Co., 68 Cal. 150, 8 Pac. Rep. 816; Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 249, 16 Pac. Rep. 900; Parke v. Kilham, 8 Cal. 77; Ferreira v. Knipe, 28 Cal. 341. No doubt there are cases in which a court will refuse to interfere by injunction to prevent a trespass, where it can see that the injury will be slight, and the injunction may work great injury. Here the defendant professes to take from plaintiffs their property, really, upon the plea that it is worth but little to the plaintiffs, and much to the defendant. It is not an ordinary trespass. It is a perpetual taking of the property of the plaintiffs,—a continuous nuisance, which, may ripen into a right unless prevented. The injury is one, also, which, in its nature, cannot be estimated. In the recent case of Heilbron v. Ditch Co. it was said: "The flow of the water of a stream, whether it overflow the banks or not, naturally irrigates and moistens the ground to a great and unknown extent, and thus stimulates vegetation, and the growth and decay of vegetation add not only to the fertility, but to the substance and quantity, of the soil." If this be so,—and it cannot be doubted,—it is obvious that in a climate like that where this land is situated, the benefit derived from a flow of water for 30 miles along its boundary, and 10 miles through it, cannot be inconsiderable; but yet the extent of benefit must ever be an unknown quantity. The defendant here states that the channel of the river above and along this land is deep, and, therefore, at times of ordinary flow, the seepage cannot be great. If so, it must be important to plaintiffs that the channel should carry a full stream, and evidently at such times the percolation would be increased.

The right claimed by the defendant is not to appropriate the surplus waters of extraordinary floods, when the flow is more destructive than useful. It claims as an appropriator a certain quantity of water, adversely to the riparian proprietor; and, if the claim be valid, it may be asserted at any stage of the water. But the rights of the riparian proprietor do not depend upon the quantity of water flowing in the stream. Nor can that flow be said to be an extraordinary flood which can be counted upon as certain to occur annually, and to continue for months. The defendant has no reservoir to retain the surplus waters of casual and unusual freshets, and its works would be of little value if its dependence were only upon such waters. And certainly it would be a poor protection to the plaintiffs to have to depend upon the keeper of the head-gate of defendant to take only a proportionate amount of water, or to take water only when it could be done without injury to plaintiffs. There was no error in excluding the offered testimony.

We see nothing in the suggestion that defendant is presumably the licensee of the United States, and that the United States, being an upper riparian proprietor, could take a reasonable quantity of water as against the lower riparian owner. A riparian owner may not authorize, as against a lower proprietor, a company to take water from the stream, to be conducted at a distance, and sold. We see no occasion to discuss the question as to whether the river is navigable or not. In either event the result would be the same. The riparian owner on a non-tidal navigable stream has all the rights of a riparian owner not inconsistent with the public easement. Brown v. Chadbourne, 31 Me. 9; Moore v. Sanborne, 2 Mich. 519; Wood, Nuis. § 485; Smith v. City of Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463; Woodruff v. Mining Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 753. Besides, Cole slough is not claimed to be a navigable stream. The right of the state to interfere with the flow there would certainly be limited to the interest of navigation.

The estate of the plaintiffs is sufficient to enable them to maintain this action. They were lessees for a term of 10 years, with the privilege of purchasing during that time. If they fail to perfect the purchase, the fact that the injunction is in form perpetual cannot injure the defendant. If the estate which the injunction was designed to protect cease to exist, there would be no one to enforce the judgment, for there would be no one in privity with the plaintiffs. Practically it would cease to exist.

The plea in abatement cannot be sustained. The same plaintiffs, excepting only the representatives of the estate of Poly, commenced a suit for a similar purpose against this defendant, but in that suit claimed damages. That suit is still pending, and in it defendant has appeared and answered. Originally the parties to the two suits were precisely the same, but, after the plea in abatement was filed, the plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended, making the representatives of Poly co-plaintiffs. Now the action differs from the former one in that the plaintiffs are not entirely the same, and no judgment for damages is asked, and the last complaint charges the actual diversion, and the threats to continue, at a date subsequent to the bringing of the first action. Considered merely as a matter of amendment, the court properly allowed it. The plea in abatement is not favored, and the fact that the parties are not the same justifies the ruling of the court below.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

A person who owns a lot having upon it a front and rear house separated by a fence cannot claim a homestead in the whole lot when she resides in one of the houses only, and has rented out the other for years.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

E. J. & J. H. Moore, (Nathaniel Bennett and Edward J. Pringle, of counsel,) for appellants. N. B. Mulville, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This cause was heard and decided by department 1, in an opinion filed November 30, 1887. 15 Pac. Rep. 763. A rehearing was subsequently granted, and the cause has been reargued before the court in bank. Counsel for appellants urge that the effect of the former judgment was to reverse a finding of the court below which was not attacked. We draw no such inference from the decision. Plaintiffs and appellants sought by their action to quiet title to a lot of land claimed as their homestead, having upon it a front and rear house, the former of which was rented to tenants, and the latter occupied by them as a family residence. The wife made a declaration of homestead upon the whole property while so occupying the rear building, and had then rented such rear building, except one room therein, reserved for storing the family furniture, and had removed temporarily from the premises and remained absent therefrom for three or four months, during which time the declaration of homestead was filed and recorded. Defendant had caused that portion of the lot covered by the front house to be sold upon an execution issued on a judgment in his favor, and held a sheriff's deed therefor. Defendant claimed title to the front portion of the lot under this sheriff's deed, but did not make any claim to the rear house and premises. The court found that the front house and premises were not the homestead of plaintiffs, and that defendant had title thereto; that the rear house and premises were the homestead of plaintiffs, etc., and quieted their title thereto. Plaintiffs appealed from so much of the judgment as decreed defendant to be the owner of and quieted his title to, the front house and premises.

As to that portion of the decree which awarded the rear house and premises to plaintiffs as their homestead, and quieted their title thereto, there was no appeal. It follows: (1) That what was said in the former opinion did not have, and could not have, any reference to the rear house and premises; and (2) that, as plaintiffs claimed the front house and premises as a homestead, all questions touching the validity of such claim were pertinent to the inquiry on this appeal. The fact that the same declaration of homestead covered the entire property, a portion of which is not in dispute, cannot preclude an inquiry into the sufficiency of that declaration, or the existence of the facts necessary to uphold it, so far as applicable to the subject of this controversy. "The homestead consists of the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated." Civil Code, § 1237. It is the principal use to which property is put, and not quantity, which furnishes the test in determining the question whether or not property is subject to dedication as a homestead. Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 182; Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220. And, if only a part of the land described in the homestead declaration be actually used and appropriated as the home of the family, the remainder not so used and appropriated forms no part of the homestead claim, in the sense of the statute. Mann v. Rogers, 35 Cal. 319. In Tiernan v. His Creditors, 62 Cal. 286, it was held that, in case of the ownership of a double house, one side of which was occupied by the insolvent as a family residence, and the other side rented to tenants, the part so rented could not be set off as a homestead to the insolvent. In Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 113, it was said: "But the mere filing of a declaration of homestead does not of itself constitute the premises embraced within it the homestead of the declarant. The use of the property is an important element to be considered. From the record in this case it appears that the premises in question were used by the Wrights primarily and principally as a hotel for the accommodation of the public. * * * But their residence there was but incidental to the business of running the hotel. * * * It would be doing violence to the statute to regard property so used as a homestead which is, and was intended to be, the place where the home is." The benign object of the statute was to protect the home of the owner from forced sale, and not to withdraw from the reach of creditors property of the debtor as a source of revenue for the support of himself or family. In view of this paramount object the justice of the distinction made, and the limitation placed upon the right of the homestead claimant, is manifest.

As to the premises in dispute, the finding of the court, which is amply supported by the evidence, is against the appellants. It is as follows: "The plaintiffs have not lived in or occupied said front house or premises for over ten years last past, but have been renting the same to tenants during that time." The findings then proceed to show that the premises in question are separated from the residence in the rear by a tight board fence, and are separate and independent from each other, etc. Premises thus separated and thus used were not subject to dedication as a homestead by the mere filing of a declaration, as provided by the statute; and, waiving all question as to a homestead right initiated by a declaration made when the parties lived upon the rear premises, but filed and recorded after they had left and temporarily rented such premises, and the conclusion is still inevitable that, as to the front lot, it did not and could not become a homestead, because not used as a home at the time of, or for many years prior to, the declaration by which it was sought to impress it with that character.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re BULLOCK'S ESTATE. (No. 12,204.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1888.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACCOUNTING—ORDER OF COURT.

An order directing an administrator to dismiss a suit brought by him on a claim alleged to be due the estate, and finding that thereupon there is no property in the hands of the administrator, and directing that he forthwith file his final account, is an attempt on the part of the court making it to state and settle the account of the administrator, and is erroneous.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Henry Thompson, for appellant. David McClure, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. By the last will and testament of deceased, his mother, Almira W. Wheeler, was made sole legatee and devisee of his estate. She was also his only heir at law. Washington Ayer, as assignee of Almira W. Wheeler moved the superior court, wherein the administration was pending, that citation issue to George A. Worn, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of deceased, commanding him to appear and show cause why an order should not be entered directing him to dismiss a certain action theretofore brought by said Worn, as administrator, etc., against the executors of E. M. Fry, deceased, and Charles S. Neal, and then pending in the superior court of San Francisco; and further requiring the said Worn, as administrator, etc., to file his final account as such. On the return-day of the citation, Worn, as administrator, showed, or attempted to show, cause. The court below made and entered an order entitled in the transcript "Order directing administrator to file account," etc., wherein the court directed that the said administrator with the will annexed, "on the coming to him of a certified copy of this order, do forthwith file in this court an account of the receipts and disbursements made by him as administrator with the will annexed of said estate since his qualification as such, and of his actions and proceedings as such administrator since said date." The order then proceeds—and it is from that portion of the order which follows that this appeal is taken: "Which said account shall stand and serve as the final account as to such administrator. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said George A. Worn, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Frank Dyer Bullock, deceased, do forthwith dismiss, abate, and discontinue, and that he do order and require to be dismissed, abated, and discontinued, that certain action hereinabove mentioned as pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, numbered 16,665, and entitled, George A. Worn, as Administrator with the Will Annexed of the Estate of F. D. Bullock, Deceased, Plaintiff vs. J. D. Fry, Executor of the Last Will and Testament of E. M. Fry, Deceased, and Charles S. Neal, Defendants, and that no further proceeding be had or taken therein by said George A. Worn, except as may be necessary to procure the dismissal, abatement, and discontinuance of said action. And it having appeared to the court that no property of any nature, kind, or description belonging to said estate has ever come to the hands of said George A. Worn, as such administrator or otherwise, and that there are not any claims in favor of said estate except the claim which is the subject and basis of the above-mentioned action, it is therefore ordered by the court that upon the settlement of the said account (for the filing of which order and direction has been hereinbefore made) the said George A. Worn shall be relieved and discharged from the duties of his trust as the administrator with the will annexed of the estate of said Frank D. Bullock, deceased, and that estate of Frank D. Bullock, deceased, be thereupon and immediately thereafter terminated, settled, ended and closed."

We express no opinion as to the validity of the orders contained in the portion of the decree appealed from. Void orders may be appealable. If the orders appealed from can be treated simply as orders commanding the dismissal of the action against the executor of the estate of Fry, deceased, and another, and directing the discharge of Worn, administrator, upon and after the settlement of an account not yet filed, they were premature, but not appealable. Code Civil Proc. § 963. But they were neither mere recitals nor orders independent of the settlement of the account which was ordered in the same decree. When the court undertook to direct the dismissal of an action brought by the administrator upon a claim alleged to be due the estate, and to find thereupon that there was no property in the hands of the administrator, it undertook both to state and settle his account to that extent. It determined his rights in that regard, and settled, or attempted to settle, his account, as effectually as if the order had been made after he had filed an account. Whether an order is appealable is to be determined by what it purports to determine; not by what may be its actual operative effect. The portion of the decree appealed from was, if operative, a settlement of an account.

From what has been said, it appears that the court below erred in entering and making it. That portion of the judgment or order appealed from is reversed.

McCORMICK et ux. v. CENTRAL R. Co. (No. 9,925.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 17, 1888.)

NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS FOR—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The evidence was conflicting as to whether plaintiff was struck by a horse attached to defendant's car, as she alleged, or by the pole of a truck near the car. Held, that a new trial will not be granted to plaintiff on the affidavits of two persons that the truck did not move, and from its position could not have struck her; such newly-discovered evidence being merely cumulative.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDON, Judge.

Action by John McCormick and Susan McCormick, his wife, for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the latter through the negligence of defendant, the Central Railroad Company. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal.

Manuel Eyre, for appellants. Gunnison & Booth, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action against a street-car company for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for defendants. The only point made is that the plaintiff's motion for new trial should have been granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The plaintiff's theory was that she was struck by the horse attached to the car, and that the car-wheel passed over her leg. The defense was that the plaintiff was struck by the pole of a truck which was near the car, and that this was the cause of the accident. Upon this question the plaintiff testified that she was struck by the horse, and that the truck did not move at all. One Offerman and one Newman testified to the same effect. On the other hand, the driver of the car testified that it was the pole of the truck which struck her, and not the horse or car; and he was corroborated by a Miss Annie Norton, a by-stander.

The evidence which is claimed to be newly discovered is shown by the affidavits of one Galbraith and one O'Brien to the effect that the truck did not move, and from its position it could not have struck the plaintiff; and the affidavit of plaintiff's husband to the effect that a certain Mrs. Stewart had told him that the witness Norton had made declarations to the contrary of her testimony, but that Mrs. Stewart would not make affidavit to that effect. As a matter of course, this hearsay evidence is not to be regarded, and the other matters stated in the affidavit are unworthy of special notice. The affidavits of Galbraith and O'Brien are upon a subject which was much disputed at the trial and are merely cumulative and not such as to render a different

NOTE.

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE. A new trial will be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence when it appears that the evidence was brought to the knowledge of defendant after the trial, and could not have been previously discovered. Greenwalt v. Tucker, 10 Fed. Rep. 884; Seeley v. Perry, (Iowa,) 3 N. W. Rep. 678; Kelleher v. Kenney, (Cal.) 4 Pac. Rep. 1095. The granting of a new trial for newly-discovered evidence is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, Eldridge v. Railway Co., (Minn.) 20 N. W. Brander*, (Minn.) 11 N. W. Rep. 94; Smith v. Smith, (Wis.) 8 N. W. Rep. 868; Regents v. Linscott, (Kan.) 1 Pac. Rep. 81.

A new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence when such evidence is merely cumulative, or is upon unimportant matters in the case, or is of an impeaching character, or where, in the opinion of the court, such evidence, if produced, would not affect the action or verdict of a jury. *Brown v. SIMMONS v. OULLAHAN. (No. 12,358.)

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION—COMPROMISE OF DEBT—TIME OF THE ESSENCE.

A creditor agreed to accept 50 cents on the dollar in satisfaction of his claim; the payment to be made in installments on stated days. Time was made of the essence of the agreement, and the whole indebtedness was to be revived on failure to pay any installment on the stated day. Held, that accord without satisfaction was no bar, and, on defendant's failure to pay on the days stated, the original indebtedness was revived.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

J. C. Campbell, for appellant. S. D. Woods and A. L. Levinsky, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action for goods sold and delivered. Defendant admitted that the goods were sold and delivered as alleged, but relied upon an agreement whereby the assignor of the plaintiff agreed to accept 50 cents on the dollar in satisfaction of the claim. This agreement contained the following clause: "That each and all of said acts shall be made and done promptly at maturity, and, as to this condition, time is hereby made of the essence of this agreement; so that, in case of default or miscarriage regarding performance and payment on the day or days said sums severally become due, the whole of said original indebtedness is hereby renewed and revived."

The first installment due under this agreement was $63.69. The court below found that only $43.45 was paid, and we think that the evidence justifies this finding. The expressions in the receipts to the effect that the sum paid was "our pro rata" of the distribution amount to nothing. A receipt is never conclusive; and in view of the contract, and the admissions of the defendant, it is apparent that the sum paid was not the amount due under the agreement. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the defendant had paid the "costs, attorney's fees, and expenses incurred," mentioned in the composition agreement. It is an elementary principle that an accord without satisfaction is not a bar; and, as a matter of course, the defendant who relies upon an accord and satisfaction must plead and prove the satisfaction as well as the accord. The other points seem frivolous. We think the appeal was taken for delay, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed, with 10 per cent. damages.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed, with 10 per cent. damages.

PEOPLE v. YEATON. (No. 20,348.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1888.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—IMPEACHMENT.

It is not permissible upon cross-examination to compel a defendant in a criminal action to testify to statements, made out of court, amounting to a confession of the crime, upon the theory of showing contradictory statements to impeach the witness, unless it is first shown that such confession was voluntary.¹

2. SAME.

The defendant in a criminal action upon cross-examination testified that a certain letter offered as a confession was written at the request of her mother, who visited her at the jail with A., and told her that she had consulted an attorney who had advised the writing of the letter. In connection with this matter defendant offered to prove, by her mother and A., that at that conference she told them she was innocent of the alleged crime. Held that, under the circumstances, this conference and the writing of the letter should be considered one transaction, and should all go to the jury.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county; AARON BELL, Judge. Jackson Hatch, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, Edward Sweeny, and Clay W. Taylor, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant, a young girl about 15 years old, was convicted of the crime of an attempt to commit arson. When the prosecution had closed its case in chief, the only evidence against the defendant was circumstantial; and it was of such a character that the jury might well have considered it insufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty. The defendant then took the stand as a witness for herself. She testified to some circumstances connected with her residence as a servant with Mrs. Ludwig, (whose house she was charged with the attempt to burn,) and denied that she had anything to do with the alleged crime, or knew anything about the origin of the fire. She was then subjected to a cross-examination, which, even in its general features, went to the utmost bounds of, if it did not exceed the limits to which, under section 1323 of the Penal Code, and People v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 602, 6 Pac. Rep. 695, the cross-examination of a defendant in a criminal case should be allowed to go. But, in addition to other things, she was compelled on the cross-examination, against the objections of her counsel, to testify to statements, made by her out of court, which were not merely admissions of facts which tended to prove her guilt, but absolute confessions of the commission of the crime. And this was done without any pretense on the part of the prosecution to show, preliminarily, that the confessions were voluntary. It is true that these confessions were admitted upon the asserted theory that they were not introduced as confessions, but merely as contradictory statements for the purpose of impeaching the defendant as a witness, and upon the apparently innocent belief that the jury would not consider them at all except for the special purpose indicated. But we think that under such a guise, the prosecution cannot be allowed to introduce confessions without the proper preliminary proof required by well-settled rules of evidence. The defendant was arrested the morning after the fire, and taken to jail. She saw no attorney, or other person capable of giving her advice. She swears that Mrs. Ludwig, and the constable, and her mother, and, in fact, every one who had access to her, told her that she would certainly be found guilty, and that the best thing she could do would be to confess, and thus try to gain the kindness and mercy of her prosecutor; and that she was also offered money and other inducements to confess. The prosecution in making out its case did not offer these confessions, presumably because it could not prove that they were made voluntarily. Therefore, at the close of the evidence in chief of the prosecution, the defendant was in this condition: She either had to forego the privilege of testifying in her own behalf, and denying the charge under oath, or, if she did testify, then, upon the theory of the prosecution, it could get in the confessions, on cross-examination, without the preliminary proof. We do not think this to be the fair meaning of the law; and we think that the admission of the confessions was a material error.

One of the confessions introduced was a letter written by defendant, when in jail, to Mrs. Ludwig. Defendant testified that this letter was written at the request, and on the advice, of her mother, who visited her at the jail with one Mr. Oxendine, and told her that she (her mother) had consulted an attorney, who had advised the writing of the letter. In connection with this matter defendant offered to prove by her own testimony, and by the testimony of her mother and said Oxendine, whom she called to the witness stand for that purpose, that at that conference she told her mother and Oxendine that she was entirely innocent of the alleged crime. This testimony was rejected, and, we think, erroneously. Under the circumstances this conference and the writing of the letter should be considered as one transaction, and should all have gone to the jury.

We are not prepared to say that the appointment of an elisor to summon the jury was erroneous, or that it was a matter that can be reviewed on this record. In such matters, however, courts should follow the statutes as closely as possible. The instructions to the jury were very voluminous; but we do not see any material error in them, except as they may be inconsistent with the views hereinbefore expressed. Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

KIMPLE v. CONWAY et al. (No. 9,700.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1888.)

DIVORCE—SALE OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY—CONFIRMATION.

In California there is no law requiring the confirmation of a sale of land made by a sheriff under a decree for the sale of the community property of a husband and wife to whom a divorce has been granted, and no such confirmation being required in the decree, the sale is complete without confirmation.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MCGUIRE, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Kate Kimple, appellant, against Margaret Conway, Patrick Conway, and Patrick Connolly, sheriff, appellees.

Aug. M. Heslep and D. L. Smoot, for appellant. W. R. Daingerfield, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an action to quiet title. Judgment was entered against the plaintiff. She moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from that order and the judgment this appeal is taken. The only question before us is whether the evidence is sufficient to justify the decision. The grounds on which the court below based its decision, as stated in the transcript, are as follows: "Defendants, Margaret and Patrick Conway, were husband and wife. A divorce was decreed between them, and their community property, including the land in controversy, was ordered to be sold by the sheriff, Mathew Nunan. The sheriff, under the decree, sold the property to the plaintiff, and, without reporting the sale to the court, executed a deed for the same to the plaintiff. After the execution of the deed, the sale was reported to the court, and the court refused to confirm it. Plaintiff claims title to the land in controversy under this deed. The sheriff, in executing the decree aforesaid, was not acting as sheriff, but as a commissioner, an agent of the court. As a commissioner his sale was incomplete until confirmed by the court. The deed made by the commissioner, without such confirmation, was void. A certificate of purchase, so called, was issued by the sheriff to the plaintiff. It conveys no title, and is of no effect as a receipt for the money paid by plaintiff on the unconfirmed purchase. Plaintiff's claim of title to the land in controversy, resting solely upon the deed and certificate aforesaid, is entirely without legal foundation." It appears that the property was sold by an order of the court, which is in the following words: "On motion of counsel for plaintiff, counsel for defendant consenting, it is further ordered and decreed that the property hereinbefore described be sold by the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, in the manner prescribed by law * * * And the said sheriff is hereby ordered and directed to sell said property forthwith, and pay the said commissioner and said attorneys the sums of money hereinbefore specified in the order named; and in case a surplus remains, after making such payment, to divide such surplus equally between plaintiff and defendant."

Section 147 of the Civil Code authorizes the court granting a divorce to order a sale of the community property, and a division or other disposition of the proceeds. Section 684 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "when the judgment requires the sale of property, the same may be enforced by a writ reciting the judgment or the material parts thereof, and directing the proper officer to execute the judgment by making the sale and applying the proceeds in conformity therewith." The power conferred is ample, and the sheriff appears to have followed the directions contained in the judgment by making the sale in conformity therewith. The judgment did not direct the sheriff to report the sale to the court for confirmation, and the Code does not require the confirmation of such sales. In the absence of such requirement we are not prepared to hold that the sale and conveyance are void because the sale was not confirmed. Some judicial sales become complete and valid on being confirmed, and not before, but the Code expressly requires confirmation in such cases. The judgment of the court in this particular was subject to revision on appeal. Civil Code, § 148. No appeal was taken, and, as the court did not exceed its jurisdiction in the premises, the purchaser who purchased at sheriff's sale cannot, without manifest injustice, be deprived of the property for which she has paid and received a deed in due form. In this case neither the Code nor the order of the court required that the sale should be confirmed before becoming complete, and we are of the opinion that the court erred in holding that the sale in this case was void for want of such confirmation, and for that error the motion for a new trial should be granted. Order denying the motion for a new trial reversed.

1. APPEAL—FAILURE TO TAKE, WITHIN STATUTORY PERIOD—JURISDICTION OF APPELLATE COURT.

The fact that an appeal was too late under the statute goes to the jurisdiction of the appellate court, and the validity of a motion to dismiss such appeal will not be considered.

2. SAME—REVIEW—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

On an appeal from an order refusing to change the record so as to show that a decree was in fact entered at a later date than appears from its face, where the affidavits of appellants' attorney and the clerk, as to the time of entering such decree, are directly in conflict, the conclusions of fact by the court below will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

S. L. Francis and E. A. Neale filed a petition for a partial distribution under the will of Catherine Fisher, deceased. The decree of the superior court was favorable to the executor, who was the husband of the testatrix. Notice of appeal was filed by the petitioners more than 60 days after the date of the decree; the statutory limit being 60 days. The petitioners claim that the minutes of the court below are erroneous, and the decree was actually entered later than such minutes show, and moved the court to change the record to that effect, which the court refused to do. The affidavits of appellants' attorney and the clerk of the superior court, as to the time of entering the decree, are directly in conflict. The petitioners appeal from the original decree, and from the refusal of the court to change the record.

Vincent Neale, for appellants. Hepburn Wilkins, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. The first appeal is from a decree of partial distribution. It was taken 62 days after the entry of the decree. This was too late. Code Civil Proc. § 1715; Estate of Burns, 54 Cal. 226; Estate of Harland, 64 Cal. 379, 1 Pac. Rep. 159; Estate of Burton, 64 Cal. 428, 1 Pac. Rep. 702. The argument as to the construction and constitutionality of the statute does not require refutation. The fact that the appeal was too late goes to the jurisdiction, and hence it is unimportant whether the motion to dismiss has lapsed or not.

The second appeal is from an order refusing to change the records so as to show that the decree above mentioned was in fact entered at a later date than it shows on its face. We shall assume, without expressing any opinion on the point, that this order is appealable. In our view, however, the affidavit of the clerk is directly in conflict with that of the attorney for the appellant; and we cannot say that the court below came to a wrong conclusion as to the facts.

We therefore advise that the appeal from the decree of partial distribution be dismissed, and that the order refusing to change the record be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal from the decree of partial distribution is dismissed, and the order refusing to change the record is affirmed.

MILLIKEN v. HOUGHTON et al. (No. 11,334.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1883.)

APPEAL—REQUISITES—NOTICE—CODE CIVIL PROC. CAL. § 940.

A judgment against several defendants was reversed, as to one of them, upon appeal of that one alone; and, on motion of such defendant and one of those not appealing, an execution theretofore issued on such judgment was quashed, and from the order quashing the execution plaintiff appealed. Held, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 940, providing that notice of appeal must be served upon the adverse party or his attorney, that, unless notice of appeal was served on all the defendants, the appellate court cannot take jurisdiction of the appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

The plaintiff, J. M. Milliken, had obtained judgment against defendants, S. O. Houghton, the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, F. H. Burke, R. P. Kelly, John Higgins, and P. Hannigan, which ordered the premises described in complaint to be sold to satisfy a street assessment. The judgment was appealed from by one defendant only, the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, and as to said defendant was reversed. This appeal is from an order, made after final judgment, granting the motion of the defendants Houghton and the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society to quash the execution of the judgment, on the ground that the reversal of the judgment on the appeal of one defendant reversed it as to all. The notice of the appeal was served only upon the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, and Houghton.

J. M. Wood, (J. C. Bates, of counsel,) for appellant. Tobin & Tobin and F. Thos. Barry, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an appeal from an order of the court below quashing a writ of execution on motion of two of the defendants, viz., S. O. Houghton and the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. Respondents the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society and S. O. Houghton moved to dismiss the appeal, upon the grounds that the other defendants in the cause, viz., F. H. Burke, R. P. Kelly, John Higgins, and P. Hannigan, were not mentioned in the notice of appeal, and were not served therewith. Turning to the decree, we find that it is against all of the defendants above named. The Hibernia Savings & Loan Society alone appealed to this court, and the judgment, as against it, was reversed. Upon the return of the case to the court below, plaintiff dismissed the action as to said last-named defendant, and thereupon procured an execution, with a copy of the decree attached, which was and is in all respects such as might have issued upon the decree as originally entered, except that it recites the appeal, reversal, and dismissal as to the defendant the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. This writ was quashed by the court, on motion of the defendants as hereinbefore mentioned, and the notice of appeal therefrom is addressed to and served upon them only.

The notice of appeal must be served upon the adverse party or his attorney. Code Civil Proc. § 940. The term "adverse party" has been held to include all the parties to the action having an interest to be affected by a reversal, and in O' Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 317, it was held that the notice of appeal by one of several co-defendants should be served, not only on the plaintiff, but also on the non-appealing co-defendants; they having an interest in the judgment to be affected by the reversal, (Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 640; Hiscock v. Phelps, 2 Lans. 118; Cotes v. Carroll, 28 How. Pr. 446; Thompson v. Ellsworth, 1 Barb. Ch. 627.) In Williams v. Mining Ass'n, 66 Cal. 194, 5 Pac. Rep. 85, it was said: "This court has not jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a judgment, unless the appellant shall have served a notice of appeal on all the adverse parties; that is to say, upon all whose rights may be affected by a reversal of the judgment," etc. The defendants not served with the notice of appeal in this case are as directly interested in the affirmance or reversal of the order appealed from as are the two defendants who were served. It may be said the objection cannot come from the moving respondents here, as they can suffer no injury by appellant's failure to notify the other defendants. The answer is, the objection goes to the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine the appeal; and the right to make the objection by any respondent before the court has been often recognized. Indeed, they are interested in having such judgment as may be rendered by this court binding upon all the parties whom after notice it can affect. It may well be that as the motion in the court below was by only two defendants, and one of them a party as to whom the action had been dismissed, it should have been denied, except as to the moving parties; or, if one only of them was interested, then only as to him. But, however this may be, the execution ran against all the defendants except the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. It was quashed as to all of them, and the appeal is from the whole order. They are therefore all interested, and should have been served as respondents in the appeal.

The appeal is dismissed.

ZEIMER v. ANTISELL. (No. 9,824.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 17, 1888.)

FACTORS AND BROKERS—REAL-ESTATE AGENTS—COMMISSIONS.

A broker authorized to sell a tract of real estate called the attention of the purchaser to the same, and received an offer from him, which was less than he was authorized to accept. After the expiration of the broker's authority, such purchaser bought said tract of real estate from the owner, paying a price greater than he had originally offered. Held, that the broker was not entitled to commissions on such sale.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

¹Respecting the rights of real estate brokers, and when their commissions are earned, see Jarvis v. Schaefer, (N. Y.) 11 N. E. Rep. 634; Robinson v. Kindley, (Kan.) 12 Pac. Rep. 587; Ratts v. Shepherd, (Kan.) 14 Pac. Rep. 496.

Action by Leo Zeimer, assignee of David Levitzky, against T. M. Antisell, to recover commissions for effecting the sale of certain real estate. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Ladd & Allen and Raphael Citron, for appellant. York & Whitworth, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. On the 28th day of June, 1883, the defendant in writing authorized David Levitzky, a real-estate broker, to offer for sale certain real property which defendant owned in the city of Oakland, and agreed, if Levitzky should find a purchaser of the property for the sum of \$125,000, to pay him a commission of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for his services. By express provision, the agreement, and Levitzky's authority under it, were to terminate at the end of 30 days from its date. Within the 30 days allowed, Levitzky found and introduced to the defendant one Hooker, who offered to purchase the property for the sum of \$110,000, and defendant thereupon agreed to accept his offer, and to sell to him for the sum named. Subsequently, about the 15th or 20th of July, Hooker refused to take the property, and thereafter, on the 31st day of that month, defendant and Levitzky entered into another agreement in writing, to the effect that if Hooker should take the property, and pay therefor the sum of \$110,000, the defendant would pay Levitzky, as and for his commission, the sum of \$1,000, and a style 7 upright piano; but, if Hooker should not take the property, then the defendant should be in no way liable to Levitzky for his services. At the time of entering into this last agreement, defendant refused to extend Levitzky's authority under the former agreement, and expressly took the property out of his hands and forbade him thereafter to offer it for sale to any person. Hooker refused absolutely to purchase or take the property, and on August 10, 1883, defendant contracted to sell it to one B. H. Levy for \$110,000, and on the 2d day of October following consummated the sale to him for that sum. Levitzky claimed that he was entitled to a commission of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the \$110,000, for which the property was sold to Levy, and on 13th day of October, 1883, he assigned his claim to the plaintiff, who thereupon commenced this action to recover the same. The court below found the facts to be substantially as above stated, and gave judgment for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying him a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

To entitle a broker to recover commissions for effecting a sale of real property, he must show that he was employed by or on behalf of the owner to make the sale, and that his authority, or some note or memorandum thereof, was in writing, subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his authorized agent. Civil Code, § 1624; McCarthy v. Loupe, 62 Cal. 299. And, before a broker can be said to have earned his commission, it must also be shown that he produced a purchaser, who was ready and willing to make the purchase on terms satisfactory to his employer, and that he was the efficient agent or procuring cause of the sale. McGarock v. Woodlief, 20 How. 221; Wylie v. Bank, 61 N. Y. 415. "The duty assumed by the broker is to bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale, and the price and terms on which it is to be made, and until this is done his right to commissions does not accrue." Sibbald v. Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 382. It must further appear that the broker performed the duty assumed by him within the time limited in his contract, or within such extension of time as may have been granted by his employer. If he failed to do that, he is not entitled to the commission, even though he made efforts to sell the property, and first called to it the attention of the party who subsequently made the purchase, unless the delay was caused by the negligence, fault, or fraud of the owner. Fultz v. Wimer, 34 Kan. 576, 9 Pac. Rep. 316; Wilson v. Sturgis, 71 Cal. 226, 16 Pac. Rep. 772.

In the light of the foregoing well-settled rules of law, was the plaintiff entitled to recover? We think not. There was no proof that Levitzky, while acting as defendant's agent, was the "efficient agent or procuring cause" of the sale to Levy. He did not bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale; nor, so far as appears, accomplish anything which even foreshadowed the sale that was subsequently made. It is true that, before the arrangement was made with Hooker, he took Levy to see the property, and received from him an offer for it of $90,000, but he rejected the offer at once, without even informing defendant that it had been made. Nothing more was done by him to effect a sale of the property to Levy until after his contract had expired and his authority had ceased. What, if anything, he did after that it is not necessary to consider, for it cannot constitute a cause of action for the plaintiff here.

In our opinion, the findings were justified by the evidence, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

MARSHALL v. BEYSSEY et al. (No. 11,797.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1888.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

In ejectment it appeared that defendant and her grantor, by themselves, their lessees and agents, had been in possession of the land in controversy from 1876 to 1884, and had paid all the taxes thereon; and that defendant's grantor claimed under a deed from one B., whose title did not appear. Held, that under the statute of limitations, which requires possession under color of title for five years, such possession is sufficient.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. GOTTSCHALK, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Marshall against Catherine Beysser and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reddick & Solinsky, (Eugene N. Deuprey, of counsel,) for appellant. J. A. Louttit, (S. D. Woods and A. L. Levinsky, of counsel,) for respondents.

HAYNE, C. Action of ejectment. The plaintiff relies upon a patent from the state of California, issued March 12, 1870. He never had any possession of the land until he forcibly dispossessed the defendants, on March 23, 1884. The defendants rely upon the statute of limitations. Special issues were submitted to the jury, which answered all the questions in favor of the defendants. The court adopted the findings of the jury, and made certain additional findings of its own, and ordered judgment thereon in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The point mainly relied on is that the evidence is insufficient to show a five-years possession of the kind required by the statute. We think there is ample evidence to sustain the findings. It appears that in 1873 one T. N. Beatty, the nature of whose title does not clearly appear, conveyed the land in controversy to one John Urquilux, who was one of three partners commonly known as the "Bascos," probably from their nationality. The Bascos were in possession under this deed. According to the witness Carnduff: "Along in 1870, '71, '72, '73, the Bascos had somewhere near one thousand head of cattle. * * * The Bascos had possession in 1874. They had cattle then." It is not necessary, however, to trace the possession so far back. Five years prior to March 23, 1884, will be sufficient. And there is sufficient testimony of this. The witness Leon Chapin testifies that he went to the ranch in January, 1877, and worked there until February or April, 1880; that he had charge of the ranch for the Bascos; that in 1876 the land was rented to one Walker, who kept possession until 1878, and had sheep pastured on the land, and was then "out for ten months;" that witness had charge of the ranch during this ten months, being paid by the Bascos, and living on the premises; that in 1879-80 the land was rented to Walker and Willis. Walker testifies as follows: "I rented the whole Basco ranch, commencing in 1877 and succeeding through the year 1878. * * * I used all the Basco ranch for grazing purposes for sheep. The sheep were in charge of a herder. No other sheep or cattle were allowed to pasture on the land. * * * I leased the Basco ranch and land in controversy in March or April, 1879, the lease to commence September 15, 1879. Mr. Willis was in partnership with me. * * * Chapin was living on the Basco ranch as keeper in that house on section 19, defendant's extension 1, during the intervening space between 1878 and 1879. We held possession of the Basco ranch for three years. * * * We didn't have the land all of 1879; rented it in April, the lease to commence in September, 1879. We had it during 1880, '81, '82. Mr. Willis had it in 1883. Willis, I know, used part of the Basco ranch for grazing." These tenants sublet portions of the land to tenants who cultivated portions of it, and pastured other portions, paying their rents to the original tenants, who in turn paid to the Bascos. Willis testifies as follows: "We leased the entire Basco ranch from Beysser (who was then the agent) from September, 1879. I mean Mr. George W. Walker and myself. We were partners. In 1879, we occupied the 1,280 acres, and sublet this 640 acres to Piper. Our sheep were in charge of a herder. Piper farmed part of the land along Rock creek. He sublet the balance to Shields for grazing sheep. Shields had them in charge of a herder. In 1880, we rented to Piper again, and he sublet to Shields. I saw Shields' sheep pasturing on the land. Piper cultivated a part of the creek. In 1881, we sublet to Piper again. He farmed a part of the creek, and sublet to Shields. In 1882, we kept the land in controversy ourselves; used it for grazing sheep. Had a herder, and didn't allow other cattle or sheep to feed on the land. In 1883, I had the land in controversy, and sublet to Piper. He farmed part, and sublet to Shields. He farmed along the creek." On July 16, 1883, John Urquilux, who held the title as aforesaid, conveyed the premises in controversy to the defendant Catherine Beysser; and she entered under the deed. Her husband testifies as follows: "The deed was made in July, 1883, but it was subject to a lease which ended only on the 25th day of November, and it is then that we got possession of the land. We at once drove our cattle on it, between sixty and seventy head. We used the land for pasturage until the 23d of March, 1884. We had a herder to drive the cattle in charge on the land and watch them." This was corroborated by the testimony of Mrs. Beysser, and the herder, Fairbanks. Part of the land was fit for cultivation, and part for pasturage only.

¹Color of title is not every pretense or claim of title, but consists in a writing or conveyance of some kind purporting to convey the land under which the claim of title is asserted. Armijo v. Armijo, (N. M.) 13 Pac. Rep. 92. Any instrument purporting upon its face to convey title to the grantee is sufficient to constitute color of title. Swift v. Mulkey, (Or.) 12 Pac. Rep. 76, and note; Webber v. Clarke, (Cal.) 15 Pac. Rep. 431; Hill v. Weir, 33 Fed. Rep. 100; Weineg v. Holcomb, (Iowa,) 34 N. W. Rep. 787; Hickman v. Link, (Mo.) 7 S. W. Rep. 12.

There is no evidence substantially conflicting with the foregoing. And there is nothing to show that during all this time there was any attempt at adverse possession by any one else, until the forcible dispossession by plaintiff in March, 1884. The defendant and her predecessors paid all the taxes. We think the evidence shows a case of possession under color of title within the rule of Webber v. Clarke, 15 Pac. Rep. 431.

It is claimed that there was error in the admission of evidence. We are inclined to think that the declarations of Mrs. Beysser, while in possession, were admissible as part of the res gestæ upon the question of the openness and notoriety of the possession. See, generally, Draper v. Douglass, 23 Cal. 348. But, however this may be, we think that the answers were so vague that no injury could have resulted.

We see no error in the instructions, and therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BURNS. (No. 20,382.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1888.)

1. ELECTIONS AND VOTERS—OFFENSES AGAINST ELECTION LAWS—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment against an election inspector, under Pen. Code Cal. § 41, prescribing certain punishments for willful neglect or refusal of election officials to perform duties incumbent on them in their official capacity, and for knowingly and fraudulently acting in contravention of existing election laws, alleged that the prosecutor, a duly-qualified elector, on offering to vote at defendant's polling station, was challenged as having voted before; that he then and there demanded the defendant to administer to him the oath prescribed by Pol. Code Cal. § 1234; and that defendant, well knowing the law relating to elections, and his duties as inspector, knowingly, willfully, fraudulently, and feloniously refused to administer the oath. Held, that the indictment related clearly and fully facts constituting the offense, and informed defendant of the charge he had to meet, as required by Pen. Code Cal. § 959, and that it need not aver that the prosecutor was registered as required by St. Cal. 1877-78, p. 303, § 15, providing that "no person shall vote at any election except he be legally registered upon the precinct register of the precinct in which he is a qualified voter."

2. SAME—VIOLATION OF ELECTION LAWS—REFUSAL TO ADMINISTER OATH.

On the prosecution of an election inspector for violation of Pen. Code Cal. § 41, prescribing certain punishments for willfully neglecting or refusing to perform duties required of him in his official capacity, and for knowingly and fraudulently acting in contravention of existing election laws, in that he refused, when demanded, to put the oath to a bona fide elector, as provided by Pol. Code Cal. § 1234, on the latter being challenged as to previous voting, the court properly charged that "defendant is presumed, as inspector, to know at his peril what the law was, and it would furnish him no excuse that he may have supposed that the law was different from what it was. But, in order that you may find him guilty, it must appear that he acted knowingly and fraudulently."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

The defendant, Burns, was convicted on indictment for neglect of duty in his official capacity as an election inspector. The indictment conformed with the provisions of Pen. Code Cal. § 959, subsecs. 6, 7, requiring that the offense be clearly and distinctly set out in ordinary and concise language, such as a person of common understanding would know what was intended, and that the offense be stated with such a degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment, upon conviction, according to the rights of the case. Defendant appeals.

Robert Ferral and Gabriel W. McEnerney, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

THORNTON, J. The defendant was convicted of a violation of section 41 of the Penal Code. That section is as follows: "Every person charged with the performance of any duty, under the provision of any law of this state relating to elections, who willfully neglects or refuses to perform it, or who, in his official capacity, knowingly and fraudulently acts in contravention or violation of any of the provisions of such laws, is, unless a different punishment for such acts or omissions is prescribed by this Code, punishable by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or by both." The defendant did not demur to the indictment, but makes the objection here that the facts stated in it do not constitute a public offense. The indictment set forth that on the 12th day of April, 1887, at the city and county of San Francisco, at a special election called by the board of election commissioners for the purpose of voting for or against the new charter proposed by the board of freeholders elected, etc., that defendant was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting inspector of election of the First precinct of the Twenty-Ninth assembly district, in the said city and county, and while defendant was acting as such inspector at the said election, for the district and precinct aforesaid, one Charles Myron Emerson, "a duly-qualified elector of the said city and county, offered to vote at the polling place of said precinct;" that said Emerson was thereupon challenged that he had before voted that day; that Emerson then and there demanded that defendant administer to him the oath prescribed by section 1234 of the Political Code, (reciting the oath;) and that defendant, well knowing the provisions of the laws of the state of California relating to elections, and the duties with which he was charged thereunder as inspector aforesaid, knowingly, willfully, fraudulently, and feloniously refused to administer to said Emerson the oath aforesaid. It is prescribed by the act of the legislature in regard to the registration of voters in the city and county of San Francisco, (see St. 1877-78, p. 303, § 15,) which provides, inter alia, for the registration of electors on precinct registers, "that no person shall vote at any election except he be legally registered upon the precinct register of the precinct in which he is a qualified voter."

It is contended that, to constitute a person a duly-qualified elector of the city and county of San Francisco, he must be registered on the register of the precinct where he offers to vote, and that the allegation that Emerson was a duly-qualified elector of the city and county of San Francisco, without making it appear by averment that he was registered on the precinct register, is insufficient; and that, as the indictment is wanting in this latter averment, it does not state facts constituting a public offense. The offense to which the indictment is directed is the refusal of the defendant, in his official capacity as inspector, to administer the oath to Emerson when he was challenged on the ground stated in it. These facts constitute the offense, and they are clearly and fully stated in the indictment. The averment objected to as insufficient is matter merely introductory to the offense charged,—matter of inducement. Such matter need not be stated with the same minuteness as the main charge. State v. Mayberry, 48 Me. 218. The allegation as made in the indictment necessarily includes the fact that Emerson's name was on the precinct register. The general form of averment adopted in the indictment includes the particular fact that the voter's name was on the register of the precinct where he offered to vote. Therefore, when it is averred that Emerson was a duly-qualified elector of the city and county of San Francisco, all the facts, by an implication as strong as an express allegation, are averred which are necessary to make him a qualified elector. We are of opinion that the indictment apprised the defendant of what he had to meet on the trial, and that it complies with the requirements of section 959 of the Penal Code, which sets forth in detail the requisites of a sufficient indictment, and is sufficient.

At the request of the prosecution, the court instructed the jury as follows: "Defendant is presumed by law, as inspector, to know at his peril what the law was, and it would furnish no excuse to him that he may have supposed that the law was different from what it was. But, in order that you may find him guilty, it must appear that he acted knowingly and fraudulently." Defendant contends that by this instruction the jury was directed that they might find defendant guilty of a penal offense for an error of judgment. As a general rule, a person who has done an act which is criminal cannot defend himself by reason of his ignorance of the law. See Broom, Leg. Max. (6th Amer. and 4th London Ed.) pp. 249, 250, and 264, on maxim, "Ignorantia facti excusat," etc. Ignorance of fact excuses, but ignorance of law does not. "The law," says TINDAL, C. J., in McNaghten's Case, 10 Clark & F. 210, "is administered upon the principle that every one must be conclusively taken to know it, without proof that he does know it." The signification of the word "knowingly," when used in the Penal Code, is defined by its seventh section (fifth subdivision) as importing only a knowledge that the facts exist which bring the act or omission within its provisions. It does not require any knowledge of the unlawfulness of such act or omission. The word "knowingly," when used in any section of the Penal Code, must be construed to import only a knowledge of facts. It has no reference to a knowledge of the law. So construed, the fifth subdivision of section 7 of the Penal Code accords with the maxim referred to and the rule above stated, that ignorance of fact does, and ignorance of law does not, excuse. In accordance with the above, the defendant must be held to have known the penal law which he was charged with violating in refusing, in his official capacity, to administer the oath to Emerson, and that the court did not err in charging the jury. The remainder of the instruction is substantially in the language of the statute. Pen. Code, § 41.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed. So ordered.

WALSH v. McKEEN. (No. 11,084.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 17, 1888.)

1. PLEADING—FORM OF ACTION—AMENDMENT.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 580, providing that "the court may grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complainant, and embraced within the issue," the error in overruling a demurrer for insufficient allegations to a complaint, which, although seeking legal redress, also alleged facts sufficient to sustain a suit in equity, is cured by an amendment making the complaint seek equitable relief.

2. SAME.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 307, establishing "but one form of civil actions," and section 580, which allows the court to grant any relief consistent with the complaint, it is not error to permit the plaintiff to amend the prayer of his complaint so as to change the action from one at law to one for equitable relief.

3. SAME—AMENDMENT—WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

Applications to amend pleadings are addressed to the discretion of the court, and should be allowed at any stage of the trial when justice requires it; and where the court permits an amendment, over defendant's objection of want of notice, offering to grant a continuance if defendant were surprised, the error, if any, is waived by a failure to ask a continuance.

4. PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING—WHEN ACTION LIES.

It is not necessary that all the assets of a partnership be collected, and all claims against it filed, before an action for accounting is brought.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action by Sarah Walsh, executrix of the last will, etc., of Thomas Walsh, deceased, the respondent, against Robert McKeen, the appellant. Respondent's decedent and the appellant had been partners, and during the trial the action, originally brought for damages in a fixed sum, was so amended as to demand an accounting.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. H. A. Powell, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against him, and from an order denying a new trial. The findings cover all the issues, and are not assailed, but it is claimed that errors of law were committed by the court, for which a new trial should be granted. In the complaint it is alleged that Thomas Walsh, the plaintiff's testator, and the defendant entered into partnership for the purpose of constructing a sewer in the city of San José; that, while the sewer was being constructed, Walsh died, and defendant afterwards completed the work; that about the time they commenced to construct the sewer Walsh advanced $1,100 for the purpose of carrying on the work, and that the money was delivered to and used by defendant for that purpose; that defendant had received on account of the partnership business the sum of $20,505.50, and had paid out and disbursed the sum of $19,632.50, and that all the debts of the partnership had been paid; that plaintiff had demanded of defendant payment of the $1,100, and one-half the balance of the proceeds of the partnership, but defendant had not paid the same to the plaintiff as executrix, or otherwise. As originally filed, the prayer of the complaint was for judgment against defendant for the sum of $1,536.50, with interest and costs of suit. The defendant demurred to the complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that it was ambiguous and uncertain, because it did not appear therefrom but what Walsh, in his life-time, received all moneys due or coming to him, or which he was entitled to receive, from the partnership business. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant then answered, and, among other things, denied that Walsh at any time advanced the sum of $1,100, or any sum, for the purpose of commencing and carrying on the work of constructing the sewer, and further denied that all the debts of the partnership had been paid or satisfied. And he alleged that the cost and expense of constructing the sewer exceeded the contract price, and that there was not then, and never had been, any money or proceeds of the partnership in his hands or possession; and, further, that there had never been any accounting or settlement of the partnership affairs with the plaintiff. During the progress of the trial, the plaintiff was permitted, against the objections of the defendant, to amend the prayer of her complaint so as to ask for an accounting, and for such other or further relief as might be deemed equitable and proper.

1. It is claimed that the court erred in overruling the demurrer. The argument is that the action was one at law, and that such an action cannot be maintained by one partner against another, or one who had been such, until the accounts have been settled, and a final balance ascertained. Ross v. Cornell, 45 Cal. 133. Conceding this to be so, still the complaint stated all the facts necessary for an accounting, and when the prayer was amended the action ceased to be one at law. The new complaint was not demurred to, and the error, if any, was then cured.

2. It is further claimed that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to amend the prayer of her complaint. The objection interposed to the motion was that it was made without sufficient notice, and that the amendment would operate to change an action at law into a suit in equity. We see no error in the ruling. As to the first part of the objection, it is enough to say that applications to amend pleadings are addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and should be allowed at any stage of the trial when necessary for the purposes of justice. Bank v. Stover, 60 Cal. 387. The record shows that, in overruling the objection, the court stated that it would grant a continuance, if defendant was surprised by the amendment. No continuance was asked for, and defendant cannot therefore claim error on this ground. As to the alleged change in the nature of the action, an answer is found in the fact that we have in this state but one form of civil actions for the enforcement or protection of private rights, (Code Civil Proc. § 307;) and, where an answer has been filed, any relief may be granted to the plaintiff which is consistent with the facts stated in the complaint, (Code Civil Proc. § 580.) An action does not now, as formerly, fail because the plaintiff has made a mistake as to the form of his remedy. If the case which he states entitles him to any remedy, either legal or equitable, his complaint is not to be dismissed because he has prayed for a judgment to which he is not entitled. "Legal and equitable relief are administered in the same forum, and according to the same general plan. A party cannot be sent out of court merely because his facts do not entitle him to relief at law, or merely because he is not entitled to relief in equity, as the case may be. He can be sent out of court only when, upon his facts, he is entitled to no relief, either at law or in equity." Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 520; Emery v. Pease, 20 N. Y. 64; Pom. Rem. § 71. In Blood v. Fairbanks, 48 Cal. 171, the plaintiff prevailed in the court below in an action at law. The defendant appealed, and this court held that the plaintiff's remedy was in equity for an accounting. It accordingly reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause for a new trial, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint. If it was proper in that case to remand the cause with leave to amend, it certainly was not error for the court below to permit the amendment to be made which is complained of in this case.

3. The point is made that the action was prematurely brought. This is rested upon the fact that, after the action was commenced, defendant collected $228.11 of the partnership funds, and, when it was commenced, a suit for $150, extra wages, was pending against the defendant and plaintiff, but afterwards dismissed. It is not necessary that all the assets of a partnership be collected, and all claims against it be paid and satisfied, before an action for an accounting is brought. If it were, the surviving partner might never get the affairs of the partnership into a condition when such action could be maintained. On the contrary, the action is often brought to settle all the affairs of a partnership, and, when necessary, the court can provide for the collection of the assets, and the payment and protection of creditors.

We discover no error in the record, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

METROPOLITAN LOAN ASS'N v. ESCHÉ et al. (No. 9,814.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 17, 1888.)

1. BONDS—INDEMNITY—RIGHTS OF SURETIES.

In an action on the bond of a secretary of a corporation for misappropriation of funds, it appeared that, prior to the acts complained of, the secretary had been charged with misappropriation, and on an investigation by the corporation, it appearing that he had received money in small amounts, and had, within the time allowed by the regulations of the company, turned it over to the treasurer, he was exonerated. Held, that the failure of the company to inform the sureties of such facts would not release them; the court having found, as a matter of fact, that there had been no misappropriation.

2. SAME—REFORMATION FOR MISTAKE—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action on a secretary's bond which was conditioned that the secretary should faithfully perform his duties during his official term, and during any succeeding term for which he might be elected, the sureties claimed that the condition with reference to the succeeding term had been inserted by mistake of both plaintiff and defendant. It appeared that the bond was drawn by the company's attorney and given to the principal, who procured the signature of the sureties, and that the latter had signed the bond on the principal's representation, without reading it. Held that, as the principal was not acting as the agent of the company, but for himself, the sureties were not entitled to claim exemption from liability for their own carelessness in failing to read the bond.¹

3. SAME—FUTURE TERMS OF OFFICE—CONSIDERATION.

The fact that a bond given by the secretary of a company for the faithful discharge of his duties is conditioned for the discharge of such duties during any succeeding term to which he may be elected, is no evidence of want of consideration; and where his sureties, in an action on such bond, allege want of consideration, the burden of proof is on them,—the bond being presumptive evidence of consideration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

This was an action on a bond of indemnity, brought by the Metropolitan Loan Association against Otto Esche, principal, and Henry Hoesch, H. Neilsen, ¹A person capable of reading and understanding an instrument which he signs is bound in law to know the contents thereof, unless prevented by some fraudulent device, such as the fraudulent substitution of one instrument for another. Taylor v. Fleckenstein, 30 Fed. Rep. 99, and note. But in an action on a promissory note against one who was unable to read, held, that the fact that the note was misread to defendant was a good defense to the action; the evidence being such as would sustain a finding of the jury that reasonable care had been exercised by defendant. Bowers v. Thomas, (Wis.) 22 N. W. Rep. 710. So held that the fact that a person signs a note which has been read to him, without reading it himself, if able, is no excuse for the fraud practiced by the person who reads it, but omits purposely a material portion thereof. Brooks v. Matthews, (Ga.) 3 S. E. Rep. 627. See, also, Warden v. Reser, (Kan.) 16 Pac. Rep. 60. In an action on a written contract, which was read to defendant by plaintiffs' agent, and which the former disputes on the ground of fraud, where he testifies that he had no spectacles, and could not read without them unless the writing was plain, his negligence in failing to read the contract before signing it is a question for the jury. Chatham v. Jones, (Tex.) 7 S. W. Rep. 600.

and Charles Meinecke, sureties in such bond. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants Meinecke and Neilsen appealed.

Cowdery & McCutchen, for appellants. Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to recover money misappropriated by Otto Esche, while acting as secretary of the plaintiff, and is based upon a bond given to secure the faithful performance of his duties. The defendants, Charles Meinecke and Henry Neilsen, were two of the three sureties on the bond. The court below gave judgment against Esche for the full amount claimed, and against Meinecke and Neilsen for their proportions of that amount. Meinecke and Neilsen moved for a new trial, and have appealed from the judgment and order denying their motion. The facts shown by the record are as follows: The plaintiff was organized as a corporation to make loans to its members for the purpose of aiding them in acquiring and improving real estate. By its by-laws the directors were required, at their regular annual meeting, which was to be held on the first Monday of March in each year, to elect a secretary, and the secretary so elected was required to "give adequate security, in such amount as the board may direct, for the faithful performance of his duties." The duties of the secretary were to keep precise minutes of all the proceedings of the association and board of directors, and to receive all moneys paid into the association, and pay the same to the treasurer, taking his receipt therefor, on or before the monthly meeting of the directors. In March, 1875, the defendant Otto Esche was elected secretary, and a resolution was passed by the board "that the bond of the secretary, to be given as provided by the by-laws, be fixed at $7,500 in United States gold coin." Esche gave a bond in the sum required, and the defendants Meinecke and Neilsen signed it as sureties. The condition of the bond reads as follows: "The condition of the foregoing obligation is such that if the said Otto Esche shall well and truly perform all and singular the duties of secretary of said association for and during his official term, and for and during any succeeding terms for which he may hereafter be elected," etc. In April, 1875, Esche entered upon the discharge of his duties as secretary of the plaintiff, and he was annually re-elected thereafter, and continued to act as such secretary until March, 1883, but never gave a new bond. In 1878 a question arose before the board as to whether Esche had misappropriated $1,225, money which had been paid to him for the association. He admitted that he received the money, but claimed that he received it in small parcels, and, within the time allowed him to do so, deposited the parcels in bank to the credit of the treasurer. The treasurer denied that the money was placed to his credit, or ever came into his hands. Subsequently the matter was referred for consideration to a general meeting of the stockholders, and after some investigation Esche was fully exonerated by them from all liability or blame. In 1881, Esche misappropriated $4,300 of the association's money, but the fact that he had misappropriated it was not known until early in 1883. Shortly after the misappropriation was discovered, demand was made that the sureties on his bond make good the loss, and, the demand being refused, this action was commenced.

In their answer to the complaint the appellants alleged that, prior to the defalcation for which they are sought to be held liable, Esche became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,225, for money which he had received and misappropriated while acting as its secretary, and that the plaintiff, knowing these facts, released him from payment of that indebtedness, and again re-elected him its secretary; that the plaintiff failed and neglected to notify them of the misappropriation or release, and that they had no notice or information thereof until about the month of March, 1883; that, if they had had such notice, they would have withdrawn from the bond before the misappropriation of the $4,300 occurred; and that the release, and the neglect on the part of plaintiff to notify them thereof, operated to release them from any subsequently accruing liability on the bond. And they further, by way of cross-complaint, alleged that the words "and for and during any succeeding terms for which he may hereafter be elected," which are found in the bond, were inserted therein by the mistake of both plaintiff and defendants; that, when the bond was given, it was the intention of plaintiff, and all the parties thereto, that it should only bind the sureties thereon during the term of office ending in March, 1876; that, when the bond was executed, it was presented to them by Esche, and they were requested to sign it as his sureties, and they thereupon did sign it, without reading and without any knowledge of its contents, except that, before signing, Esche informed them that the plaintiff's by-laws required the secretary to give security, and that the bond was nothing more than an agreement on their part to be sureties for him for and during the ensuing year; that they first learned, on or about the 23d day of March, 1883, that the words extending their liability were in the bond, and they were informed and believed that the plaintiff, on or about the same date, first learned of that fact. They, therefore, prayed that the bond be reformed by striking out the words "and for and during any succeeding terms for which he may be hereafter elected."

1. The court below found, as to the alleged "shortage" of $1,225, that Esche did not misappropriate that sum of money, or any part thereof; and that, prior to the misappropriation of the $4,300, he was not indebted to the plaintiff in any sum of money whatever. There was testimony tending to support the finding, and it is unnecessary, therefore, to consider what would have been the effect of a different finding. Under the well-settled rule in such cases, the judgment cannot be reversed on this ground.

2. The court also found that the words in the bond which appellants asked to have stricken out, were not inserted therein by the mistake of both plaintiff and defendants; that plaintiff well knew, when it received the bond, that those words were in it, and had so known ever since; and that, when the bond was given, it was not the intention of plaintiff, or of all the parties thereto, that it should bind the sureties thereon only during the term of Esche as secretary, ending in March, 1876. There was testimony to support this finding. The bond was drawn by the attorney, and, when signed, was approved by the president of the association. It was delivered to Esche to procure sureties, and he procured the appellants to sign it. Esche testified that he said nothing about the contents of the bond to either Meinecke or Neilsen. Meinecke testified: "Esche showed me the bond, and said I promised him to sign it. I said I supposed it was in the ordinary form of bond, and that it was not necessary for me to read it. He said 'Yes;' so I signed the bond." Neilsen testified: "Esche brought the bond to me; did not have any conversation with him at the time I signed it." In procuring appellants to sign the bond, Esche was not acting as the agent of plaintiff, but for himself. Appellants would have known the contents of the paper if they had read it, as they should have done before signing, and, there being no special relation of trust or confidence between the parties, they cannot claim exemption from liability, because the bond contained a clause of which, in consequence of their own carelessness, they were ignorant at the time. Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558.

3. It is contended for the appellants that there was no consideration for their undertaking to be responsible as sureties after the expiration of the first year. The point is not tenable. The action is based upon a written instrument, and "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." "The burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it." Civil Code, §§ 1614, 1615. No want of consideration was shown here. Actions upon similar bonds have been upheld in other courts. Manufacturing Co. v. Lawrence, 1 Allen, 339; Railroad Co. v. Etwell, 8 Allen, 372; Oswald v. Mayor of Berwick, 5 H. L. Cas. 856.

The other points do not require special notice.

We find nothing in the record calling for a reversal, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

ONDERDONK v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 9,927.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1888.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ABUTTING UNITED STATES PROPERTY—LIABILITY OF CITY.

Act Cal. March 13, 1868, authorizes the board of supervisors to pay for street improvements in front of United States property in San Francisco, "provided the government * * * shall by its officers refuse to make such payment." Held, that the commanding officer of United States forces stationed on the property, the assistant treasurer, and the secretary of war are proper officers to make such refusal.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—FAILURE TO FIND ON PLEA OF—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where defendant, in a suit on a writing made within the state, pleaded in bar Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 839, which provides that actions on contracts not in writing, or on writings executed out of the state, shall be barred after three years, his defense is not made out, and failure to find upon it is not material error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MCGUIRE, Judge.

Action on contract to grade a street, by A. Onderdonk against city and county of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

George Flournoy, Jr., for appellant. Whittemore & McKee, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The appeal herein was taken from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Onderdonk, and from an order refusing to grant a new trial to the defendant, the city and county of San Francisco. The judgment was entered on the 24th day of January, 1885. The appeal was taken on the 3d day of November, 1884, which, being premature, must be dismissed, upon the authority of McLaughlin v. Doherty, 54 Cal. 519.

The action was brought upon a contract to grade Bay street, in the city and county of San Francisco, from the easterly line of Van Ness avenue to Gough street. In the statement on motion for a new trial, the appellant, viz., the city and county of San Francisco, above mentioned, assigned for error several particulars in which it claimed the evidence to have been insufficient to support the decision made and given, and wherein the court making it did so "against law."

The first point, viz., that the evidence did not show the work to have been completed within the time provided in the contract, is abandoned, and need not be noticed.

It is next contended that, under the provisions of the contract itself, the defendant was not liable. The clause of the contract under discussion is as follows: "And it is agreed and expressly understood by the parties to this agreement that in no case (except where it is otherwise provided in the acts aforementioned and referred to) will the said city and county of San Francisco be liable," etc. The contract was made under and by virtue of an "Act repealing article 4 of an act entitled 'An act to repeal the several charters of the city and county of San Francisco,' etc., approved the 19th day of April, 1856," etc. The clause of the contract supra includes no exemption on the part of the city, aforesaid, to pay for improvements made of the kind sued for here, under any law which has become such since 1856. The act authorizing the grading of Bay street, for which this action is instituted, was approved on the 1st day of April, 1878, and has been held to be a modification of and supplemental to the general street laws then in force. Jennings v. Le Roy, 63 Cal. 397. According to the terms of that act, the board of supervisors of the defendant here were empowered to have the grading done for which the contract sued on was executed. By the act to be found at page 148, Acts 1868, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco were authorized to pay for work of the kind done in pursuance of the contract sued on herein, provided the assessments therefor were made in accordance with law; and there is no specification in the statement that the assessment for the street improvement, here alleged to have been made, was not in pursuance of the law in such cases made and provided. So it would appear that the board of supervisors were authorized to have the grading done and to pay for the work, and that the defendant was liable on the contract as made, provided there be not some other bar to the action than the one just discussed. It seems that the proviso was fully met, viz., that the refusal of the government of the United States, by its officers, to pay for such street improvements as this, mentioned in the act of 1868, supra, was necessary before the city should pay for them; that such refusal to pay, upon due application, was made by the general in command of the forces of the United States in charge of the government reservation, in front of which the improvement was made; also by the assistant treasurer of the United States, who pays all moneys at San Francisco which are due from that government, on proper requisitions, and by the secretary of war, who is the head of the war department of the government, upon whose requisitions all moneys for army purposes are paid. Rev. St. U. S. 1878, §§ 214, 3673. And the reason of such refusal, as stated by the commanding general and the secretary of war, was that congress had appropriated no money to pay for such improvement. It is not perceived from what other officers of the government an authorized refusal could more properly come, or upon whom a more proper demand for payment could have been made. Further, if there was no appropriation to pay for the improvement, no demand could cause its payment. It must of necessity have been refused payment; and as soon as the fact appeared, as it does in the record, that no money could be paid, because none had been appropriated by congress, there was an end of any further need for a demand that it be paid. The refusal to pay it must have been made by any officer of the government whatsoever, unless he paid it out of his own pocket; and that was not contemplated by the law. The law seems to have been framed with a view that a demand be made on the proper officer of the government; so that, if any appropriation had been made therefor, the city could get the benefit of it, and, if there was no appropriation, the city would pay, and afterwards the government could refund the money, which seems to have been done once before, when paving and curbing was done by the city in front of government property. St. at Large, 1874-75, p. 469. The property in front of which the improvement herein was made, appears to have been declared a military reservation under orders of President Fillmore, of date November 6, 1850, December 31, 1851, and has been held to be a valid reservation for military purposes. Grisar v. McDowell, 6 Wall. 381. It was in the immediate charge of the then commander of the department of California, Gen. McDowell, and the secretary of war, who has control of all military posts, as is shown by reference to various acts of congress, and the recognized rule laid down by other departments of the government. 1 Lester, Land Law, 692; 18 St. at Large, 85; 1 Copp, Pub. Land Laws, 117-155; 21 St. at Large, 69-198.

It is urged that there should have been a new trial granted for a failure to find upon the defense of the statute of limitations, under subc. 1, § 339, Code

Civil Proc. We find nothing in this subdivision referred to germane to the action. It relates to a contract, obligation, or liability not founded on an instrument in writing, or upon an instrument in writing executed out of this state. But in this case the action is based either on a contract founded on an instrument in writing, or on an obligation or liability arising out of an assessment made in writing, both executed in this state; and, whatever it may be, it is clear that the defense is not made out. A failure to find on such defense would, then, be an immaterial error, for which the order denying a new trial should not be reversed.

We perceive no error in the findings that the action was not barred by the provisions of sections 338, 342, Code Civil Proc., nor does the appellant in its points and authorities contend to the contrary, although doing so in the assignment of errors.

The point made as to the sufficiency of the pleadings was evidently made under the supposition that the appeal from the judgment would be entertained here; but, as that cannot be, the objections to the pleadings will not be considered on the appeal from the order refusing a new trial. Shepard v. McNeil, 38 Cal. 72; Mason v. Austin, 46 Cal. 385; Jacks v. Buell, 47 Cal. 163. For these reasons, the order refusing a new trial should be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C. C.

I concur in the conclusion: HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order refusing a new trial is affirmed, and the appeal from the judgment is dismissed.

FOORMAN v. WALLACE. (No. 9,891.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1888.)

1. VENDOR AND VENDEE—PURCHASER AT EXECUTION SALE—PRIORITY OF UNRECORDED DEED—CIVIL CODE CAL. §§ 1107, 1214.

A bona fide purchaser at an execution sale acquires a good title as against a prior deed where such deed is recorded after the sheriff's certificate, but before the sheriff's deed, under Civil Code Cal. §§ 1107, 1214, giving priority to instruments first recorded.

2. SAME—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—EXECUTION SALE.

A judgment creditor who purchases land at a sale under his own judgment, and merely credits the net proceeds upon such judgment, is a purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, within the meaning of Civil Code Cal. § 1214, giving deeds executed in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, which are first recorded, priority.

3. SAME—TITLE UNDER RECORDED INSTRUMENT—WHAT IS—CIVIL CODE CAL. § 1107.

A sheriff's certificate of sale, which, by the terms of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 700, transfers to the purchaser all the right, title, and interest of the judgment debtor, subject to redemption, is an instrument whereby a title is acquired, within the meaning of Civil Code Cal. § 1107, providing that a purchaser who "acquires a title by an instrument that is first duly recorded" may contest a prior unrecorded deed.

4. SAME—CERTIFICATE OF SALE—RECORDATION—NOTICE.

Under Pol. Code Cal. § 4237, requiring the recorder to record all certificates of sale of real estate, and not providing for any acknowledgment of the same, such a certificate, filed and recorded, imparts notice to the world although unacknowledged.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

This action was brought by plaintiff, Simon Foorman, to redeem from a mortgage, and obtain possession of certain land, held by the defendant, James H. Wallace. William Treen, the owner of the land in question, conveyed the same on the 30th day of May, 1878, to one Siefert, but the deed was not put on record until the 17th day of March 1880. Siefert, on the 3d day of October, 1881, conveyed to plaintiff. The defendant, James H. Wallace, having recovered judgment against Treen, purchased the land on the 30th day of September, 1879, at an execution sale, under his own judgment, and the sheriff's certificate of such sale was recorded on the 3d day of October, 1879. No redemption was made, and upon the 3d day of April, 1880, he received the sheriff's deed, not having prior to that time any knowledge or information of any conveyance by Treen. Judgment was rendered for the defendant, sustaining his title under the sheriff's certificate and deed, and the plaintiff appeals.

R. Thompson and Frank Otis, for appellant. Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. The question involved in this appeal may be stated thus: A. brings an action against B., sues out and levies an attachment upon the land of the latter, obtains a judgment upon which an execution issues, and the land in question is sold. A., the judgment creditor, becomes the purchaser, receives a sheriff's certificate of sale, which is filed and recorded, and in due time receives a sheriff's deed of the premises. B., the judgment debtor, had conveyed the land, before suit brought, by a deed which was not recorded, and of which A. had no notice until after his receipt and record of the certificate of sale, but which was duly recorded before the sheriff's deed issued. If, upon these facts, the title of A. under his sheriff's deed is paramount to that of B. under his deed recorded after the sale and recordation of the certificate, and before the sheriff's deed was recorded, then the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed; otherwise a reversal should be had. In other words, is the interest acquired by a purchaser of real estate at a sheriff's sale, whose certificate of sale is properly recorded, destroyed by the production of a deed from the judgment debtor, executed anterior to the sale, but not recorded until after the record of the certificate of sale, and just prior to the expiration of the time for redemption? Appellant answers this question in the affirmative, and further contends that respondent, having purchased the land at a sale under his own judgment, and having merely credited the net proceeds of the sale upon such judgment, is not a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration.

It has often been held in this state that a conveyance in consideration of the cancellation of a pre-existing indebtedness is a conveyance for a valuable consideration within the meaning of section 1214, Civil Code. Gassen v. Hendrick, 16 Pac. Rep. 242; Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335; Schluter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158, 3 Pac. Rep. 659. A like doctrine prevailed under the recording act in force prior to the Code. Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 377, where it was said: "A judgment creditor, purchasing at his own sale, without notice, is a bona fide purchaser within the act." It follows from these decisions and the findings, that respondent stands in the position of an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice at the date of his purchase, in the same manner and to the same extent as an innocent third party would do who had purchased and paid his money.

The question recurs, was the sheriff's certificate of sale, issued to the respondent and recorded, good as against an unrecorded deed? Section 1107, Civil Code, provides as follows: "Every grant of an estate in real property is conclusive against the grantor, also against every one subsequently claiming under him except a purchaser or incumbrancer who in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, acquires a title or lien by an instrument that is first duly recorded." Appellant contends that a sheriff's certificate is not an instrument whereby a title or lien is acquired within the purview of section 1107, Civil Code. An instrument is a writing which contains some agreement, and is said to be so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place or been agreed upon. It includes conveyances, leases, mortgages, bills, bonds, promissory notes, wills, etc. Bouv. Law Dict. In Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564, it was held that a writ of attachment was not an instrument within the sense of that term as used in section 1107, Civil Code, and therefore a deed executed prior to a levy of the attachment upon the property conveyed, though not recorded until after the levy, would prevail over the attachment. A writ of attachment, an execution, or other writ is not the record or memorial of any agreement, but simply the mandate of the law commanding something to be done, or not to be done, and is quite independent of the will of the party against whom it runs, and is in no sense an embodiment of his agreement, will, or wishes; and we fully concur in the view taken by the court in that case of the writ of attachment. The court in the same case defined the term "instrument," as used in the Civil Code, to mean "some written paper or instrument signed and delivered by one person to another, transferring the title to, or creating a lien on, property, or giving a right to a debt or duty." The sheriff, under a proper writ, is clothed by law with the power to sell and convey the property of a judgment debtor. This can only be done in the cases, and in the manner, and subject to the limitations, provided by law, but, when this is accomplished, the process is as effective in passing the title as a conveyance by the debtor himself. When real estate is thus sold by a sheriff, "the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the right, title, interest, and claim of the judgment debtor thereto; and, when the estate is less than a leasehold of two years' unexpired term, the sale is absolute. In all other cases the property is subject to redemption," etc. Code Civil Proc. § 700. The sheriff is required to give the purchaser a certificate of sale, containing a specification of the facts enumerated in the statute, and a duplicate of this certificate must be filed in the office of the county recorder. The certificate is a memorial signed by the sheriff, in which what has taken place at the sale is set forth. It is the evidence of a sale, whereby, subject to the right of redemption, and of possession in the judgment debtor for the time allowed therefor, the entire equitable title is conditionally vested in the purchaser, subject to be defeated by a redemption; but, if not so redeemed, the certificate is evidence of his right to a deed which shall vest in him the dry, legal title which remained in the judgment debtor. The transfer is not perfect until the execution and delivery of the sheriff's deed, but, by the doctrine of relation, the deed, when thus executed, is to be deemed and taken as though executed at the date when the lien of which it is the sequence originated. The sheriff's certificate to the purchaser is the evidence of the equitable interest which the purchaser has in the land, and is an instrument whereby an interest or title is created, within the meaning of section 1107, supra. Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 301."

By section 4237, Pol. Code, the recorder is required to keep in his office a book to be called "Certificates of Sale," and to record therein all certificates of sale of real estate sold under execution, etc. When the case of Page v. Rogers, cited above, originated, the law in force provided for filing certificates of sale, but did not contain a provision for recording them. The court in that case held that the purpose of filing a duplicate of the certificate of purchase made at execution sale was to give notice to third persons of its existence and contents, and although the statute did not define the object, or prescribe the effect, of such filing, yet the effect was to impart constructive notice of the estate acquired under the certificate to subsequent purchasers and attaching creditors, and that such notice continued after the time for redemption had expired, and until the sheriff's deed was executed and recorded. It is objected that there is no provision for the acknowledgment of this class of instruments, and, as this was not in fact acknowledged, its record cannot impart notice. The answer to this proposition is that, the legislature having seen fit to provide for filing and recording duplicate certificates of sale of real property by the sheriff without acknowledgment, none is needed. They are records of the official acts of a public officer, and, like judgments, need only to be authenticated in the manner provided by law. Doubtless it would be within the power of the law-makers to provide that all instruments should be recorded so as to impart notice without the formality of proof or acknowledgment, had it been deemed proper to do so. As it is, the law requires the sheriff to file, and the recorder to record, duplicate certificates of sale of real property, without providing for their acknowledgment, and this court having long since judicially declared the effect of such filing, and the rule as thus established having become the basis upon which property rights are established, were we inclined to change the conclusion reached, we should hesitate to do so for manifest reasons.

We conclude, therefore:

1. That the certificate of sale given by the sheriff to respondent was an instrument whereby he acquired a title within the meaning of section 1107, Civil Code.

2. That the filing and recording of the duplicate certificate imparted constructive notice to all the world.

3. That such certificate, having been recorded before the deed under which appellant claims, and without actual notice of the existence thereof by respondent, it is prior in time and paramount to appellant's title under such deed, and that, as against respondent, the title of appellant under his unrecorded deed is to be treated as if it had never existed.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DANIEL et al. v. SMITH et al. (No. 11,051.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1888.)

GIFT—CAUSA MORTIS—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where one a few days before his death delivers to another his bank-book, requesting him to keep it for his daughter, and upon his death deliver it to her, but does not part with the present dominion or control of the book, or the money represented thereby, held, there is not a donatio causa mortis.¹

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

This was an action by Emma Daniel and John Daniel, her husband, to recover of the Hibernia Savings & Loan Association, one of the defendants, money on deposit with it. The plaintiff Emma Daniel claimed that the money was given her as a donatio causa mortis by Abraham Fielding, the depositor, her father, shortly before his death. Holland Smith, as administrator of the estate of Abraham Fielding, set up a claim to the money, and was made defendant to test his claim. It appeared from the evidence that Abraham Fielding died on the 12th day of May, 1880. That one David Cornfoot, upon the 7th day of May, 1880, called upon Fielding, who was ill, and who then de-¹To constitute a valid gift causa mortis, it must be made during some illness or peril of the donor, and in contemplation or expectation of death from that illness or peril, and death must also ensue therefrom. Parcher v. Bank, (Me.) 7 Atl. Rep. 266. Actual delivery by the donor in his life-time is necessary, or, if the nature of the property is such that it is not susceptible of corporeal delivery, the means of obtaining possession of it must be delivered. Emery v. Clough, (N. H.) 4 Atl. Rep. 796, and note. There must be as complete a delivery as the nature of the property will admit of. Gano v. Fisk, (Ohio,) 3 N. E. Rep. 532, and note. See *Vandor v. To sustain a gift the intention of the donor must be established by clear and precise evidence, Appeal of Madeira, (Pa.) 4 Atl. Rep. 903; and a gift causa mortis must be completely executed, precisely as required in the case of gifts inter vivos, subject to be divested by the happening of any of the conditions subsequent, *Basket v. livered into the hands of Cornfoot his bank-book of deposit in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Association, telling him to keep it during his sickness, and to take charge of his effects, and collect money on a mortgage he owned; and that, if it was necessary to use any of the money on deposit, he would give an order to draw the money; and that Cornfoot should give the book to his daughter, Emma Daniel, when he died. That Cornfoot took the book, and kept it until Fielding's death, when he gave it to her as requested. The plaintiffs appeal from judgment against them.

Sawyer & Burnett and F. J. French, for appellants. Nathaniel Holland and Joseph Leggett, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This is the second appeal in this case, and it was taken from a judgment in favor of the defendants, and from an order denying a new trial. The first appeal was from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and the decision thereon may be found reported in 64 Cal. 346. On turning to the report referred to, it will be seen that the court, by THORNTON, J., after carefully reviewing the testimony, summed up the law applicable to this class of cases as follows: "To constitute a donatio causa mortis the gift must be made in contemplation of the near approach of death by the donor, to take effect absolutely only upon the death of the donor. There must be a delivery of the property, either to the donee, or to some person for his use or benefit, and the donor must part with all dominion over the property, and the title must vest in the donee, subject to the right of the donor at any time during his life to revoke the gift." And further along in the opinion it is said: "In view of the strict requirements of the law as to delivery shown by the foregoing, we cannot hold that a delivery was established in this case. Nor does it appear that the dominion or control over the bank-book, or the money in the loan society, ever passed from Fielding, or that any interest ever vested in the alleged donee. There was no language of gift used. On the contrary, the testimony indicates, in our judgment, the creation by Fielding of a bailment in trust or agency, which was to terminate with the death of Fielding."

This decision must be treated as the law of the case, unless the facts shown on the second trial were materially different from those shown on the first trial. It is urged for the appellants that there was, on the last trial, proof of the "manual tradition" of the bank-book, and that this difference in the testimony entitled the plaintiffs to have judgment entered in their favor. It is true that Cornfoot testified very clearly that the bank-book was actually placed in his hands by Fielding, and that he took it away, and kept it till after Fielding died, and then delivered it to Mrs. Daniel. But in other respects there was no material change. It did not appear from the testimony given at the first trial that Fielding parted with the dominion or control of the bank-book, or the money represented thereby, and the testimony in the present transcript is, upon that question, substantially what it was before. There was then nothing showing that any interest ever vested in the alleged donee, and no different showing upon that subject is made now. There was no language or gift used before, and none is shown now. All the authorities seem to hold that, before a gift causa mortis can take effect, the donor must part, not only with the possession, but also with all present control and dominion over the subject of the gift. It was so declared in the cases cited by Judge THORNTON upon this point; and in Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415, in which a very learned and exhaustive opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice MATTHEWS, the following language is used: "The instrument or document must be * * * delivered to the donee, so as to vest him with an equitable title to the fund it represents, and to divest the donor of all present control and dominion over it; * * * and a delivery which does not confer upon the donee the present right to reduce the fund into possession by enforcing the obligation according to its terms will not suffice." In that case the donor had delivered a certificate of deposit into the hands of the donee, but the court said: "This indorsement which accompanied the delivery qualified it, and limited and restrained the authority of the donee in the collection of the money so as to forbid its payment until the donor's death. The property in the fund did not presently pass, but remained in the donor, and the donee was excluded from its possession and control during the life of the donor. That qualification of the right which would have belonged to him if he had become the present owner of the fund, establishes that there was no delivery of possession according to the terms of the instrument, and that, as the gift was to take effect only upon the death of the donor, it was not a present executed gift mortis causa, but a testamentary disposition." So in Walter v. Ford, 74 Mo. 195, checks were drawn by Walter, and by him delivered to Ford, with directions to deliver them to the parties in whose favor they were drawn if he (Walter) should die, but, if he recovered, to return them to him. The court said: "Ford was the agent of Walter, and bound to obey his instructions, and, so doing, could not have delivered the checks to any one while Walter lived. If they had been given to Ford to be held for the payees, at all events the authorities cited to show that a delivery to an agent or trustee of the beneficiaries is a sufficient delivery would be in point; but that is not this case. The checks were given to Ford, not to be delivered in the life-time of Walter, but after his death. It was in the nature of a testamentary disposition, and possessed none of the elements of a donatio causa mortis." Counsel for appellants say there can be no doubt that it was the intention of Mrs. Daniel's father that she should have this money on his death, "and the only question is, shall this intention be defeated by the technical rules of law?" And they "submit that the testimony is clear in making a case that appeals to justice, and that the judgment will be reversed if the court is not bound by the cases."

We consider the court bound by the rules of law established by the cases, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

WATERS v. DUMAS et ux. (No. 9,774.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1888.)

1. PARTIES—MISJOINDER OF WIFE—DEMURRER.

Where a complaint charges defendants with a joint trespass, but does not make it appear that defendants are husband and wife, a demurrer for misjoinder of the wife as a party will be overruled.

2. JUDGMENT—RENDITION AND ENTRY—LIMITATION.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 664, requiring judgment to be entered upon a verdict within 24 hours after its rendition, and section 561, subd. 6, providing as a penalty that the action shall be dismissed when judgment is not entered within six months after verdict, the court does not lose jurisdiction of the cause if judgment is entered within six months after the verdict is rendered.

3. DAMAGES—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—WHEN ALLOWED—CIVIL CODE CAL. § 3294.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 3294, providing that in any action of tort where defendant has been guilty of oppression or malice the jury may give exemplary damages, a charge that plaintiff could recover only actual damages was properly refused, where there was evidence of a wanton, aggravated, and malicious trespass by defendants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Eliza Waters against Lucien Dumas and Emilie Dumas, his wife, for damages for trespass on real estate. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

Robert Ash, for appellants. P. T. Trusseau, (N. B. Mulville, of counsel,) for respondent.

SEARLS, C. J. This is an action to recover damages for a trespass upon real property. Plaintiff had a verdict for $301, for which sum, together with costs, judgment was rendered in her favor. The appeal is from the final judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The complaint avers, in substance, that plaintiff was a resident and occupant of the house No. 50 Stevenson street, San Francisco, (describing it;) that on or about the 13th day of February, 1884, the defendants wrongfully and maliciously took down, removed, and carried away the front door of said house; took out and carried away the windows therefrom; stopped and stuffed the flues of the chimney so as to prevent the escape of smoke through the same; that the weather was wet, cold, and stormy, and that, when plaintiff had tacked cloth to the windows to keep out the cold, defendants tore down the same, threatened and reviled her, struck her with a board or piece of stick; that by reason thereof, and by reason of the cold and the open windows, etc., plaintiff suffered severely, both mentally and physically, to the extent of $1,000. Defendant demurred to the complaint, and urges that as Emilie Dumas, one of the defendants, was the wife of Lucien Dumas, her co-defendant, and as no reasons are given for joining her as a defendant, the demurrer should have been sustained. The answer to the proposition is that there is not a word in the complaint either showing, or tending to show, that the parties defendant are husband and wife. They are declared against as joint trespassers, and the allegations are amply sufficient to render them liable as such.

The motion to set aside the verdict because judgment was not entered thereon within 24 hours after its rendition was properly denied. It is true, section 664, Code Civil Proc., requires judgment to be entered by the clerk in conformity with the verdict within 24 hours after its rendition, unless the cause is reserved for argument or consideration, or a stay of proceedings is granted. The court does not, however, lose jurisdiction of the cause by a failure to enter the judgment within the time prescribed, or by failure of the clerk to perform his duty. The only penalty provided for such a case is to be found in subdivision 6, § 581, Code Civil Proc., which authorizes the court to dismiss the action, where, for six months after verdict or final submission, the party entitled to judgment neglects to demand or have the same entered. In this case less than four months elapsed between verdict and judgment. We have referred to this ruling of the court for the reason that, assuming all that appellant claims, there was no error; but, had there been, there is no bill of exceptions or authentication of the proceedings sufficient to support an assignment of error.

The third instruction asked by defendants, conceding but not holding it to be presented in the record in such form as warrants its review, was properly denied. It is as follows: "You are instructed that the only damages the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action, if any, is such damages as she may have sustained in the temporary use and occupation of the premises described in the complaint. No special damages are alleged, and no special damages can be allowed under the plaintiff's complaint." The action was for a wanton and malicious trespass. Special facts in aggravation of damages were set out in the complaint, and there was at least some testimony in support of the allegations. The instruction was, therefore, properly denied, and the proofs were sufficient to warrant exemplary damages under section 3294, Civil Code.

We see no merit in the appeal; and, but for the fact that the testimony at the trial shows some extenuating circumstances, and that we deem the verdict quite large enough, we should feel inclined to add a penalty as for a frivolous appeal. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; THORNTON, J.

M'LENNAN v. OHMEN. (No. 11,381.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1888.)

1. SALE—WARRANTY—ACTION FOR BREACH—EVIDENCE.

In an action for breach of warranty of a contract, in which plaintiff agreed to give defendant, for a new engine, a certain sum of money and an old engine, there being no evidence as to what the old engine was worth, or what plaintiff estimated it to be worth, the finding of the court as to what the contract price of the new engine was is immaterial.

2. SAME—WHAT CONSTITUTES A WARRANTY.

Any affirmation, at the time of a sale, as to the quality or condition of the thing sold, if intended as a warranty, and relied on by the purchaser, is a warranty; and, there being evidence to show such facts, the question should be submitted to a jury for determination.

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

The trial court has a better opportunity to judge of the weight and conclusiveness of evidence than the appellate court, and findings of fact of such court will not be disturbed where there is evidence tending to support them.

4. SAME—HARMLESS ERROR—PLEADING—SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 3283, providing that damages may be awarded, in an action for breach of warranty, for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, the allowance of the filing of a supplemental complaint, claiming damages since the commencement of the action, where there is nothing in the record to show that such complaint was served or answered, or that any such damages were allowed, is not reversible error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by F. P. McLennan against W. H. Ohmen for damages for breach of warranties of a steam-engine. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Royce & Cummins, for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to recover damages for breach of warranties of a steam-engine. The plaintiff had a mill in the city of San Francisco, in which he carried on the business of wool scouring. The work in the mill was done by machinery, which was propelled by a steam-engine. The defendant was a manufacturer of steam-engines in the same city. The plaintiff had an old "slide-valve engine," and was informed that an automatic cut-off engine would save him a large amount of fuel. On or about the 1st day of May, 1884, defendant agreed to manufacture and sell to plaintiff, and plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendant, a 12x12 cut-off engine to be used in plaintiff's mill; and the price to be paid for the same was $750 and the old engine. The defendant manufactured the new engine, and delivered it to the plaintiff on or about the 1st day of July, 1884, and the plaintiff then paid the defendant therefor the price agreed upon. The new engine was at once placed in the mill, and was used by the plaintiff in running his machinery until the 17th day of October, 1884, when he offered to return it to defendant; because of its defects, and failure to fulfill the warranties made by defendant, and demanded the return of the old engine, and remuneration for all damages which he had sustained in consequence of defendant's failure to comply with his contract. The defendant refused to accede to this demand, and this action was afterwards brought. It is alleged in the complaint that the engine at the time of its delivery to the plaintiff by defendant, was not sound and merchantable; that it possessed a latent defect, not disclosed to plaintiff, in this, that the valves thereof were leaky; that it was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was made, to-wit, for the purpose of running plaintiff's wool-scouring machinery; that, at the time of making the contract for the manufacture and sale of the engine, defendant warranted it to save plaintiff 25 per cent. of his coal bills for running his machinery, and thereby induced plaintiff to enter into the contract; that the engine did not save 25 per cent. in the coal bills, but, on the contrary, caused an increase in the coal bills of 40 per cent.; and that plaintiff had sustained damages, by reason of the premises, in the sum of $2,500, for which he prayed judgment.

The court below found all the facts to be as alleged in the complaint, except that the damages sustained by the plaintiff were fixed at $1,600; and for that sum judgment was entered in his favor. In his statement on motion for new trial, defendant specifies as not justified by the evidence (1) the finding that the contract price of the engine manufactured by defendant for plaintiff was $1,000; (2) the finding that defendant warranted the engine to save plaintiff 25 per cent. of his coal bills; (3) the finding that the engine increased plaintiff's coal bills 40 per cent.; and (4) the finding that plaintiff had sustained damages in the sum of $1,600. The other findings, in reference to the implied warranties, under sections 1768, 1769, and 1770 of the Civil Code, are not questioned.

The question raised under the first specification is not material. Plaintiff testified that, at the beginning of the negotiations, defendant "stated that he would furnish one of his 12x12 automatic cut-off engines for $850 in money and my old engine, making $1,000." Plaintiff afterwards offered $750 and his old engine; and, as defendant was to have six weeks in which to manufacture the new one, he agreed to accept the price offered. There is nothing to show what the old engine was worth, or what plaintiff estimated it to be worth, and we consider it quite immaterial whether the finding correctly fixed the contract price at $1,000, or should have fixed it at $900.

As to the question raised under the second specification, it is enough to say that we think there was evidence from which the court might find the express warranty alleged. To create an express warranty the word "warrant" need not be used, nor are any particular words necessary. Any affirmation made at the time of the sale, as to the quality or condition of the thing sold, will be treated as a warranty, if it was so intended, and the purchaser bought on the faith of such affirmation; and whether it was so intended, and the purchaser acted upon it, are questions of fact for the jury. 5 Wait, Act. & Def. 555; Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573; Horton v. Green, 66 N. C. 596.

So, as to the third specification. There was evidence tending to show that the new engine consumed as much as 40 per cent. more coal than the old one in doing the same work. We cannot, therefore, say that this finding was not justified.

The law as to the damages which may be recovered in a case of this kind is declared in the Civil Code as follows: "Sec. 3313. The detriment caused by the breach of a warranty of the quality of personal property is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value which the property would have had at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time. Sec. 3314. The detriment caused by the breach of warranty of the fitness of an article of personal property for a particular purpose is deemed to be that which is defined by the last section, together with a fair compensation for the loss incurred by an effort in good faith to use it for such purpose." The plaintiff testified that he had "expended in money since the Ohmen engine was put in, in an attempt to make it do what it was wanted to do, $1,087.51;" and it was admitted that the then present value of the engine was only $250. It is claimed for the appellant that the plaintiff's testimony as to some of the items of his expenditures was indefinite and uncertain, and that some of the money alleged to have been expended by him ought not to have been considered in estimating his damages. It is true, the testimony seems open to criticism, but the court below had a better opportunity to judge of its weight and worth than we have. The court evidently rejected some of the items, or the damages would have been placed at a higher figure than they were. We are not informed which items were rejected, or how the exact sum of $1,600 was fixed upon; but, looking at all the testimony, we cannot say that the court was not authorized to find as it did.

During the progress of the trial the plaintiff was permitted, against the objections of the defendant, to file a supplemental complaint, setting forth "that since the commencement of this action the said plaintiff, by reason of the breach of the warranties set forth in said complaint, has suffered damage in the further sum of $141.05," for which he prayed judgment. Conceding that the court erred in permitting the supplemental complaint to be filed, still we are unable to see that defendant was prejudiced thereby. There is nothing to show that it was served or answered, or that any damages claimed under it were allowed. Besides, plaintiff was entitled, under his original complaint, to recover damages "for detriment resulting after the commencement" of his action. Civil Code, § 3283. Looking at the whole record, we find no sufficient cause for reversal of the judgment, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

BRISON v. BRISON. (No. 12,364.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1888.)

1. TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 1572, defining as actual fraud a promise made without intention of performing it, and with intent to induce another to enter into a contract, an oral promise made by a wife, upon a conveyance of land from her husband, to reconvey the same when requested, with no intention to keep such promise, is such actual fraud as to give rise to a trust, and bring the promise within a provision of the statute of frauds excepting from its operations trusts arising by operation of law.

2. SAME—RESULTING TRUSTS—CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 158, making transactions between husband and wife subject to rules controlling persons occupying confidential relations, a conveyance of land by a husband to his wife, upon her oral promise, in which the husband had confidence, to reconvey the land when requested, is constructively fraudulent, and gives rise to such a trust as to bring such oral promise within a provision of the statute of frauds excepting from its operations trusts arising by operation of law.

3. SAME—ACTION TO ESTABLISH—PAROL EVIDENCE TO CONTRADICT DEED.

In an action by a husband to compel his wife to reconvey to him certain lands conveyed to her upon her oral promise to reconvey them when requested, parol evidence is admissible to contradict the consideration expressed in the deed, and to show fraud and a resulting trust.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

A. P. Catlin and Add. C. Hinkson, for appellant. A. L. Hart, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was a suit to have a trust declared as to real property, and for a conveyance. The complaint shows substantially the following facts: The plaintiff and the defendant were husband and wife. The plaintiff was the owner of the property in controversy, upon which there was a mortgage. In order to raise money to pay off the mortgage, the plaintiff determined to go to Arizona, and engage in business there, and was desirous of making a will before his departure, so that the property should go to his wife. But being influenced by the wish to save her the expense of probate proceedings in case of his death, and having confidence in her, and relying on her parol promise that she would reconvey to him upon his request, he made a deed to her absolute in form, and took no written acknowledgment from her. The deed recited that it was made in consideration of love and affection, and of the sum of $1, the receipt of which was acknowledged. But it is averred that, "though said deed recites a consideration, yet in truth and in fact there was no consideration therefor, and no money was paid or intended to be paid as a consideration for said deed." It is also averred that the promise by which plaintiff was induced to make the deed was in bad faith and false, and "made with intent on her part to deceive, and did deceive, the plaintiff." The defendant having refused to reconvey the property, the plaintiff brought this suit to compel a reconveyance. The court below gave final judgment for the defendant upon demurrer, and the plaintiff appeals. The argument for the respondent is based upon the statute of frauds, and upon the rule that a writing shall not be contradicted or added to by parol evidence.

The statute of frauds expressly provides that a contract to convey land shall be void unless in writing (Civil Code, § 1624, subd. 4,) and that no trust in real property shall be valid unless created by writing or by operation of law. Civil Code, § 852. Under these provisions there can be no doubt but that the defendant's promise to convey was invalid, and could not be enforced. It is to be observed, however, that the statute excepts from its operations such trusts as arise "by operation of law." Substantially the same exception is in the English statute of frauds, and in the statutes of most of the United States. And the universal construction given to it is that it excepts from the operation of the statute, among other things, trusts which arise from fraud, actual or constructive, or, as they are termed, constructive trusts. It is no longer worth while for any counsel to argue against this construction of the statute. The only point which is open to debate in cases of this character is whether the facts show such a case of fraud as falls within the exception. Such fraud may be either actual or constructive; and, in our opinion, both exist in the case before us.

1. We think there was actual fraud. As above stated, the complaint shows that the parol promise upon which plaintiff relied was false and "in bad faith," and "made with intent to deceive." The construction which we think must be given to this averment is that the promise was made without any intention of performing it. This is a well-recognized species of fraud. See Bigelow, Fraud, (Ed. 1888,) 483, 484; Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 481, 482. And the Civil Code expressly provides that "actual fraud * * * consists in any of the following acts committed by a party to the contract, or with his connivance, with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract: * * * A promise made without any intention of performing it." Civil Code, § 1572. Now, inasmuch as it is admitted by the demurrer that the promise was made without any intention of performing it, we think the case falls directly within the provision. An instance of the application of the principle to facts similar to those of the case before us is Newell v. Newell, 14 Kan. 202. It is to be observed of this ground that the essence of the fraud is the existence of an intent, at the time of the promise, not to perform it. But for such intent there would be no actual fraud; for it is well settled that the mere failure to fulfill a promise is not fraud. Perry v. McHenry, 13 Ill. 236; Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 234; Levy v. Brush, 45 N. Y. 589; Burden v. Sheridan, 86 Iowa, 125; Cowan v. Wheeler, 43 Amer. Dec. 283; Boyd v. Stone, 11 Mass. 348. But, if the evil intent existed, there was actual fraud; and, so far as this ground is concerned, it is immaterial whether there was a confidential relation or not. Christy v. Sill, 95 Pa. St. 387. If actual fraud existed, the statute of frauds is no defense. And it does not need any citation of authorities to prove that in cases of such fraud the rule as to contradicting or adding to a writing by parol evidence has no application.

2. But if the intent not to perform, above referred to, had not been averred, we think the plaintiff is nevertheless entitled to relief upon the other facts alleged, on the ground of the confidential relation existing between the parties. It is not every case where parties trust each other that the law recognizes as confidential, (Doyle v. Murphy, 22 Ill. 508; Steele v. Clark, 77 Ill. 474; Weer v. Gand, 88 Ill. 493, 494;) but the relation of husband and wife is expressly declared by statute to be of that character. The provision of the Civil Code is as follows: "Sec. 158. Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried; subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on 'Trusts.'" It is not surprising that, in taking away the wife's common law incapacity to contract, the legislature should have thought it prudent to throw around her the safeguards which arise from the trust relation. Possibly, at first view, it might seem strange that it should have been thought necessary to accord the same protection to the husband. Perhaps this is to be regarded as an acknowledgment of woman's position in modern society. But, at any rate, the provision is in positive and direct language; and, where such is the case, the courts are not at liberty to disregard it. Nor is it necessary to consider what would be the rule in cases where it appears that there was in fact no actual confidence between the parties; that is to say, where the wife is living in independence of or hostility to the husband, (see Falk v. Turner, 101 Mass. 496;) for it is averred that the plaintiff "had at all times confidence in his said wife and her devotion and fidelity to him," and that he made the deed "having confidence in his said wife, and in her said representation and promises, and relying upon the same." The relation of the parties to each other, therefore, was confidential in fact as well as in law. The plaintiff was induced to make the deed by the confidence which he had in his wife, and the belief thereby engendered that she would perform her promise. But for that he would not have made it. The betrayal of such confidence is constructively fraudulent, and gives rise to a constructive trust. This is independent of any element of actual fraud. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 258, 307. The law, from considerations of public policy, presumes such transactions to have been induced by undue influence. Civil Code, § 2235; Bigelow, Fraud, (Ed. 1888,) 261, 262; Kerr, Fraud & M. (Bump's Amer. Ed.) 151; Hov. Fraud, 18. The extent and variety of the application of this principle to persons in confidential relations with each other may be seen from the notes to the leading case of Huguenin v. Baseley, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 2, p. 1156. From the cases there cited it will abundantly appear that, while it is not impossible that a gift between persons in such relations may be valid, yet that all such transactions are constructively fraudulent, and are only to be upheld upon a showing of special circumstances. See, also, Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 296. Now, if this be so,—if the law does not permit such transactions to stand even where there was an intention that the donee should have the property,—how much more should it interpose where, as here, there was no such intention, but only an intention that she should retain the semblance of ownership for a time.

We think the authorities fully bear out the assertion that in such cases a constructive trust arises, and that the statute of frauds has no application. In Wood v. Rabe, 96 N. Y. 426, a son was induced by the parol promise of his mother to confess a judgment in her favor, and allow her to purchase under it a piece of his real property. It was held that a constructive trust arose; and the court, per ANDREWS, J., said: "It was, on the part of the son, the case of a confidence induced, not by the bare promise of another, but by the promise and the confidential relations conjoined. The confidence, in fact, has its spring and origin in the relation, and that relation was a controlling ingredient moving his action. It would be a gross wrong to permit that confidence to be betrayed, and we are of opinion that the statute of frauds cannot be invoked as a bar to relief. The principle that, when one uses a confidential relation to acquire an advantage which he ought not in equity and good conscience to retain, the court will convert him into a trustee, and compel him to restore what he has unjustly acquired, or seeks unjustly to retain, has frequently been applied to transactions within the statute of frauds." So, where a devise is made to one upon his parol promise to hold it in trust for another, a trust arises, and the statute of frauds is not allowed as a defense. Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. St. 442; Barrell v. Hanrick, 42 Ala. 71, 72; Hoge v. Hoge, 1 Watts, 163. So it has been held, although there is some conflict in the authorities, that where one is allowed to purchase at an execution sale, upon his parol promise to hold for the judgment debtor, a trust arises. Wolford v. Herrington, 86 Pa. St. 39; Arnold v. Cord, 16 Ind. 177. But the case which we think is most directly in point is Young v. Peachy, 2 Atk. 254. There a father obtained from his daughter, without consideration, a conveyance of real property, upon his parol promise to hold it for a particular purpose, viz., "as a trustee only for her and her heirs, * * *" and that he would not claim or insist upon any benefit or advantage thereof." No actual fraud was shown. The father died bankrupt; and on a bill against the assignees it was decreed that the conveyance should be set aside, not upon the ground of an implied or resulting trust, but upon the ground of constructive fraud, which would now be said to give rise to a constructive trust. Lord HARDWICKE said: "There have been a great many cases even since the statute of frauds where a person has obtained an absolute conveyance from another, in order to answer one particular purpose, but has afterwards made use of it for another, that this court has relieved under the head of fraud; for a practice of this sort is a deceit and fraud, which this court ought to relieve against. The doing it is dolus malus, and that appears to be the present case." See, also, Haigh v. Kays, 7 Ch. App. 469. The principle of this case was extended, in Murray v. Dake, 46 Cal. 648, 649, to a transaction between parties who did not stand in confidential relations to each other. Whether that was a proper extension of the principle need not be considered here. It must be admitted that there are cases in which the relief has been denied. But it will generally be found that in such cases the confidential relation has been overlooked; and we think the cases we have cited are in accordance with sound principle. For, if the relief cannot be granted in this case, we do not see how it could be granted if an attorney should, by his parol promise, induce his client to put the property in his name for some temporary purpose, and then refuse to reconvey on the ground of the absence of a written acknowledgment; and so of principal and agent, parent and child, trustee and cestui que trust, etc. It is to be observed that the trust is not a resulting trust, properly so called. The relief is not granted merely on the ground of want of consideration. The fact that a deed is without consideration, or is, as is sometimes said, voluntary, is not of itself sufficient to avoid the deed. Viney v. Abbott, 109 Mass. 300; Jackson v. Garnsey, 16 Johns. 189; Green v. Thomas, 11 Me. 321; Laberee v. Carleton, 53 Me. 212; Poe v. Domec, 48 Mo. 443. This is at least one of the things designed to be expressed by section 1040 of the Civil Code, which provides that "a voluntary transfer is an executed contract, subject to all the rules of law concerning contracts in general, except that a consideration is not necessary to its validity." The want of consideration, however, is a fact proper to be proved in connection with and as a part of the constructive fraud. Shotwell v. Shotwell, 24 N. J. Eq. 385. Nor does the recital of a consideration stand in the way of the relief. As is well known, it was a settled rule of the early law that, if no consideration was expressed or proved, a use resulted to the grantor. To prevent this it became common to make the deed recite a consideration; and, while such recital could be contradicted for collateral purposes, it could not be contradicted for the purpose of avoiding the deed, (Farlington v. Barr, 36 N. H. 89; Coles v. Soulsby, 21 Cal. 47; Rhine v. Ellen, 36 Cal. 362; Martin v. Splivalo, 69 Cal. 614, 11 Pac. Rep. 484,) or for the purpose of raising a resulting trust, (Russ v. Mebius, 16 Cal. 356; Graves v.

Graves, 29 N. H. 129; Philbrook v. Delano, 29 Me. 412, 413.) But this only means that the recital could not be contradicted for the mere purpose of showing a want of consideration. Where fraud is charged, the want of consideration may be shown in connection with and as part of the fraud. In cases like the present, the confidential relation is one circumstance, the parol promise is another, and the want of consideration is a third. In cases of fraud, actual or constructive, no mere form of words which the parties have made use of can shut out inquiry as to the real facts; and this, from the necessity of the case. For, as has been pertinently asked, if parol evidence be not admissible, how else can the fraud be shown?

The objection that parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or to add to the deed is a distinct ground from the statute of frauds. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 158. The admissibility of such evidence is sometimes put upon the ground that it does not contradict or add to the deed. In Hall v. Livingston, 3 Del. Ch. 373, the chancellor said in reference to this subject: "There is a well-recognized distinction between contradicting a deed or impairing its legal operation, and raising out of the transaction an equity de hors the deed, binding the grantee's conscience to hold the land for the real purposes of the conveyance, and not according to its legal operation, when the latter use of it would, under the circumstances, work fraud. Such an equity is held to be independent of the deed, and not excluded by it as a mere conveyance of the legal estate, unless there be in it some terms or implication to that effect. To support such an equity parol evidence is admissible, not as contradicting the deed, but as explanatory of the transactions out of which the equity arises." Perhaps the most comprehensive and philosophical expression of the rule is that parol evidence is admissible to raise a trust in cases of actual or constructive fraud. But, whatever may be thought of the terms in which it is expressed, the rule itself is well settled. 2 Whart. Ev. § 1038; Bigelow, Fraud, (Ed. 1888,) c. 10, § 8; Reeves v. Bass, 39 Tex. 631; Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. St. 442; Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, 59 Cal. 637. If we are right in the foregoing, the point as to the necessity of an acknowledgment by the wife before a notary does not require serious consideration. The statute has no relation to trusts raised by parol evidence.

We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to defendant to answer.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PEOPLE v. STITES. (No. 20,377.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1883.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ATTEMPT TO COMMIT CRIME—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Proof that defendant had prepared a dynamite bomb to place upon a railroad track, and that, with the bomb in his possession, defendant was on his way to a previously appointed rendezvous with his confederate, whence the two intended to proceed to the track, and place the bomb thereon, but was prevented from accomplishing his purpose by the presence of officers, clearly establishes an attempt to place the bomb upon the track.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT and W. T. WALLACE, Judges.

Indictment of John E. Stites for attempting to obstruct a railroad track. Defendant was convicted, and appeals.

Robert Ferral and Walter Gallagher, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BELCHER, C. C. The defendant was charged with the crime of attempting to place an obstruction upon the track of the Sutter-Street Railroad in the city and county of San Francisco, and was convicted. He moved for a new trial, and has appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion. The motion was made upon the ground that errors of law were committed by the court during the trial, and that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. In the brief filed for appellant here it is distinctly stated that "the appellant does not desire a new trial upon any other ground than that the evidence fails to prove the commission of the crime for which he was convicted." We shall therefore assume that all of the supposed errors of law are waived. In denying the motion for new trial, the court below, by WALLACE, J., (HUNT, J., concurring,) filed an opinion which fully meets and answers all the points made in support of the motion. We quote and adopt so much of that opinion as relates to the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. It is as follows:

"The information against the prisoner is founded upon the statute, (Pen. Code, § 587,) which provides that any person who maliciously places an obstruction upon the track of any railroad shall suffer imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, etc., (Id. § 664.) 'Any person who attempts to do so shall be imprisoned not exceeding two and a half years,' etc. The prisoner was found guilty of such an attempt, committed by him on the 16th day of February last, upon the track of the Sutter-Street Railroad Company, and asked for a new trial upon four several grounds now to be considered: First. It is insisted that the entire evidence given at the trial is insufficient to establish the attempt of which the prisoner was convicted. The principal facts made to appear at the trial are substantially as follows: On the 15th day of February last, the day preceding that on which the alleged attempt was made, the prisoner and a confederate of his were in consultation as to how they could most advantageously and effectively,—that is to say, how they might, with the most assured degree of personal safety to themselves, and the greatest attainable hazard to the lives and property of others,—place an explosive upon the track operated by the company mentioned, to which company and the railway it operated the prisoner appears to have been actuated by feelings of intense and bitter hostility. The confederate was already possessed of the explosives proposed to be employed, or rather of the dynamite cartridges which could be wrought into a bomb suitable for the purpose in hand, and which, with the addition of the necessary gun caps and other fulminating agencies, would make up an explosive, proven at the trial to be of the highest known power. It was deemed important to determine in advance at what particular point on the track of the road the explosive could be used with the most destructive effect, and, as the prisoner had then recently and for several consecutive months been in the employ of the company as a conductor on the road, and had in that way gained intimate personal knowledge of the railway property, his confederate asked him if he 'knew of a good place to put dynamite on the car track.' To this inquiry the prisoner responded that it was 'immaterial where he put it, if he did not get caught.' After some further consultation the parties separated, with the understanding that on the next morning, at 4:30 o'clock, they would meet at the junction of Turk and Hyde streets, near the dwelling-house of the prisoner, for the purpose of immediately proceeding to put in execution the project in hand. The cartridges were delivered to the prisoner, who, at the dwelling-house in which he and his family resided, and by the use of the sewing-machine employed in that house, prepared, or caused to be prepared, the cloth and bomb in which two dynamite cartridges with a large number of fulminate caps were inclosed; the whole constituting an agency of terrible destructive power, and which, being laid upon the track of the road, would be readily exploded by the contact of a passing team or passenger car. The building or house of the prisoner was situated on the eastern line of Larkin street, and its front, looking to the west, is within a few feet of the track of the railway running in a northerly and southerly direction along the street. The rear of the house is bounded by an alley-way or cul-de-sac, called 'Dodge Place,' which runs northwardly to the southern line of Turk street, into which it opens, at a short distance east of Larkin street. The place at which the prisoner and his confederate had agreed to meet—the junction of Hyde and Turk streets—was to the eastward of the point where Dodge alley intersects the southern line of Turk street. About a quarter past 4 o'clock on the morning of the 16th of February, the prisoner left his dwelling to join his confederate, pursuant to the appointment they had made on the preceding day. He passed to the rear of the dwelling-house, walking on the western side of Dodge alley in a northerly direction, and approached the southern line of Turk street. He had at that time in his possession, in the right-hand pocket of the overcoat he wore, the dynamite bomb prepared in his dwelling-house, weighing some three pounds, and being about twelve or fourteen inches long, by some two or two and a half inches in width. As the prisoner approached the southern line of Turk street, on his way to meet his confederate, he was surprised at the sight of several police officers who, as he then discovered, were intently observing him, and who had been in fact, and without his suspecting it, for several hours on the watch for his appearance. Upon observing this state of things the prisoner immediately turned towards the east, and passing upon the southerly line of Turk street, walked rapidly to the junction of Turk and Hyde streets, and continued thence down the latter street, on its westerly side, until having arrived opposite the house, 178, and observing that he was being followed by the officers, he surreptitiously deposited the bomb in the flower garden in front of that house, by dropping it over the fence as he passed along. From this point he moved over and immediately down Hyde street, striking soon into a run, and after having been hotly pursued by the officers, who fired several times, he was finally captured on McAllister street. It should be here observed that nearly all of the matters stated in the foregoing outline of the evidence are absolutely admitted by the prisoner to be true in point and fact. The fact of the consultation between himself and his confederate on the 15th of February; the appointment to meet next morning; the endeavor by the prisoner to keep that appointment; his detection, flight, and capture,—are not any of them denied by him. He denies, however, that he had the dynamite bomb in his possession at the time. In his statement of his connection with this affair, made by him to the officers immediately upon his arrest, he at first denied that he had the dynamite bomb in his possession, and that he threw it away in his flight. But at a subsequent time, upon being informed that he had been distinctly seen by some of the pursuing officers to do so, he at last replied, 'I might as well give it up, if those officers are against me, or saw me do it.' Again, at a later period, he testified at the trial as a witness in his own behalf, and did not then deny his possession of the dynamite bomb on the morning of the 16th of February, although he testified upon other points made against him upon the part of the prosecution. Further, immediately after his arrest, his dwelling-house was searched by the officers, and they there discovered in the sewing-machine found there pieces of cloth, thread, and other material exactly corresponding with the cloth, thread, and some of the other material of which the bomb had been fabricated. In short, the truth of the facts stated are made morally certain; established beyond a reasonable doubt, by a variety of evidence of the most persuasive character.

"It is remarked by a distinguished writer upon criminal law that the definition of an 'attempt,' as the word is understood in criminal jurisprudence, is intricate, and, as he says, 'but imperfectly understood by the courts.' 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 725. Indeed, an experiment made will probably satisfy any one that it is hardly within the compass of our language to frame any universal definition which, precisely indicating the lines of inclusion and exclusion, will prove to be both positively and negatively accurate, when applied to the facts of a particular case. Mere intention to commit a specific crime does not itself amount to an 'attempt' as that word is employed in the criminal law. There must in addition to the wicked intent—the mens rea—be some act done towards the ultimate accomplishment of the purposed crime. But even such acts do not always of themselves amount to an 'attempt,' or to an offense of which human laws will take cognizance, for if they be but acts of preparation, however elaborate, our municipal law (at least as it existed February last) would not assume to deal with them. For instance, the construction of the dynamite bomb by the prisoner at his home on the night of the 15th of February, with the deliberate intention on his part to employ it the next morning in destroying the lives and property of others, atrocious as it was, and indefensible in foro conscientia, was but an act of preparation, and when perfected did not render him amenable to the municipal law as then existing, or punishable by its rules. But when the prisoner left his house on the morning of the 16th day of February and went to Turk street, pursuant to the antecedent arrangement between his confederate and himself, it amounted to an overt act done by him for the purpose of effecting the crime intended, and was in law and fact a criminal attempt. Before he left his house he was already fully prepared, and carried with him the instrument he was to use in effecting the crime he intended. Nothing, in fact, remained for him to do but deposit it on the railway at the time easily within his reach. In considering whether a particular act done amounts to an attempt in a criminal sense, the proximity or remoteness of the person or thing intended to be injured is generally an important element, as the adjudicated cases will show. The learned argument of counsel delivered in 1862 in the case of Reg. v. Cheeseman, and often referred to by courts and text writers, illustrates this idea. He observed as follows: 'A man may do an act with intent to commit some crime anywhere; for example, a man may buy a rifle in America with intent to shoot a man in England, but the buying of the rifle could not be construed into an attempt to shoot the man. If a notorious burglar is seen to put a picklock key into a door the jury may assume that he is attempting to break into the house, but if he were found purchasing a picklock key ten miles from the house in question it would be impossible, without other evidence, to say that it was bought with intent to break into that house.' — Leigh & C. 140. The observations of BLACKBURN, J., in the same case, are suggestive: 'There is no doubt a difference between the preparation antecedent to the offense and the actual attempt, but if the actual transaction has commenced, which would have ended the crime if not interrupted, there is clearly an attempt to commit the crime.' The proximity on the one hand, and remoteness on the other, of the intended subject of the injury enter largely into the question of whether the actual transaction has commenced. The circumstances of the case in hand satisfy all known requirements of mere proximity. The track of the railway runs but a few feet from the doorway of the dwelling-house of the prisoner, and it is apparent, therefore, that, if in that house he performed an overt act towards presently executing his intended crime, or if he there commenced the doing of such an act which was continuous in its nature, and intended to be forthwith completed elsewhere, he committed the offense charged, if, while so attempting the perpetration of the crime, he was interrupted by extraneous causes preventing him from proceeding further in the execution of his purpose. We do not in this connection overlook the fact pointed out in the argument for the defense that the movements of the prisoner at the time he was interrupted by the officers had carried him not nearer to, but further from, the track of the road upon which it was his intention to place the explosive he carried; or, to quote the language of the learned counsel, 'every step the defendant took, from the time he left his own door until his arrest, was a step away from, and in an opposite direction to, the line or lines of the Sutter-Street cable cars.' In our judgment, however, there is no significance whatever in this circumstance. If, indeed, there was any doubt of the intent with which the prisoner began his movement on the morning in question, the direction in which he traveled with reference to the location of the road might have been of importance. If the criminal intent here were to be inferred only from the precise act then done, it might with much plausibility be argued that a man really intending to presently fire a house, or blow up a roadway, would be found approaching and not receding from the object he intended to destroy. But, as observed already, we know the criminal intent of the prisoner here, as an independent fact; he admits it; his counsel did not deny it; and, therefore, if the prisoner, armed for the purpose, and within a few steps of the line of the road, was, when interrupted, in motion, and actively maneuvering to accomplish the crime intended, it is of no practical importance that at the exact moment of interruption he had reached a point further (by a distance equal to the width of his dwelling-house) from the track than he was when he actually started out on his criminal endeavor. It should not be forgotten in this connection that the plan agreed upon between the prisoner and his confederate, on the day before, necessarily required as part of the means of executing it, that the first movement of the prisoner should be towards the east,—in a direction from and not towards the track of the road. The dwelling-house of the prisoner is to the east of the railroad; and the conjunction of Hyde and Turk streets, where the confederates had agreed to meet, is at a point still further to the east. From that place they were to reach the roadway; not necessarily at the nearest point, but at the one deemed safest for them,—the point where they would be least likely to 'get caught;' and it was while pursuing the prearranged details of the enterprise that the prisoner reached the southern line of Turk street, where he discovered the presence of the officers on the watch there for his appearance. This was an interruption which practically put an end to his criminal endeavor, and but for that interruption, so far as appears, he would have effected the crime he was then attempting to consummate. He was engaged at that moment in an active endeavor to reach the road at a point deemed by him most eligible for the purpose in hand, and in all probability already actually selected in his own mind. He was armed with the necessary explosive, and all this occurred within but a few steps of the railroad which was the immediate subject of the injury intended. We have carefully examined all the authorities upon the subject of criminal attempts within our reach. Of course, the circumstances of each case differ in a greater or less degree from those of all other cases; the nature of the crime proposed as being one of actual violence or otherwise, the particular agencies by which it was intended to be committed, the actual or supposed adaptation of those agencies to the purpose in hand as being likely to effect the object intended, and a variety of other details, varying from time to time as the discoveries of science and the progress of invention have produced novel instrumentalities of destruction, while they have not disturbed the rules of decision, have constantly called for new applications of those rules by the courts to the improved agencies employed in the perpetration of crime. It would be unprofitable to cite the authorities here. The question before us involves the mere application of recognized rules to the particular facts of the case in hand, and, as observed by the learned commentator to whom we have already referred, 'perhaps the only practicable method is for the judge in each case to consider the special facts in determining whether or not a criminal attempt has been proven.' We are of the opinion that upon the facts in evidence, tested by the rules referred to, the prisoner is guilty as charged in the information."

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

MOYLE et al. v. LANDERS et al. (No. 11,906.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1888.)

APPEAL—REQUISITES—NOTICE—SERVICE ON ATTORNEY—DEATH OF CLIENT.

Where the record on appeal shows there were several defendants, all represented by the same attorney of record, and the attorney of record accepted service, for all the defendants, of a notice of appeal, and it appears that one of the defendants died between the date of the judgment and the service of the notice,—a fact unknown to plaintiff or his attorney,—a motion to dismiss the appeal as to the legal representatives of the deceased, on the ground that the service of the notice as to the deceased was void, made by the same attorney who accepted the service, will be denied without prejudice.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. RIORDAN, Judge.

Motion to dismiss an appeal.

L. E. Bulkely, for appellants. H. Sieberst, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This case is now before us upon a motion to dismiss the appeal as to the respondent Michael Landers, and his legal representatives. Upon an examination of the papers, we find that there were several defendants in the court below, and that they all appeared by the same attorney of record. Judgment went for defendants; and in due time plaintiffs filed their notice of appeal, and served it on the said attorney of record, who accepted service for all the defendants. As a matter of fact, however, the defendant Michael Landers had died between the entry of the judgment and the service of the notice of appeal; this fact being unknown to plaintiffs or their attorney. And this motion is based on the ground that the service of the notice of appeal was void, because, at the time of the service, the said Landers was dead; and it is made by the same attorney who accepted the service. In such a case this court will not entertain a motion to dismiss the appeal, made by the attorney who accepted service for the dead man. The motion to dismiss is denied without prejudice.

1. POOR DEBTORS—EXAMINATION AND DISCHARGE—CONFINEMENT FOR CONTEMPT—FAILURE TO PAY ALIMONY.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1143 et seq., entitling persons confined in jail under executions issued in civil actions to a hearing as to their property and effects, with reference to a discharge, before the judge of a superior court, extends to a person confined in jail for non-compliance with an order of court for the payment of alimony.

2. SAME—HABEAS CORPUS—ISSUE OF MANDATE.

Where, on an application for mandate on the ground that petitioner had applied to respondent, a judge of the superior court, for an examination under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1143, entitling those in jail under execution to an examination as to their property, etc., with reference to a discharge, the answer of respondent denies petitioner's right to such examination under the Code, but avers that he was accorded the examination, and that his discharge was refused on the ground that, in the judgment of respondent, he was not entitled to it, the case being submitted on the answer as true, though the prisoner is entitled to such examination, the appellate court will not assume that the decision was not on the merits of the evidence in the examination, and the writ will be refused.

In bank. Application for writ of mandate to superior court, Alameda county.

Craig & Meredith, for petitioner. Fred. E. Whitney, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. In a certain action for divorce brought against petitioner, William I. Wilson, by his wife, in the superior court of Alameda county, the said court on February 1, 1887, made an order requiring petitioner to pay plaintiff therein $200 per month alimony, and $800 counsel fees. On April 25, 1887, the said court committed petitioner to the custody of the sheriff until said money should be paid, and since that date petitioner has been in jail under said orders. The petition states that on December 8, 1887, the petitioner, after due notice, applied to the respondent, Hon. NOBLE HAMILTON, judge of the superior court of said county, to be discharged, under sections 1143 et seq., Code Civil Proc.; and that the respondent refused, and still refuses, to allow petitioner "to be examined, or to take the oath prescribed by, or in any manner to receive any of the benefits or privileges provided for by, said sections of said Code." The answer of respondent first sets forth that petitioner "was not confined in jail on an execution issued on a judgment rendered in a civil action;" that he was so confined by virtue of "a commitment for contempt of court," and that he "was not, and still is not, entitled to be examined, or to be discharged from custody, under the provisions of said sections" of the Code. If these were the only statements contained in the answer, it would be clear that respondent refused to allow petitioner to be examined, and to consider his application to be discharged, on the ground that his case did not come within the provisions of said sections of the Code. But the respondent in his answer denies that he refused to hear petitioner's application for discharge, and, "on the contrary, alleges that defendant, as superior judge of Alameda county, did, on the 8th day of December, 1887, hear the said application of said William I. Wilson, and all evidence, matters, and things produced in behalf of said application, and then and there listened patiently to the argument of counsel for said William I. Wilson," etc.; and "that afterwards, on the 9th day of January, 1888, defendant rendered his decision, and denied the application of said William I. Wilson for discharge," on the ground that "he was not, in the judgment of defendant, entitled thereto." It is probable that the respondent refused to discharge the petitioner, and to consider the merits of the case, upon the ground that, having been committed for contempt, he could not under any circumstances be discharged under the sections of the Code referred to. But as the case was submitted on the answer taken as true, and as it avers that respondent did hear the application, "and all evidence, matters, and things produced in behalf of said application," and denied the discharge because the petitioner "was not in the judgment of respondent entitled thereto," we cannot take the fact to be that respondent refused to act in the premises, or to hear and determine the application. The writ of mandate must, therefore, be dismissed.

As, however, the petitioner may make another application for discharge before the respondent, or some other superior judge, and may renew it every 10 days, it may be well here to correct an error into which the respondent evidently fell. Section 1143, Code Civil Proc., is as follows: "Any person confined in jail on an execution issued on a judgment rendered in a civil action must be discharged therefrom upon the conditions in this chapter specified." The succeeding sections of the chapter provide that such person, upon notice, may apply to a judge of a superior court of the county for his discharge; that the judge must examine him under oath as to his property and effects, and his ability to pay, etc., and hear such other legal and pertinent evidence as may be produced by him or the creditor; and that if, upon the examination, the judge is satisfied that the prisoner should be discharged, he must, after administering a certain prescribed oath, order his discharge. But in the case at bar the respondent seems to have considered that a person in jail for contempt for non-compliance with a general order for the payment of money to a party to an action is not a person included in said section 1143, and may be confined for a life-time, although his inability to pay be clearly established. There is a well-settled distinction between a civil and a criminal contempt. The former consists, generally, in failing to do something ordered to be done by a court, in a civil action, for the benefit of the opposing party therein; the latter consists in acts of disrespect of the court, such as disorderly or violent conduct in its presence or immediate vicinity, or in the doing of a forbidden act, resistance to process, etc. Rap. Contempt, § 21 et seq.; Phillips v. Welch, 11 Nev. 187; People v. Spalding, 10 Paige, 284. There might be instances, of course, where the character of the contempt would be of difficult determination, but there is no doubt that in the case before us the failure to comply with an order for the payment of money generally was a civil contempt. And the authorities seem to be clear that in a case of civil contempt, that is, when a defendant in a civil action is ordered by the court to pay money generally to the plaintiff, and is committed until he shall have paid it, the prisoner is in custody as under an execution. It was so held in England under the "Lords Act." Reax v. Stokes, Cowp. 136. In Van Wezel v. Van Wezel, 3 Paige, 43, which, like the case at bar, was contempt for not paying alimony, McCoun, vice-chancellor, says: "It is, to all intents and purposes, an execution. The order is a judgment rendered in favor of one party against the other for the payment of a sum certain, or which may be reduced to a certainty if it be for costs, by taxation. The object of the precept is to execute the order, to give it effect, and to enforce its performance; and, when the party is imprisoned upon it, he is, within the letter and meaning of the law, imprisoned by virtue of an execution." See, also, People v. Spalding, 10 Paige, 284, 7 Hill, 301; Case of Watson, 3 Lans. 413; People v. Cowles, *43 N. Y. 49; Jackson v. Billings, 1 Caines, 252. We think, therefore, that if the petitioner shall make another application for discharge, under the sections of the Code above mentioned, it will be the duty of the superior judge to whom it shall be made to consider the case as coming within the provisions of those sections; to hear evidence touching his property and effects; to discharge the petitioner if he be satisfied, from the evidence, of his inability to pay; and to remand him, if he be not so satisfied. To hold that the petitioner, though utterly penniless, must suffer a life imprisonment for debt because of the particular form in which the imprisonment was imposed, would be a gross violation of the plain intent of the Code. Writ dismissed.

TOY v. SAN FRANCISCO & S. R. R. Co. (No. 9,957.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1888.)

APPEAL—PRACTICE—PARTIES—CODE CIVIL PROC. CAL. § 940.

Defendant moved to have certain persons substituted as defendants in his stead, and made them parties to such motion. The motion was denied, and judgment entered against defendant. Held that, on appeal from such judgment by defendant, such persons are adverse parties within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 940, providing that notice of appeal shall be served on the adverse party.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Assumpsit by George D. Toy against San Francisco & San Rafael Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Lloyd & Wood, for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellee. H. A. Powell, for S. H. Harmon.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to recover a certain sum of money alleged to be due the plaintiff. Before any answer was filed to the complaint, the defendant moved, upon affidavit, that an order of the trial court should be made substituting S. H. Harmon and the Gordon Hardware Company in place of the defendant, and discharge it "from liability to any party, upon its depositing in court the amount claimed in the contract mentioned in the complaint." Upon the hearing of this motion it was refused, and, the defendant failing to answer, judgment by default was given, and made in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for. From that judgment this appeal is taken. It is claimed that the court, upon the proof made, should have substituted S. H. Harmon and the Gordon Hardware Company in place of the defendant; and it is perfectly plain that, if the judgment is reversed, it must be because this substitution was not made; and it must result from such reversal that Harmon and the Gordon Hardware Company will become the defendants in the action, and the present defendant be "discharged from liability to any party." Although not named as parties to the judgment as it stands, Harmon and that company were served with notice of the motion, under the provisions of section 386, Code Civil Proc., and appeared in the court below, and became quasi parties to the action, so far as their rights were affected by the granting or refusal of that motion. The order of the court below absolved them from all connection with the cause from that time, and the effort now is to reverse the action of the trial court in that respect, and to make them parties defendant.

A motion is made to dismiss the appeal because Harmon and the Gordon Hardware Company, nor their attorneys, were not served with notice thereof. And the question to be determined upon that motion is whether or not they are "adverse parties" in the sense in which that term is to be taken under section 940, Code Civil Proc. Harmon and the Gordon Hardware Company, certainly became quasi parties to the action when they were served with notice of the motion to substitute them for the defendant in the court below. By the action of that court their rights were affected and determined. If the contention of the appellant is to prevail, it seems plain to us that quasi parties to the action, whose rights were passed upon in the trial court, will be affected to such an extent as that they will have put upon them as defendants a burden which the court below refused to impose. Therefore, their interests in relation to the subject-matter of the appeal is in conflict with the reversal of the judgment appealed from, and they were entitled to notice of the appeal. Williams v. Mining Ass'n, 66 Cal. 193, 5 Pac. Rep. 85, and cases cited; In re Medbury, 48 Cal. 83. At the appellant's instance they were made parties to the motion to substitute in the court below. By the appeal it is sought to allow the appellants to effect that in the supreme court which was denied them in the trial court, the result of which would be that quasi parties to the action would be concluded of their rights to be heard in the appellate court upon a matter in which they were heard and their rights determined in the lower court. The appeal should be dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal is dismissed.

HENDY v. MARCH. (No. 9,714.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1888.)

1. ACCOUNT STATED—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where it appears that an account against defendant has been presented and examined by him, and no objections made thereto for several months, it becomes an account stated.¹

2. SAME—MISTAKES—PLEADING.

A party seeking to take advantage of a mistake in an account stated must put such mistake in issue by his pleadings.

3. PARTNERSHIP—WHAT CONSTITUTES—AGREEMENT FOR USE OF SHIP.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 2395, declaring that a partnership is an association of persons for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing the profits, two persons having agreed that one should furnish money to keep a ship in repairs, collect the earnings, divide the surplus with the other, and, in case the earnings were not sufficient to pay the advances, such other was to pay a portion of the deficiency, are partners, and the statute of limitations will not commence to run against the party making the advances until the affairs of the firm are closed.²

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action on an account stated, by Joshua Hendy against W. F. March. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

J. H. Skirm and John C. Hall, for appellants. W. H. Hart, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action on an account stated. The court found that the account was stated as alleged. The defendant contends that the finding is not sustained by the evidence.

There being a substantial conflict, it must be assumed at this stage of the case that the version of the plaintiff's witnesses is the true one. According to them, the account was made up and presented to the defendant, who went over it with the expert, and "made no objections whatever to the account," from the time it was presented to him in August, 1881, "until after this suit was brought," which was on November 25 of the same year. This was a sufficient acquiescence from which to imply an assent. It seems to be well settled that the assent may be implied. In Terry v. Sickles, 13 Cal. 427, the court, per COPE, J., said: "If the account be sent to the debtor, and he does not object to it within a reasonable time, his acquiescence will be taken as an admission that the account is truly stated." In relation to this subject, Judge STORY says: "It is sufficient if it has been examined and accepted by both parties, and this acceptance need not be express, but may be implied from circumstances. Between merchants at home an account which has been presented, and no objection made thereto, after the lapse of several posts is treated, under ordinary circumstances, as being by acquiescence a stated account. Between merchants in different countries a rule founded in similar considerations prevails. If an account has been transmitted from the one to the other, and no objection is made after several opportunities of writing have occurred, it is treated as an acquiescence in the correctness of the account transmitted, and therefore it is deemed a stated account." 1 Eq. Jur. § 526. The same rule is laid down by GREENLEAF. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 126. The evidence above referred to brings the case fairly within this rule. And the account was undoubtedly final in character, and showed an indebtedness against defendant of a specific amount, and was sufficient in all respects to serve as the basis of an account stated.

¹See, also, as to what constitutes an account stated, Heidenheimer v. Ellis, (Tex.) 3 S. W. Rep. 666; Walker v. Steele, (Colo.) 12 Pac. Rep. 423; Whitehead v. Darling, (Ky.) 5 S. W. Rep. 356; Rehill v. McTague, (Pa.) 7 Atl. Rep. 224; Rhyne v. Love, (N. C.) 4 S. E. Rep. 536.

²See Clift v. Barrow, (N. H.) 15 N. E. Rep. 327, and note.

The defendant contends, however, that, even if this be so, he is entitled to show mistakes in the account. But an account stated becomes a contract. As was said by the court, per SHAFER, J., in Carey v. Petroleum Co., 33 Cal. 697: "An account stated alters the nature of the original indebtedness, and is itself in the nature of a new promise or undertaking. Foster v. Al-lanson, 2 Term R. 479; Holmes v. D'Camp, 1 Johns. 36. Therefore, an account stated with a new firm may include debts due to a former firm, or to one of the partners. David v. Ellice, 5 Barn. & C. 196; Gough v. Davies, 4 Price, 200. An action upon an account stated is not founded upon the original items, but upon the balance ascertained by the mutual consent of parties." It follows that, as is the case with other contracts, the mistake must be put in issue by the pleadings. Auzerais v. Naglee, 15 Pac. Rep. 372; Terry v. Sickles, 13 Cal. 427. The pleadings here did not present any such question. Furthermore, we cannot say from the evidence that there was any mistake.

Nor is the statute of limitations a bar to any part of the plaintiff's demand. The plaintiff and the defendant were partners in the use and earnings of the vessel. The finding is that, being each the owner of an interest in the vessel, it was agreed that the plaintiff "should take the charge and management of said schooner, W. F. March, and that the plaintiff should advance money to keep said schooner in repair and equipped for use, and to advance all necessary running expenses of said schooner, and to collect all earnings of said schooner, and apply said earnings to his advances, and the surplus, if any, to be divided as follows: three-quarters to the plaintiff, and one-quarter to defendant; and, if the earnings were not sufficient to pay the advances, then defendant was to pay plaintiff one-fourth of the deficiency." Here is a distinct agreement to share in the profits and loss arising from the use of the vessel, and such an agreement constitutes a partnership. Civil Code, § 2395. It is not necessary to say that the partnership extended to the ship itself as contradistinguished from its use. "Part owners of a ship do not, by simply using it in a joint enterprise, become partners as to the ship." Civil Code, § 2396. But the use of a ship is distinct from the ship itself, and there may be a partnership in the use or earnings, although as to the vessel itself the parties are tenants in common. Merritt v. Walsh, 32 N. Y. 689; Bulfinch v. Winchenbach, 3 Allen, 161; Mumford v. Nicoll, 20 Johns. 633; Hinton v. Law, 10 Mo. 701. The above finding is within the issues; for the defendant pleaded the statute of limitations, and, this being denied by force of the provision of the Code, anything which related to the issue so raised was proper to be examined. The evidence, in our judgment, sustains the finding. Indeed, it seems to have been the understanding of the defendant that he was the partner of the plaintiff, for he says: "I never was satisfied with the account, nor were either of the partners." If such was the relation of the parties, it is manifest that the statute of limitations did not begin to run until the affairs were wound up, and the balance due agreed upon between the parties, which was the result of the account stated.

We see no error in the admission of evidence. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MECHANICS' FOUNDRY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. RYALL. (No. 11,209.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 24, 1888.)

INJUNCTION—AGAINST TRESPASS—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF ALLEGATION.

Complainant, praying an injunction against trespass by a former employe intruding into his workshop, alleged that the law afforded no adequate protection; that a continuance of the trespass would result in irreparable injury to him; that defendant was unable to respond in damages; that pecuniary compensation for the actual damages would not be adequate relief; and that restraint was necessary to prevent continuance of the intrusions, and multiplicity of suits. Held, that neither the naked allegation of irreparable injury, nor the insolvency of the trespasser, were sufficient to warrant an injunction against a trespass.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Action for injunction by Mechanics' Foundry of San Francisco, against Joseph E. Ryall. At first trial, plaintiff obtained damages and an injunction. Defendant appealed. Judgment was reversed, and the case remanded. At the second trial, on an amended complaint, defendant entered a general demurrer, which was sustained, and the action was dismissed. Plaintiff appeals.

Manuel Eyre, for appellant. R. Percy Wright, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from doing certain acts complained of by plaintiff. The case was before this court on a former appeal, and it was held that the complaint, as then framed, did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. 62 Cal. 416. The allegations of the complaint are set out in the opinion. When the case went back to the superior court, an amended complaint was filed, and to that a general demurrer was interposed and sustained. Plaintiff declined to further amend its complaint, and thereupon judgment was entered dismissing the action. The additional allegations in the amended complaint are: "That an action at law will be wholly inadequate to protect this plaintiff; that a continuance of such acts,—and defendant announces his positive determination so to continue them each day,—will work irreparable injury to this plaintiff; that, if not restrained, such acts will, before it will be possible to obtain a decision in an action at law, work irreparable injury to this plaintiff, and utterly ruin its business; that said defendant is utterly unable to respond in damages; that he is impecunious and totally without means; that pecuniary compensation for the actual damages from day to day will not afford adequate relief, nor prevent the continuance of said intrusions; and restraint is necessary to prevent multiplicity of suits."

It was alleged in the original complaint that defendant was a stockholder in the corporation plaintiff, and in the amended complaint that he was a stockholder and director of the corporation. This allegation was stricken out of the amended complaint; but on whose motion or for what reason it was done does not appear. If defendant was in fact a stockholder and director of the corporation, it is not easy to see how he could be called a trespasser for doing the acts complained of. But, however this may be, before a court of equity will interfere to restrain a trespass, it must appear that the injury to result from the trespass will be irreparable in its nature; and it is not sufficient simply to allege that fact, but it must be shown to the court how and why it will be so. "The mere allegation that irreparable injury will result to the complainant unless protection is extended to him is not sufficient. The facts must be stated, that the court may see that the apprehensions of irreparable mischief are well founded." Carlisle v. Stevenson, 3 Md. Ch. 499; Waldron v. Marsh, 5 Cal. 120; Turnpike Co. v. Supervisors of Yuba, 13 Cal. 190; High, Inj. (2d Ed.) § 722. Nor will equity interpose to restrain a trespasser simply because he is a trespasser and is insolvent. Other facts and circumstances must be shown before the extraordinary remedy of injunction can be invoked. "The fact that a trespasser is insolvent will not give chancery jurisdiction to enjoin his acts, where the other circumstances of the case preclude it." Turnpike Co. v. Barnett, 2 Cart. (Ind.) 536; 1 High, Inj. (2d Ed.) § 701. There may be other efficient means of preventing the commission of the threatened trespass which can be availed of without any violation of law; and, if so, such means should first be resorted to. In the case last above cited, where an injunction was asked to restrain trespassers, it was said: "If these men are not responsible for their acts in damages, we should suppose they might be crowded out of the way by a molliter manus imposuit." Many cases might be mentioned where this rule would be applicable. For example, if one should discharge his cook or a clerk in his store, and the cook or clerk should return and insist upon his right to occupy his former place in the kitchen or at the counter, and should threaten to continue to do so every day, to the exclusion of any other cook or clerk, no one would think it necessary to ask for an injunction to stop the intrusions, or that a court of equity would grant the relief if it were asked for. We see no reason why the same rule should not be applied here. If the defendant had no right to enter and occupy a place in the plaintiff's foundry, it would seem that he might easily have been stopped at the door, or, having entered, have been put out by calling in a policeman if necessary.

In our opinion, the demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

GOODWIN v. McCABE. (No. 11,293.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1888.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ADVERSE POSSESSION—CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION—NATURAL BOUNDARIES.

Where plaintiff claimed by prior possession land bounded partly by fences and partly by a lake and slough, the court instructed the jury that it was sufficient to constitute possession if plaintiff had a substantial inclosure, such as would protect crops, turn cattle, etc., without mentioning the natural barriers. Held, that plaintiff was entitled upon specific request to have the jury also instructed as to the effect of such natural barriers.¹

2. SAME—COLOR OF TITLE—SWAMP-LAND CERTIFICATES.

A certificate of purchase of swamp-land constitutes color of title; Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1925, declaring it "evidence that the holder * * * is the owner of the tract described therein;" and entry thereunder in good faith, and using for grazing purposes, constitutes constructive possession, even if the land is not inclosed.²

3. PUBLIC LANDS—HOMESTEAD ENTRY—ADVERSE CLAIMANTS—CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION.

Taking possession either with or without force, under a United States homestead entry, is invalid where the land is in the actual possession of one who has no title, but a mere possession; but valid, if without force, and the possession of the adverse claimant is constructive only.

4. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTS—MAPS FROM LAND-OFFICE.

A copy of a map of land on file in the office of the register of the land-office, and certified by him, is admissible in evidence.

Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

We think that the judgment and order must be reversed for the refusal of certain instructions requested by plaintiff. The land in controversy is public land. The plaintiff resided upon an adjoining piece, to which the title is undisputed. In order to make out his possession, he proved that the whole tract, including that upon which he resided, had on one side a body of water known as "Clear Lake," on another a slough which emptied into the lake, and on the remaining sides a fence built partly by himself and partly by his neighbors; and he gave evidence tending to show the pasturing of his cattle there. The greater part of the evidence related to the character of the slough; that is to say, whether it was of sufficient depth and firmness of bottom to turn cattle. In its charge the court made no mention of the natural boundaries, but simply told the jury that it was sufficient for the plaintiff to have a substantial inclosure, and that "a substantial inclosure is such a one as a prudent farmer would have to protect a growing crop, and sufficient to protect the land from cattle, horses, and hogs; the character of the land and the crops growing upon the same being considered." This was all which was said upon the subject. No reference to natural barriers was made. Thereupon the plaintiff requested the court to give the following instruction: "If plaintiff, at any time before the defendant entered upon the land in controversy, built a fence of any kind in such a manner that, together with natural barriers, it formed a complete inclosure sufficient to turn cattle, which inclosure included within it the land in controversy; and if said land was suitable for pasturage, and was used by plaintiff for that purpose up to the time of the entry of the defendant,—then there was established in plaintiff such possession of said lands as to entitle him to recover, and your verdict will be for the plaintiff." The court refused to give the instruction, and the plaintiff excepted. We think the instruction should have been given. Natural barriers may or may not be of such a character as to serve as part of an inclosure by which a party subjects land to his dominion and control, and so acquires possession of it. Whether they are of such a character in any given case is a question for the jury, under proper instructions from the court. Brumagim v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 41, 51. In this case, if the natural barriers were of such a character as, in connection with the fences, to make a sufficient inclosure, and the plaintiff pastured his cattle there, he certainly had actual possession of the tract in controversy. Id.; Southmayd v. Henley, 45 Cal. 102; Pierce v. Stuart, Id. 280. The plaintiff had a right to have the jury instructed as to the effect of natural barriers. For aught we can see the jury may have supposed that the substantial inclosure referred to by the court meant an inclosure erected by man. If no request had been made, the charge, although meager, might be sufficient. But, in view of the specific request, we think there was error.

We think also that the fourth, fifth, and eighth instructions requested by plaintiff should have been given.

The foregoing is sufficient to dispose of the appeal. But inasmuch as the other questions argued will arise upon a retrial, we think they should be passed upon. The plaintiff at the trial put in evidence two swamp-land certificates, the amounts due upon which had been fully paid up. These, the counsel expressly stated, were not introduced to show title, but to show color of title,—to define the extent of his possession. These certificates seem to be regular on their face, and we think they constituted color of title. Such a certificate is "evidence that the holder * * * is the owner of the tract described therein." Code Civil Proc. § 1925; Laugenour v. Hennagin, 59 Cal. 625. And if the plaintiff entered under it, believing in good faith that it conferred upon him a right to the land, and pastured his cattle there, he had constructive possession of the tract, even if it was not inclosed. Webber

v. Clarke, 15 Pac. Rep. 431. Such a constructive possession would enable him to maintain ejectment against a mere intruder. But the defendant was not a mere intruder. He had made his homestead entry under the laws of the United States, and had paid the sums which such laws required him to pay, and he produced the receipts for such payments from the proper officer. By so doing he had connected himself, as far as was then possible, with the government title. No final certificate could at that time have been issued. Rev. St. § 2291. He had done all that he could do up to that time. And if his proceedings were valid, he had done enough to enable him to defeat an action of ejectment by one who had no title but a mere possession. See McDonald v. Edmonds, 44 Cal. 330. The cases of Pulliam v. Gravel Co., 52 Cal. 605, and Pickard v. Kelley, Id. 89, are not at all in conflict with this. Those cases simply decided that the papers did not tend to show possession. As a matter of course they did not. Possession was to be proved by other evidence. It is contended, however, that the defendant's proceedings were not valid for the reason that the land was then in the actual possession of the plaintiff. If the plaintiff was in the actual possession of the land, we think the defendant's proceedings were invalid, although his entry was accomplished without the use of force. This seems to be the result of the authorities. In Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513, the land was in the actual possession of the plaintiff's testator, and the entry of the defendant was forcible. The opinion does not seem to have in view the case of an entry upon actual possession without the use of force. In Durand v. Martin, 120 U. S. 369, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 587, Martin "was in actual possession under color of title." The report does not show whether the entry of Durand was with force. In Quinby v. Conlan, 104 U. S. 423, the rule was stated to be that "a settlement cannot be made upon public land already occupied." The element of force was not adverted to. In Mower v. Fletcher, 116 U. S. 381, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 409, the court said that if a party "enters into possession of the land, and improves and cultivates and holds it, no one, by forcibly or surreptitiously getting into possession, can make a pre-emption settlement," etc. And the reasoning of the court in all cases seems to us to forbid the invasion of the actual possession of another, whether such invasion is accomplished by the use of force or not. See, also, McBrown v. Morris, 59 Cal. 68. But we do not think the rule applies where the first party has a mere constructive possession. The reasoning of the court in the cases above mentioned does not seem to cover such a case. And in Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 287, the court, per WAITE, C. J., said: "We also all agree that if a peaceable entry had been made on lands which had not been inclosed or improved, a good right might have been secured." The ultimate question to be submitted to the jury, under proper instructions, therefore, is whether the plaintiff had actual possession of the land at the time of the defendant's entry. If he had, the defendant's proceedings were invalid, and the plaintiff must recover; if he had not, the defendant's proceedings were a good defense.

Certain objections were taken to the admissibility of evidence, which we will notice briefly. We think the receipts of the receiver of the land-office were properly admitted. Whether the affidavit required by section 2290, Rev. St., ought to have been introduced need not be decided, as upon a retrial the defendant will doubtless introduce the affidavit. The certified copy of the map was also properly admitted. Section 2224, Rev. St., does not apply to the case. That section has reference to papers on file in the office of the surveyor general of certain states. The map in question was not in the office mentioned, but in that of the register; and he, as the custodian of the record, was the proper person to give a certified copy of it. In Murphy v. Sumner, cited by appellant, the register attempted to certify to the fact that certain land had been listed. The court said that he ought to have given a certified copy of the list. If in this case the register had attempted to certify that the land was of a certain character the case would have been in point. In giving a certified copy of the document, showing its character, he followed the course pointed out in the case. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

ALPERS v. SCHAMMEL et al. (No. 9,697.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1888.)

1. PARTNERSHIP—ACTIONS AGAINST—ALLEGATION OF PARTNERSHIP.

The following complaint: "Plaintiff * * * avers that said defendants are * * * copartners * * * under the firm name of S., R. & Co.; that said defendants, copartners as aforesaid, * * * being indebted to plaintiff, * * * executed their promissory note in words following: 'On demand, after date, without grace, we promise to pay ourselves, or order. * * * S., R. & Co.,'—substantially avers the execution of the note by defendants as copartners.

2. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL—DEATH OF PARTY BEFORE SERVICE—EFFECT ON JUDGMENT.

In an action against three copartners, two of whom appeared and answered, but there was no appearance for the third, nor default taken against him, and he died two days after the action was begun, and it did not appear that notice was served on him. Afterwards a verdict was returned for plaintiff. Held, that the verdict should be held to be against the two only who were served and answered, and a judgment against all the defendants should be modified by dropping the deceased defendant.

3. JUDGMENT—RENDITION AND ENTRY—EXCESS OF VERDICT.

Where the clerk, without authority, enters judgment in excess of the verdict, with interest from the time the entry was made, the judgment should be modified as of the amount of the verdict, with interest from the date of the verdict, in accordance with the statutory form.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Where there is, on the record, no specification of the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, the question cannot be considered on appeal.

5. SAME—MATTERS NOT APPARENT ON RECORD.

Alleged error by the court in denying a new trial, in that the verdict was against the law, cannot be considered, where the notice of intention to move for a new trial is not made a part of the statement or bill of exceptions.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Charles Alpers brought an action on two promissory notes against Henry Schammel, Frank B. Reynolds, and William L. Bolte, averring in his complaint as follows: "That the said defendants are, and were at all times herein mentioned, copartners, and as such carrying on business in the said city and county of San Francisco, under the firm name and style of Schammel, Reynolds & Company; that on the 23d day of December, A. D. 1862, at said city and county, the said defendants, copartners as aforesaid, became and were justly indebted to plaintiff in the full sum of fifteen hundred dollars gold coin of the United States, and, being so indebted, then and there made, executed, indorsed over, and delivered to plaintiff their certain promissory note in writing, in the words and figures following, viz.: 'On demand, after date, without grace, we promise to ourselves, or order, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, payable only in gold coin of the government of the United States, for value received, with interest thereon, in like gold coin, at the rate of two per cent. per month from date until paid. SCHAMMEL, REYNOLDS & Co.' That plaintiff is now the owner and holder of said promissory note, and no part thereof has been paid, although demanded." Dated February 26, 1883. February 20, 1884, a jury returned a verdict of $3,686.35 for plaintiff. On this verdict a judgment purporting to be dated February 20, 1884, was entered, against all the defendants, for $3,772.35, ($86 more than the verdict;) the excess being the interest from February 20, 1884, to June 19, 1884, the date the judgment purports to have been recorded, and from which date it drew interest as recorded. Defendants appeal.

Fisher Ames and Geo. D. Collins, for appellants. R. Percy Wright, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. Action on two promissory notes. It is urged that the complaint does not show that the notes in suit were executed by the defendants as copartners. We cannot concur with counsel in this contention. We are of opinion that it is substantially averred that the notes were executed by defendants as copartners. This being so, there is no variance between the proof and the allegations of the complaint. Further, there was no objection made to the notes, when offered in evidence, on the ground that they varied from the averments of the complaint. If such objection had been made, it might have been obviated by amendment. And, as the cause was tried, as it clearly appears it was, as if the notes had been averred to have been the notes of the copartnership, we deem it unnecessary to say anything further on this point.

It is contended that the delivery of the notes is not shown by the evidence, but the verdict is not attacked on any such ground, as there are on the record no specifications of the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The point urged cannot, therefore, be considered.

The further contention is made that the verdict is against law, for the reason that there is no evidence that there was a delivery to the plaintiff of the notes sued on, and the court therefore erred in refusing a new trial. The notice of intention to move for a new trial is no part of the record herein, unless made so by a statement or bill of exceptions, (Hook v. Hall, 68 Cal. 22, 8 Pac. Rep. 596;) and, as the notice does not appear in the statement herein, the point is not before us for consideration.

It is averred in the complaint that Henry Schammel, Frank B. Reynolds, and William L. Bolte, constituted the firm of Schammel, Reynolds & Co. The two first mentioned appeared and answered. There was no appearance by Bolte, and no entry of default against him for not answering. There is uncontradicted evidence in the record that Bolte committed suicide within two days after the action was begun; and, as his default was not entered, it may well be inferred that he was not served. The cause came on for trial on the 20th day of February, 1884, and on the same day a verdict was entered in the following words: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find for the plaintiff, and assess the damages in the sum of thirty-six hundred and eighty-six and 35-100 dollars, ($3,686.35)." This verdict could only regularly have been against the defendants who appeared and answered. It could not have been against Bolte if he was served and had lived until the trial, unless he had answered. If he was served and failed to answer, then his default should regularly have been entered. If he was not served, then the action should regularly have proceeded against the defendants who were served, (Code Civil Proc. § 414,) or who appeared and answered. In no event, in a regular course of procedure, could there have been a verdict against him. We think, therefore, that this verdict should be held to be a verdict only against Schammel and Reynolds, who answered.

On this verdict a judgment was entered against Schammel, Reynolds and Bolte. This clearly appears from the judgment entry. Further, judgment was entered by the clerk on the verdict for $3,772.35, ($86 more than the amount of the verdict returned,) with interest at the legal rate from the time it was made. This was in excess of the authority vested in the clerk by the statute. The judgment should have been entered for the amount of the verdict, with interest at the legal rate from the day on which it was returned by the jury. The respondents' mode of accounting for the insertion of a sum greater than the verdict on the judgment is not sustained by the record; and, if it was, it would not be in accordance with the mode pointed out by statute.

The judgment should be modified, in accordance with the proceeding, by striking out the name of William L. Bolte, and by inserting in it the amount stated in the verdict as returned, viz., $3,686.35. We find no other errors than the above in the record.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below, with directions to modify the judgment in the manner above pointed out. But, as this modification might have been made in the court below without appeal to this court, the appellants will recover no costs on this appeal. Ordered as above.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

MODIFIED OPINION.

(April 23, 1888.)

PER CURIAM. By inadvertence herein, the judgment as entered does not express the views of the court. The court did not intend to order a new trial. Its intention was to modify the judgment in the particulars indicated in the opinion. The following, which is in accordance with what the court intended to express, will be substituted for that part of the opinion (the last clause) which states the judgment: "The order denying a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below, with directions to modify the judgment in the manner pointed out, and, as so modified, is affirmed. But as this modification might have been made in the court below without an appeal to this court, the appellant will recover no costs on this appeal." Ordered accordingly.

75 Cal. 604

HUMBOLDT COUNTY v. DINSMORE. (No. 11,342.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1888.)

1. HIGHWAYS—STATUTORY ESTABLISHMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—QUALIFICATION OF PETITIONERS.

In an action instituted under Code Civil Proc. Cal. pt. 3, tit. 7, for the condemnation of lands alleged to be necessary for a public highway, it appeared that the petition to establish the highway did not show that the proposed road was in the road-district where the petitioners resided, or that it was in the state of California. Held, that it was not error to admit the petition in evidence, as Pol. Code Cal. § 2682, relating to the requirements of a proper petition, does not include an allegation that the signing petitioners are 10 freeholders of the road-district, and taxable therein for road purposes, wherein the proposed road is to be constructed; that being something which the board had jurisdiction to determine as a fact on the evidence before it on the hearing of the matter.

2. SAME.

In an action for the condemnation of a strip of land belonging to defendant, alleged to be necessary in the establishing of a highway, the introduction in evidence of the order of the board of supervisors cannot be objected to on the ground that the board did not possess the power to act on the petition before determining the fact that it was signed by at least 10 freeholders of the road-district, taxable therein for road purposes, as it must be presumed that the order was made on a sufficient finding unless the contrary appears on the record.

3. SAME—APPROVAL OF BOND.

Pol. Code Cal. § 2683, requires that the bond that accompanies a petition to establish a highway be approved by the board of supervisors, but the bond must be considered as sufficiently approved where the board, recognizing the petition and bond to be such as required by law, orders viewfers to be appointed; and no objection to its introduction in evidence, in an action to condemn land for such road, can be sustained on the ground of want of approval.

4. SAME—NOTICE TO OWNERS.

Under Pol. Code Cal. § 2685, providing that viewfers on the establishing of public highways must, inter alia, "notify the resident owner or agent of land over which it passes, of the proposed route," the notice need not be in writing; and where the owner was notified personally, and attended the survey, he cannot object to the introduction in evidence, in an action to condemn land for such road, of the viewer's report, on the ground of want of notice.

5. SAME—NECESSITY OF ROAD.

Pol. Code Cal. § 2686, which provides what the report of viewers on the establishing of highways shall contain, does not require them to specify as a fact that they had ascertained the necessity for the road, or that the same should be opened. Therefore the fact that the report did not contain a finding thereon does not deprive the board of supervisors of the power to adjudicate in the premises.

6. SAME—DESCRIPTION OF PROPOSED ROAD.

In an action for the condemnation of a strip of land belonging to defendant, alleged to be necessary for a public highway, objection to the admissibility in evidence of the records of the board of supervisors, on the ground of insufficient description, cannot be sustained, where, from the viewers' report, the map of survey, and the petition, the termini and description of the road can easily be determined.

7. SAME—WIDTH OF ROAD—VARIANCE BETWEEN PETITION AND REPORT OF VIEWERS.

Since Pol. Code Cal. § 2681, enumerating the requisites of a petition to establish a highway, enacts "that all such highways shall be at least 40 feet wide," the order of the board of supervisors cannot be considered void where, having the power, it approved the report of the viewers containing a declaration that the road shall be 60 feet wide.

8. SAME—CONFIRMATION OF VIEWERS' REPORT—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

In an action for the condemnation of a strip of land belonging to defendant, alleged to be necessary for a public highway, it appeared that defendant, the only complainant, although present when the order was made, and represented by counsel, made no offer of any evidence against the new road, and the board, on such information as was afforded them by the report of the viewers under oath, and by papers attached to their report, acted upon the matters of fact within their jurisdiction to determine. Held, that the complainant was estopped from contesting the sufficiency of such evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from the superior court, Humboldt county; JOHN J. DE HAVEN, Judge.

Humboldt county instituted an action under Code Civil Proc. Cal. pt. 3, tit. 7, for the condemnation of a strip of land belonging to J. O. Dinsmore, the defendant, alleged to be necessary for the establishing of a highway. Judgment for the plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

E. W. Wilson and Wallace Dinsmore, for appellant. J. D. Chamberlain and Geo. W. Hunter, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was instituted under title 7 of part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the condemnation of a strip of land belonging to Dinsmore, the appellant, alleged to be necessary for and to be used as a public highway. Judgment was made and entered for the plaintiff, and from that and an order refusing him a new trial the defendant has appealed, the case coming here upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

It is claimed that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the petition for the road, (1) because it did not show that the proposed road was in the road-district in which the petitioners reside, or that it was in the state of California; (2) that it did not describe particularly the road to be constructed, but only a surveyed line over the general route thereof; (3) that the petition does not show over what land the proposed road will run. In this connection it may be stated that on the trial it was admitted by the appellant that the persons who signed the petition were freeholders within road-district No. 6. Section 2682 of the Political Code, which defines what must be the character of such a petition, is in this language: "Petition must set forth and describe particularly the road to be abandoned, discontinued, altered, or constructed; and, if the road is to be altered, laid out, or constructed, the general route thereof, over what lands, who the owners thereof are, whether such of them as can be found consent thereto, and, if not, the probable cost of the right of way where such consent is not had, the necessity for and the advantage of the proposed road." It will be perceived at a glance that the requirements for a proper petition under the statute does not include an allegation that the signing petitioners are 10 freeholders of the road-district, and taxable therein for road purposes, wherein the proposed road is to be constructed. This was something, therefore, which the board had the jurisdiction to determine as a fact, on the hearing of the matter, from the evidence before them, irrespective of the question as to what the petition may have averred. For this reason the first objection to the introduction of the petition is untenable. It is plain that the road-district was in Humboldt county, and that is a county in the state of California, of which judicial notice is taken. We think the petition sufficiently describes the road to be constructed, and over whose land it was to run.

An objection was made to the introduction in evidence of the bond which the statute requires to accompany the petition, (section 2683, Pol. Code,) that it was never approved by the board of supervisors. The order of the board recognizing the petition and bond as being such as is required by law, and ordering viewers to be appointed, is sufficient evidence of an approval of the bond.

It was also objected to the introduction in evidence of the order last named that the board did not possess the power to act on the petition before determining the fact that it was signed by 10 freeholders of the road-district taxable therein for road purposes; and that the order was void because neither it, nor any of the other proceedings of the board, show that one of the viewers was a surveyor, and because it is not anywhere shown that the viewers were disinterested citizens, but not petitioners. These objections were overruled, and an exception taken. It is undoubtedly true that the board, in order to acquire the right to cause a view and survey of a proposed public road, must first be satisfied that the petition is presented and signed by at least 10 freeholders of the road-district, taxable therein for road purposes, in which the road is to be constructed, and that a valid order for such view and survey must include in the number of viewers a surveyor, and that all such viewers must be disinterested citizens of the county, and not petitioners. But does it follow, in the absence of affirmative proof to the contrary, that all these matters were not rightfully determined by the board of supervisors when they made the order appointing the viewers? Is not their order in the premises conclusive upon the matter, unless the contrary appears by the record? It has been held that the board of supervisors, in determining matters of this kind, exercise judicial functions. Damrell v. San Joaquin Co., 40 Cal. 158. "An inferior board may determine conclusively its own jurisdiction or power by adjudicating the existence of facts upon the existence of which its jurisdiction or power depends." In re Grove St., 61 Cal. 453. In Tehama Co. v. Bryan, 68 Cal. 57, 8 Pac. Rep. 673, and Butte Co. v. Boydston, 11 Pac. Rep. 781, it seems to have been settled as to those matters of fact which the board of supervisors have jurisdiction to determine that their judgment is final and conclusive. Hence we perceive no error in allowing the order of the board appointing the viewers from being introduced in evidence. Besides, upon the point that no surveyor was appointed among the viewers, it affirmatively appears from the record that one was appointed.

It is next objected that the viewers' report was inadmissible upon various grounds, which we will examine. The viewers did notify the defendant of the proposed road, and he was present when the survey was made, and the statute (section 2685, Pol. Code) does not require that notice to be in writing. In section 2686 of the Political Code, which specifies the particular matters which their report shall contain, we do not perceive that the viewers are required to state as a fact that they have ascertained the necessity for the road, or that the same should be opened. Therefore the fact that the report did not contain a finding upon those matters did not deprive the board of supervisors of the power to adjudicate in the premises. Tehama Co. v. Bryan, supra.

Taking the report of the viewers, and the map of the survey which is returned, and the petition, which is made a part of the report, it is easy to determine with certainty the termini and description of the road. There is nothing in the law which requires the survey to appear upon the records of the board; hence the objection taken to its introduction in evidence was untenable. The statute (Pol. Code, § 2685) does not require that the defendant shall have notice in writing of the view; and in this case it appears, as before stated, that he was notified personally, and was present.

The order approving the report of the viewers is claimed to be void, and objected to as evidence, on grounds now to be considered. The defendant, the only complaining party in the court below and here, although present when the order was made, and represented by counsel, made no offer of any evidence against the new road, and therefore the board of supervisors, on such information as was afforded them by the report of the viewers under oath, and papers attached to their report, acted upon matters of fact within their jurisdiction to determine. The sufficiency of that evidence was concluded by the judgment, which cannot be assailed collaterally. In re Grove St., supra.

The order of the board of supervisors which approved the report of the viewers was not void, for the reason, as alleged, that it included a declaration that the road should be 60 feet wide. The petition, a part of the report, and the survey show the necessary description of the road and that it was 60 feet wide. Section 2681 of the Political Code declares that public highways of the kind here involved shall be at least 40 feet wide. Hence the board in this instance, if it had the power, as it had, to approve the report of the viewers, had the discretion to make the road 60 feet wide.

We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

WUNDERLIN v. CADOGAN. (No. 9,928.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1888.)

1. TRIAL—AUTHORITY TO SET ASIDE FINDINGS—NOTICE TO PARTIES.

A court has no authority to set aside findings filed, and substitute others, without notice to the parties, on the ground that such findings "were made under a misapprehension." The remedy for erroneous findings, unless the error is a mere misprision, is by motion for new trial.

2. SAME—FAILURE OF DEFENDANT TO APPEAR.

That a defendant did not appear at the trial will not justify setting aside findings filed in the case, and substituting others, without notice to such defendant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

W. B. Tyler, for appellant. Matt. I. Sullivan, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This is an appeal from an order setting aside certain findings, and a judgment which had been entered thereon. It appears that the case was tried, and findings signed and filed. Upon the facts stated in these findings, all of the defendants were entitled to judgment. Subsequently, and upon the consent of certain of the defendants, but without notice to the others, the court set aside the findings first filed, and substituted others in their place. This second set of findings contained the following: "The clerk of said court will not enter judgment upon the original findings herein, filed July 31st, as the same were made under a misapprehension." Judgment was entered upon the last set of findings, in favor of the defendants who consented to the change of the findings, and against those who were not notified of said change. These latter, after the lapse of more than a year from the entry of the judgment, moved, upon notice, to have the judgment and the second set of findings set aside. This motion was granted, and the appeal is from the order granting the motion.

It is to be observed that what the court did in the first instance was not merely to supply an omission in the findings first filed, or change the direction for judgment, but was to substitute one set of findings of fact for another. This we are inclined to think the court had no power to do. Even under the system of implied findings, where there was an express provision of statute for the supplying of omissions in findings upon exceptions taken, it was held that it was not proper to substitute one finding of fact for another. Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 304, 305; Cowing v. Rogers, 34 Cal. 652; Prince v. Lynch, 38 Cal. 531. And a fortiori would this seem to be so under the present system of findings, where there is no such provision of statute. The remedy for erroneous findings of fact is by motion for new trial; and the relief to be given upon such motion is the awarding of a new trial, to be had in regular course. It is not proper for the court, upon a motion of that kind, to immediately render a contrary decision. Mitchell v. Hackett, 14 Cal. 661. These rules rest upon the theory that the modes in which a decision may be reviewed are prescribed by statute, and that the court has no power to substitute other modes in their place. The rules, however, do not prevent the court from correcting mere misprisions, and orders improvidently and unintentionally entered. That a given order is of that unusual character is not to be presumed, but must be affirmatively shown. It will be observed, in this connection, that the second set of findings state that the first set were made "under a misapprehension." It does not clearly appear what the misapprehension consisted in, or whether it was not a mere misapprehension of the effect of evidence, and therefore it is a close question whether the case falls within the rule, or the exception above stated. It is not necessary to determine this question, however; for, if it be assumed that the court had power to set aside the findings as improvidently and unintentionally made, the defendants had a right to be heard upon the question. And the court had no power to proceed to annul the findings in their favor without notice to them. See, generally, Greehn v. Marker, 67 Cal. 365, 7 Pac. Rep. 783.

The fact that these defendants did not appear at the trial does not excuse the want of notice above referred to. As is well said by the learned judge of the court below: "The absence of defendant and his legal representatives from the trial does not entitle the plaintiff to take judgment against him as by default. Notwithstanding the failure of defendant to appear at the trial, if his answer contained a denial of any material allegation of the complaint, the plaintiff must make proof of that allegation by at least prima facie evidence. The defendant in such cases has a right to have the court pass upon the value of the evidence so offered; and if, in the opinion of the court, it does not amount to prima facie evidence of the truth of the controverted allegations, the defendant, although absent, would be entitled to have judgment entered in his favor. Such a judgment would undoubtedly be a judgment rendered in due course of law, and its force and effect would be as full and complete as if the defendant had been present at the trial in person and by counsel." The court therefore had no power to set aside the findings without notice to the parties interested; and its subsequent action was proper. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.: FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

WHITE v. SPRECKELS. (No. 9,921.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1883.)

1. BOUNDARIES—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF.

On the trial of an issue as to the ownership of a tract of land lying between a line of stakes claimed by plaintiff as the boundary line, and a fence built by defendant and claimed by him as such line, it appeared that defendant had at one time recognized such line of stakes as the true line. It also appeared, from a diagram attached to a patent under which plaintiff claimed, and from the testimony of the county surveyor, that the line of stakes was the correct boundary line. Held, that a finding that plaintiff was the owner of such tract was justified by the evidence, though it appeared that a former owner, when applied to on the subject of the division fence, had told his agent to let defendant "build the fence wherever he desired to build it."

2. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF INCOMPETENT EVIDENCE.

Where incompetent evidence of a fact is admitted, such fact being fully proved by other competent evidence, the admission of such evidence is harmless error.

3. SAME—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF IMPROPER EVIDENCE—WHEN NOT ERROR.

Where improper evidence is admitted against objection, the grounds of such objection not being apparent at the time, and only appearing afterwards by the testimony of other witnesses, the admission of such evidence is not error.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. LOGAN, Judge.

Ejectment brought by Edward White against Claus Spreckels. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellants. Julius Lee, for respondent.

SEARLS, J. This is an action of ejectment to recover a strip of land about two and one-eighth miles in length, and of about one hundred feet in width, as well as a certain other piece of land containing about four acres. Plaintiff had judgment for restitution, and for $86.62, the value of the use and occupation of the premises, and for costs. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff is the owner of the Calabasas rancho and defendant is the owner of the Aptos rancho, which lies west of and adjoins the former. The question involved relates to the division line between the two ranches. It seems that in 1875 William H. Patterson, who then owned the Calabasas rancho, and defendant, built a division fence, which plaintiff contends wrongfully included the strip of land in question. At the trial, plaintiff introduced in evidence a patent from the United States to the heirs of Felipe Hernandez for the tract of land known as the "Calabasas rancho," bearing date December 8, A. D. 1868; and it was then stipulated in open court that on the 3d day of December, A. D. 1872, William H. Patterson had become vested with the title to all of the land embraced in said patent. The plaintiff then offered in evidence a deed of conveyance of the land described in said patent from William H. Patterson to A. B. Patrick, bearing date August 8, A. D. 1879, and a deed thereof from A. B. Patrick to the plaintiff, bearing date November 1, 1882. It is also shown that the said Calabasas rancho has for its western boundary the eastern boundary of the Aptos rancho, and for its southern boundary the northern boundary of the San Andreas rancho. Accompanying the patent aforesaid, and as a part thereof, is a map of said Calabasas rancho, of which a copy is set out in the transcript. Plaintiff then called as a witness J. J. Lewis, who testified as follows: "I am a surveyor by profession and occupation. About a year ago I examined the premises, and made a map of the Calabasas rancho, including the premises in controversy. I had before me at the time, and copied, the map of said rancho, which is a part of the patent just given in evidence." This map made by the witness was then put in evidence by the plaintiff, and marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit 3," and is set out in the transcript. The witness then testified further as follows: "I found a fence at the westerly portion of said rancho, indicated on said map by the dotted black line. The westerly line of the rancho is inlicated on the map by the solid black line. I found the southerly end of said fence by running south, 62 deg. west, 7.13 chains from post marked 'S. A. No. 2.' Said post S. A. No. 2 was a surveyor's post, that is, a large, square, redwood post, firmly set in the ground, with surveyor's marks upon it. It had apparently been there a long time,—five, ten, or more years. I also found a fence running across the corner of the Calabasas ranch from said post S. A. No. 2, as indicated in said map. This fence cut off, in a triangular shape, about 2.6 acres, upon which was a large, valuable spring of water. The plaintiff showed me this post, and pointed it out as a corner of the Calabasas ranch." Defendant's counsel objected to this statement of what the plaintiff had said or pointed out to the witness as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and asked to have the same stricken from the record. The court overruled the objection, and denied the motion, to which ruling the defendant then and there excepted. This ruling is assigned as error.

Post S. A. No. 2 is delineated and its position given upon the map, which is a part of the patent; and its position, whether in existence or not, is capable of being determined by actual survey. The witness found the post upon the ground, marked as in the map specified. The fact that the plaintiff showed him the post, and pointed it out as a corner of the Calabasas ranch, did not militate against it as a physical fact; and the further fact that plaintiff said that it was a corner, etc., was only in corroboration of what was shown by the map accompanying the patent already in evidence. There was also evidence tending to show that post S. A. No. 2 has stood in its present position for at least 10 years. The post in question is not upon the disputed line between plaintiff and defendant, which is designated by post three and four, but, as it turned out later from the testimony of another witness, is a stake on the line dividing plaintiff's ranch from the San Andreas ranch, which lies south of it. The true position of stake No. 2 is fixed by the testimony of Thomas W. Wright, the county surveyor, who explains how he took the calls from the map, and measured the distance from the government section corner, and found the stake S. A. No. 3, etc. It is true, Lewis found the same stake by measuring from stake No. 2, just as he should have done if the latter was in its correct position, but whether it was so or not was not an established fact, except as shown by the result, coupled with the testimony of other witnesses. All of these facts appeared from his cross-examination, and formed a basis upon which a motion to strike out his testimony might have been properly based; but, as these facts were not patent when the objection to his testimony was made, there was no error in the ruling of the court.

Defendant holds under a patent for the Aptos rancho from the United States to Rafael Castro, dated April 3, 1860, by virtue of a deed from said Castro dated July 6, 1872. The Aptos ranch lies west of and is bounded on the east by the Calabasas rancho, as before stated. The next contention of appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to show that the land sued for was any part of the Calabasas ranch. The evidence tending to support the finding of the court is: (1) That there was a line of stakes, say 20 in all, along what plaintiff claims to be the true line of demarkation of the two ranches, which are shown to be some 80 feet west of and parallel with an old fence. (2) That, when Spreckels and Patterson were about to have a line fence constructed between them, Parker, who was about to build it, applied to Spreckels about making the fence, and the latter "pointed up the valley, and said I would find the surveyor's stakes up the valley, a little this side of an old fence" that was there at that time. This old fence, the witness says, "was about 80 feet east of the survey line that Spreckels pointed me to;" that subsequently Spreckels objected to the new fence being placed on the line of stakes; and that it was built upon the line of the old fence, and about 80 feet from the line of stakes. (3) The witness J. J. Lewis shows by diagram, (Exhibit No. 3,) which he says is a copy of the map found in the patent under which plaintiff holds, the western boundary of the ranch of plaintiff, and that the fence is east of such boundary, and runs substantially parallel therewith; being 1.23 chains east therefrom at the south end, and 1.37 chains east from such western boundary at the north end. (4) The testimony of Thomas W. Wright, the county surveyor, is to the effect that he ran the line of the Calabasas ranch twice, as far as the country road, once for Castro, and once for defendant. He says it is a section line. He says he took the calls from the map, and set the stake No. 3 for the south-west corner. A reference to the map shows stake No. 3 to be at the south-west corner, and upon the west line as claimed by plaintiff, and upon the section line. The strip of land between this west line and the fence constitutes one of the subjects of the controversy. There was no evidence whatever to contradict that referred to, and we think the court was fully justified in finding as it did, in effect, that the patented west line of the Calabasas ranch was at the line of the stakes spoken of. The patent was in evidence, and, although not set out in the record, must have furnished data from which to demonstrate the error, if any, in plaintiff's claim under it.

The testimony of defendant at the trial, after proving title in himself to the Aptos rancho, was confined to showing that in 1875 a fence was built upon the east line of the disputed land, which it is claimed was with the agreement and understanding that it should be so built, and constitute the boundary of their respective tracts of land, and that defendant then entered into possession of and has since as of right retained possession up to such fence. The finding of the court is against this theory, and we see nothing in the testimony to warrant such theories.

Patterson, who then owned the Calabasas ranch, when applied to on the subject of the division fence, told his agent, Ford, "to let Spreckels build the fence wherever he desired to build it." It further appears that it was, at the request of Spreckels, placed upon the line of the old fence, as far as that extended, and continued on the produced line of such old fence north. Where coterminal proprietors of land in good faith agree upon, fix, and establish a boundary line between their respective tracts of land, in which they acquiesce, and under which they occupy, for a period equal to that fixed by the statute of limitations, the line as thus established is binding upon them, and those holding under them, or either of them. Cooper v. Vierra, 59 Cal. 282; Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 619; Moyle v. Connolly, 50 Cal. 295; Columbét v. Pacheco, 48 Cal. 395. Agreements of this character are not subject to the objection that they are within the statute of frauds, because they are not considered as extending to the title. They do not operate as a conveyance so as to pass title from one to the other, but proceed upon the theory that the true line of separation is in dispute, and to some extent unknown, and in such cases the agreement serves to fix the line to which the title of each extends. Tyler, Bound. 254. What are boundaries is a matter of law; but where they are, is a matter of fact. Bolton v. Lann, 16 Tex. 96. In the case at bar the evidence failed to show that the site of the fence was fixed and agreed upon as the boundary line between the two tracts of land. Patterson seems to have been quite willing that Spreckels should place the fence where he chose, without reference to the true boundary, and his conduct is wanting in the essential element of an intent and willingness to establish a certain and definite line between his property and that of defendant. We do not find any direct evidence showing that defendant ever occupied the disputed land, or that it was by him so inclosed as to raise a constructive possession. Under such circumstances, we are not warranted in disturbing the findings of the court below. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HUNT v. STEESE et al. (No. 11,664.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1888.)

1. INJUNCTION—To RESTRAIN TRESPASS PENDING EJECTMENT—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

Plaintiff in ejectment averred that he held certain lands for agricultural purposes, under a patent excepting from the grant any mineral land which might be found on the tract; that defendants were mining on the land; also that they were insolvent, and were doing irreparable injury. Defendants, without denying plaintiff's averments, maintained that the land was known to be mineral land at the date of the patent, and therefore plaintiff had no title; and that they had filed a location thereon, and complied with the mining laws. Held, that defendants, not having proved with reasonable certainty that plaintiff's title was not good by showing that the land at the date of the patent was more valuable for mining than for agricultural purposes, and was known to be so at that time, an injunction against defendant should issue pending a trial on the merits.

2. APPEAL—PRACTICE—NOTICE—ORDER REFUSING INJUNCTION.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 951, providing that on appeal from an order, except an order granting or refusing a new trial, the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the notice of appeal, of the order appealed from, and of papers used in the hearing below, on appeal from an order refusing an injunction, the particulars in which the evidence is considered insufficient need not be set out in a bill of exceptions.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; PHILLIP W. KEYSER, Judge.

This was an action of ejectment for certain lands in Yuba county. Plaintiff, Francis Hunt, moved for an injunction pendente lite restraining the de-defendants, B. F. Steese and others, from doing certain acts to the destruction of the inheritance. The court granted a temporary restraining order, but, on the hearing of the motion, refused to grant an injunction, and dissolved the temporary restraining order. From this order plaintiff appeals. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 951, provides: "On appeal * * * from an order, except an order granting or refusing a new trial, the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the notice of appeal, of the * * * order appealed from, and of papers used on the hearing in the court below."

Forbes & Dinsmore, (W. C. Belcher, of counsel,) for appellant. J. H. Craddock, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. Plaintiff moved for an injunction pendente lite, restraining the defendants from washing away the soil for mining purposes. The court granted a temporary restraining order, but on the hearing of the motion refused to grant an injunction, and the order first made was revoked. On the hearing plaintiff introduced his verified complaint and a patent for certain lands, including the lands in controversy from the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, issued under a grant to that company by act of congress passed July 1, 1862, and the amendment thereto of July 2, 1864. This patent is dated February, 1875, and contains after the granting clause the following provision: "Yet excluding and excepting from the transfer by these presents all mineral lands, should any be found to exist in the tracts described in the foregoing." Plaintiff also introduced in evidence a deed from the Central Pacific Railroad Company to himself dated June 5, 1883, conveying the lands in controversy. This deed contains, after the description, these words: "Reserving, however, all claim of the United States to the same as mineral land." It was shown by the plaintiff that he went into possession of the lands granted in 1877, and had used the lands for grazing purposes. In the winter of 1883-84 the land was inclosed by plaintiff with a fence. He testified that the defendants had deprived him of the use of the land since the fall of 1884; that the defendants were mining and digging up and washing away good soil without authority. It was shown on behalf of the defendants that they had filed a notice of location under the Revised Statutes of the United States, and had complied with the local mining laws and regulations; that they had entered upon the land for mining purposes under their claim of right. They were permitted, against the plaintiff's objection, to introduce parol testimony to show that the land was mineral land, and the court found "that at the time the patent of the United States issued to the plaintiff's grantor, the land in controversy was known, and had been for several years prior thereto, to be valuable for minerals. That being the fact, no title to said land passed by said patent to plaintiff's grantor, and of course none passed to plaintiff from the deed from said company." The court denied the application for an injunction upon the ground stated. The complaint alleged in substance that the plaintiff was the owner of the land; that the defendants were trespassing on his possession, washing away the soil and removing gold therefrom; that they were insolvent, and threatened and intended to continue their trespasses; that the land is valuable for agricultural and grazing purposes; that defendants are "stripping away from its natural places of deposit the alluvium deposits of the soil, plowing up the soil, and scraping and piling it up to make reservoirs on the land, and digging ditches on the land to carry water to wash the soil therefrom." The defendants filed no answer, but introduced affidavits and the testimony of witnesses showing that the land was valuable for mining purposes at the time of the issuance of the patent; that it had been profitably worked for gold, and was well known to be mineral in character. They did not deny that they were washing away the soil for gold, or that they were insolvent, or that they intended to continue their mining operations, or that the injury was irreparable.

We think that the injunction should have been granted. It is unnecessary for us to determine on this appeal whether we shall adhere to the rule of decision that a patent may be collaterally attacked under such circumstances. In all cases of this kind an injunction should be granted pending the determination of the issue as to ownership, unless it appear that the plaintiff's title is bad, or at least that there is no reasonable ground for the assertion of title by the plaintiff. The mere existence of a doubt as to the title does not of itself constitute a sufficient ground for refusing an injunction. Kerr Inj. (2d Amer. Ed.) 13; Hess v. Winder, 34 Cal. 270. "It is the common practice at this day for the court to issue injunctions where the title is in dispute. * * * The jurisdiction of the court in these cases is asserted for the preservation of the property pending proceedings at law for the determination of the title of the parties." Le Roy v. Wright, 4 Sawy. 535. "The injuries which are the subject of the complaint are of a character calculated to destroy the entire value of the land for all useful purposes. Those which consist in excavating ditches and digging up the soil are irreparable in the sense that the former condition of the property could not probably be restored without an expenditure exceeding the original value of the land. * * * A denial of the preventive remedy by injunction in such case would be tantamount to a denial of all protection." Henshaw v. Clark, 14 Cal. 465. Not only should there be an answer to the merits, but it should be made reasonably certain by the pleadings and the affidavits, that the attack upon the patent will be ultimately successful, or the injunction should be granted. Such is not the case here. It is not sufficient to show that the land had been profitably worked for gold prior to the issuance of the patent. It should clearly appear that the lands were at the date of the grant more valuable for mining than for agriculture, and were known to be such; that they were more valuable under the conditions existing at the time of sale for mining than for agricultural purposes. Iron Co. v. U. S., 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 131.

In the case at bar the plaintiff's patent made for him a prima facie case as to title, and the most that is shown by the defendants is that the land is now, and was prior to the issuance of the patent, valuable for mining purposes when water could be had to work it. It was shown that from 1864 until after the patent had been issued no mining of any importance had been done for want of water. One witness for the defendant testified that "after 1864 there was no water there to work with, except from rains, and it took very heavy rains to accumulate water sufficient to amount to anything." That water has since been secured for the purpose of working the land cannot be taken into consideration in determining the rights of the parties. Present contingencies or probabilities have no bearing upon the question. U. S. v. Reed, 28 Fed. Rep. 486. The issue is confined to the time when the lands were sold and patented by the government. "It is quite possible that land settled upon as suitable only for agricultural purposes entered by the settler and patented by the government under the pre-emption laws, may be found years after the patent has been issued to contain valuable minerals. Indeed, this has often happened. We, therefore, use the term known to be valuable at the time of sale to prevent any doubt being cast upon titles to lands afterwards found to be different in their mineral character from what was supposed when the entry of them was made, and the patent issued." Deffeback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 404, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95. If, on account of the absence of water, and sources of water, the lands in controversy were not more valuable for mining purposes than for agricultural purposes at the time of the sale, we think that the same principle should be applied, and the fact that other sources of water supply have been discovered or become accessible and can now be used in the profitable working of the mines, should not operate to the prejudice of the plaintiff, whose rights to the land were determined upon the conditions existing at the time of the sale. If it were otherwise, "the proprietor would never be secure in his possessions, and without security there would be little development, for the incentive to improvement would be wanting. What value would there be to a title in one man with a right of invasion in the whole world," upon a subsequent change in the conditions, contingencies or probabilities? Boggs v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 380. But however that may be, unless, under such circumstances as we find here, it be held that the plaintiff under his patent is entitled to an injunction until the question of the character of the land is determined in the action, "the spoliation of landed estates under the pretense of mining without possibility of protection or redress on the part of the owner" will follow.

This appeal is from an order revoking the temporary restraining order and refusing an injunction; it is unnecessary, therefore, to specify in the bill of exceptions the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient. The court is not required to file findings in a matter of this kind. Motions for injunction are regularly heard upon complaint, answer, and affidavits, and and no bill of exceptions is necessary unless it be to identify the papers used on the hearing. The appeal is heard upon the papers used on the hearing in the court below. Code Civil Proc. § 951. The testimony of witnesses, which we find in the record, we treat as written affidavits, identified by the judge, and as such to be considered by this court in the same manner as if in the form of affidavits.

It follows from the views expressed above that the order refusing to grant an injunction should be reversed, and the court below be directed to issue the injunction asked for by the plaintiff until the final hearing, when the propriety of either dissolving it or of rendering it perpetual will be determined according to the merits of the case. Ordered accordingly.

In re Cook's ESTATE. (No. 12,200.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1888.)

1. DIVORCE—ORDER FOR DECREE—FAILURE TO ENTER DECREE.

An order that a decree of divorce be entered is not such final decree as to divorce the parties, and render a subsequent marriage of one of them a legal marriage, where such decree was in fact never entered.

2. SAME—DEATH OF PARTY—ENTERING DECREE NUNC PRO TUNC.

Where an order for a decree of divorce was obtained, but the decree was never entered, such decree cannot, after the death of the party who obtained it, be entered nunc pro tunc; and thus render the divorce, and a subsequent marriage of deceased, valid as against the heirs of the defendant in the divorce proceedings.

MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Emma Cook, since deceased, obtained judgment for divorce against Theodore T. Cook. The decree, however, was not entered during her life-time. After her death, upon application of William W. Richards, who had subsequently married her, the court ordered judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc, which was accordingly done. Richards assigned all his interest in the estate of deceased to William E. Miller, he settling the estate. The court held that Theodore T. Cook was the surviving husband of the deceased, and from a decree of distribution issued accordingly, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, Miller prosecutes this appeal.

Henry C. McPike and James M. Searwell, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden, Eugene Deuprey, L. M. Hoefler, and Jas. G. Carson, for respondents.

THORNTON, J. Emma Cook was never divorced from Theodore T. Cook. A divorce is not granted until the final decree is entered, and in the case of Cook v. Cook there was no entry of a final decree. The order of the 23d of April, 1880, in Cook v. Cook, was a direction that a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony be entered, but it does not appear that this order was ever complied with. The attempt of the court on the 7th of September, 1885, to impart validity to the alleged marriage of Emma Cook with William W. Richards, after the 23d of April, 1880, by a nunc pro tunc decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony between Emma Cook and Theodore T. Cook, could not have any such effect. As there was no decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the Cooks on the 3d of May, 1880, when it is claimed a marriage was had between Emma Cook and William W. Richards, and no such decree was ever entered during the life-time of Emma Cook, after which a marriage was celebrated between Richards and Emma Cook, it cannot be held that there was ever a valid marriage between the parties last named. The nunc pro tunc decree was made long after the death of Emma Cook, which took place in November, 1883. She was not divorced at the time of her death, and we cannot perceive how, after that time, the relation of Emma Cook to Theodore T. Cook could be changed by any decree of the court. The court below did not err in holding Theodore T. Cook the husband of Emma Cook at the time of her death, and in ruling out the judgment roll in Cook v. Cook. This appeal is prosecuted by William E. Miller, as the assignee of William W. Richards of the share of Emma Cook's estate claimed by Richards as her husband, and, as it appears that Richards was never the husband of the decedent, the appellant, Miller, can have no interest in any other question presented on this appeal.

We find no errors in the record, and the decree and order must be affirmed. So ordered.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

McKINSTRY, J. I concur in the judgment. I express no opinion, however, as to what would have been the effect of a judgment dissolving the marriage between Emma Cook and Theodore T. Cook, had the same been entered in the life-time of the former.

I dissent: McFARLAND, J.

CRYSTAL LAKE ICE CO. v. McCAULAY. (No. 11,341.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1888.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

An order denying a new trial, asked on the grounds of insufficiency of evidence and of newly-discovered evidence, will not be disturbed where there is a substantial conflict in the testimony, nor where the new evidence presents substantially no new facts, and is merely cumulative.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

H. A. Powell, for appellant. Van Ness & Roach, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to recover the value of ice alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant has appealed. No exceptions were taken at the trial, and no errors of law were assigned. The new trial was asked on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and the further ground of newly-discovered evidence. It is admitted for the appellant that there was some evidence to support the findings, but it is claimed that a clear preponderance of it was against them. After carefully going over the record, we are of the opinion that there was a substantial conflict in the testimony, and that the well-settled rule in such cases must be followed. In regard to the evidence alleged to be newly discovered, it is enough to say that it presents nothing new. It contradicts the plaintiff's testimony in some respects, and is merely cumulative. Besides, it was squarely contradicted by a counter-affidavit. Applications for new trial on this ground are addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and we are unable to see that that discretion was in any way abused. In our opinion, the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

BLASINGAME v. HOME INS. CO. et al. (No. 9,915.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1888.)

1. INSURANCE—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—ALLEGATIONS OF LOSS.

In an action on a fire insurance policy which excepts loss from certain causes, it is sufficient that the complaint alleges destruction by fire, without denying that it was caused in any of the excepted ways.

2. SAME—ALLEGING PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS—NOTICE OF LOSS.

In an action on a fire insurance policy, it is a sufficient allegation of notice of the loss, as required by the policy, when the complaint alleges that due proof of the loss was furnished the company, and that all the conditions of said policy were duly performed, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 457, providing that it is only necessary to state generally that the party has performed the conditions precedent in a contract.

3. SAME—ACTION BY MORTGAGEE—ALLEGATIONS OF LOSS.

In an action on a fire insurance policy by a mortgagee, the complaint alleged that R. was the owner at the time of the insurance and the fire, the value of the property at those times, and total destruction. Held a sufficient allegation of loss to the owner.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

In an action on a fire insurance policy, the complaint alleged that plaintiff held a mortgage on the property insured, and that by the policy, "a copy of which is made a part of the complaint," the loss was made payable to plaintiff, but this fact did not appear in the copy. Held that, no objection having been made by defendants in the court below, the point cannot be taken advantage of under a general demurrer when the question is raised for the first time in the appellate court.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by J. S. Blasingame against the Home Insurance Company of the city of New York, and the Phoenix Insurance Company of the city of Hartford, upon a fire insurance policy. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 457, provides that, "in pleading the performance of conditions precedent in a contract, it is not necessary to state the facts showing such performance, but it may be stated generally that the party duly performed all the conditions on his part."

P. D. Wiggington, for appellant. William Barber, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action upon a policy of insurance against fire executed by the two companies named as defendants. The defendants separately demurred to the complaint, upon the grounds—First, that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant, because no joint liability was shown; and, second, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrers upon both grounds, holding that there was a misjoinder, and that the complaint did not state sufficient facts, because it failed to allege that the loss did not occur from any of the excepted causes specified in the policy. The plaintiff was given 10 days to amend his complaint, but neglected to make any amendment, and thereupon judgment was entered dismissing the action.

It is now admitted by counsel for respondents, that the objection of misjoinder cannot be maintained. This admission was made necessary by the provision of the Code, to the effect that parties severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument may all or any of them be included in the same action, at the option of the plaintiff. Section 383, Code Civil Proc.; and see, also, Bernero v. Insurance Co., 65 Cal. 386, 4 Pac. Rep. 382.

It is, however, insisted that the complaint was bad on general demurrer for several reasons. And first, it is said that it was bad for the reason which the court below assigned in making its ruling. The ruling was rested upon the supposed authority of Ferrer v. Insurance Co., 47 Cal. 416. That was an action upon a policy of fire insurance, and one of the conditions specified in the policy was that the company should not be liable "for loss caused by the falling of any building insured, or containing property insured, by this policy, or by fire ensuing therefrom." The complaint alleged that the property insured was totally destroyed by fire, and also alleged that the loss was not caused "by the falling of any building," but omitted the words "or by fire ensuing therefrom." The complaint was demurred to specially upon the ground that it failed to state that the loss was not occasioned by one of the excepted causes specified in the policy. The court, after stating that the allegation was substantially sufficient to meet the objection, added: "The averment on this point is, perhaps, not as explicit as accurate pleading would have required, but we think it is sufficient, and no good could result from reversing the case on so slight a defect in a pleading, which could be amended on another trial." We do not think that case decides the point presented here; and, if it did, in our opinion it ought not to be followed. In the policy declared on in this case it is provided that the companies shall not be liable "for any loss or damage by fire caused by means of an invasion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, or military or usurped power; nor for any loss in buildings unprovided with good and substantial stone or brick chimneys, the absence of which has been the cause of the fire; nor in consequence of any neglect or deviation from the laws or regulations of police, where such exist; nor for any loss caused by the explosion of gunpowder, or any explosive substance." In the complaint it is alleged that all of the property insured was totally destroyed by fire, but it is not alleged that the loss did not occur in any of the excepted ways or from any of the excepted causes. In our opinion, the complaint was sufficient in the respect referred to. Every complaint must contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language, but it is not necessary to insert in it allegations for the purpose of meeting or cutting off a defense. Thus one seeking to recover on an insurance policy must aver the loss, and show that it occurred by reason of a peril insured against, but he need not aver the performance of conditions subsequent, nor negative prohibited acts, nor deny that the loss occurred from the excepted risks. Lounsbury v. Insurance Co., 8 Conn. 466; Hunt v. Insurance Co., 2 Duer. 481; May, Ins. p. 891, § 587; 1 Estee, Pl. & Pr. (Pom. Ed.) § 740, and cases cited.

It is further claimed that the complaint states no cause of action in favor of the plaintiff, and for that reason the demurrer was properly sustained. This objection is rested upon the following ground: In the complaint it is alleged that the policy was issued to one A. J. Rhodes upon a certain building and certain personal property owned by him, and that at the time of its issuance, and at the time of the fire, the plaintiff held a mortgage, executed by Rhodes, upon all of the property insured, to secure the payment of about $2,000, which sum of money was, at all the periods mentioned, wholly unpaid. It is also further alleged that in and by the policy, a copy of which is attached to and made a part of the complaint, the loss, if any, was made payable and is payable to the plaintiff. But, looking at the attached copy, there is nothing to show that the loss was thereby made payable to the plaintiff. It is therefore urged by counsel for respondent that the loss was in fact payable to Rhodes, and not to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff had consequently no interest in it or right to recover it; and that the averment that it was made payable to plaintiff is contradicted by the policy, and should be disregarded. In answer to this objection it is said by counsel for appellant, in the reply brief, that the original policy did contain the words: "Loss, if any, payable in United States gold coin to J. A. Blasingame;" and in support of this assertion a photographic copy of the policy is inserted in the brief showing those words to be a part of it. It is further said that the words "to J. A. Blasingame" were omitted from the copy attached to the complaint by inadvertence or mistake, but that the omission was never referred to in the court below, or called to the attention of appellant's counsel, until the point was made in the brief filed by respondent in this court. There can be no doubt that if the policy was made payable, in case of loss, to the plaintiff, he could sue on it in his own name. Motley v. Insurance Co., 29 Me. 337; Cone v. Insurance Co., 60 N. Y. 619; Hadley v. Insurance Co., 55 N. H. 110. But it was necessary for him to allege and prove that it was so made payable. Was the complaint sufficient, in this respect, when tested by a general demurrer? In Mendocino Co. v. Morris, 32 Cal. 145, the same point was raised, and decided against the views of respondent here. That was an action against the principal and his sureties on an official bond. It was alleged in the complaint that the bond was signed by all of the defendants, but a copy of the bond was attached to the complaint, and on that copy the name of the principal did not appear. A demurrer was interposed, and overruled in the court below. Of this, SAWYER, J., delivering the opinion of this court, said: "Upon the demurrer in the form adopted in this case the direct averment of the execution of the bond in the body of the complaint must prevail, as against the omission of the signature in the copy. It may be that there is a want of correspondence between the averment in the body of the complaint and the copy annexed; but, if so, the most that can be said is that the complaint is ambiguous in this respect, and this objection was not specified as a ground of the demurrer under any head. The grounds of the demurrer relied on were all particularly specified, and this was not one of them. The objection is raised for the first time in this court. The demurrer is not general that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in certain particulars. There was a good averment of the execution of the bond in the body of the complaint, and no objection appears to have been taken in the court below on the ground of want of correspondence between the bond set out and the averment, and we think the complaint good, at least after verdict. Had the objection been taken in the court below, the clerical omission of the signature of the principal in the copy, if it be one, might have been corrected." See, also, Frazer v. Barlow, 63 Cal. 71. It follows from the rule announced in the foregoing cases that the point now raised by the respondent here cannot be taken advantage of under a general demurrer.

It is also claimed by the respondent that the complaint was insufficient, because it did not allege that Rhodes sustained any damage by reason of the fire. But it did allege that Rhodes was the owner of the property insured at the time of the insurance and at the time of the fire, and its value at those times, and also that it was totally destroyed by the fire. These facts were fully stated, and from them the loss and damage must of necessity result. We think the complaint sufficient in this respect.

Finally, it is urged that the complaint was insufficient, because it did not allege that notice of the loss, in writing, was forthwith given to the general agent of the companies at San Francisco, as required by the policy. The complaint alleged that the fire occurred on the 9th of December, 1882, and that "on or about the 5th day of February, 1883, due proof of said loss by fire was presented and furnished to each of said corporations by this plaintiff and the said Rhodes, and that all the conditions of said policy of insurance were duly performed and kept by this plaintiff and the said Rhodes." We think this averment of the performance of the conditions precedent sufficient, under the provisions of section 457 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It results that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

HODGDON v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. et al. (No. 11,265.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1888.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—CONVEYANCE OF WARD'S REALTY BY GUARDIAN—VALIDITY—ACT MAY 20, 1861.

General railroad act, May 20, 1861, § 23, as amended April 27, 1863, authorizing guardians of infants to convey their ward's land to railroads if it is necessary for the purposes of the road, and requiring the examination and approval of the probate judge to such conveyance before the same shall become valid, is constitutional; and a guardian's deed, accompanied by the certificate of the probate judge that he has examined the deed and the sale, has found the land necessary for the purposes of the railroad, the consideration fair and equivalent, and the sale just and proper; and that he approves and confirms the same, is a sufficient compliance with the statute.

2. JUDGMENT—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN BY PROBATE COURT—COLLATERAL ATTACK. The judgment of a probate court, regular upon its face, appointing a guardian of an infant, cannot be attacked collaterally for fraud or other matter aliunde, in an action to quiet the title to the ward's land, which the guardian has sold.¹

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MCGUIRE, Judge.

Action in the nature of an action to quiet title brought by Alexander Lewis Hodgdon against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, Leland Stanford, C. P. Huntington, Moses Hopkins, administrator of the estate of Mark Hopkins, deceased, and Charles Crocker. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal.

McAllister & Bergin, for appellants. D. Wm. Douthitt, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Judgment in the lower court went for plaintiff, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial defendants appeal. Plaintiff avers in the complaint substantially, and the court finds, that in April, 1862, James H. Hodgdon died seized as owner in fee of certain land in the city and county of San Francisco, described in the complaint; that plaintiff was born in lawful wedlock on June 23, 1860, and was and is the sole child of said James H. Hodgdon, deceased; that said James H. Hodgdon, on October 12, 1859, made and published his last will, by which he devised and bequeathed all his property, including said land, to his wife, Sarah A. Hodgdon, (mother of plaintiff;) that in said will plaintiff was neither provided for, nor in any manner mentioned; that said Hodgdon, deceased, never at any time, nor in any manner, provided for plaintiff by any settlement; and that it in no way appears that such omission to provide for plaintiff in said will or otherwise was intentional. It is then further averred that plaintiff is the owner in fee of the undivided one-half of said land because he succeeded to the same as the sole child of said Hodgdon, deceased; that defendants claim an interest in said land adverse to plaintiff, and are in the actual and exclusive possession of the same; and that defendants have not any estate, right, or interest in or to plaintiff's undivided one-half interest therein. The prayer is that defendants be required to set forth the nature of their claims; that it be adjudged that they have no interest or estate in said undivided one-half; that plaintiff's title thereto is good and valid; and that he recover possession thereof. The court also found that administration of the estate of said James H. Hodgdon is still pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco; no decree of distribution having yet been made therein, and, so far as it appears, no adjudication of the rightful heirship of plaintiff having yet been made in said superior court sitting as a probate court.

Counsel for defendants, by objections to evidence, by a motion for nonsuit, and by other appropriate objections and motions, made, and urge, here several points which, under our views of the case, it will not be necessary for us to determine. It may not be out of the way, however, to notice one of these points; because, if well taken, it may be of great importance in other cases. There is no doubt that, under our present law, a recognized and undoubted heir may, generally, maintain an action concerning real property, although the administration of the estate be still in progress. But it is contended that, in the case of a will and a pretermitted heir, it is the peculiar and sole province of the probate court to construe the will; to determine if there was an intentional omission of the contesting heir; if there was any provision for or advancement to the after-born child; whether the share to be assigned to the pretermitted heir shall be taken from that part of the estate (if any) not disposed of by the will; what are the debts of the estate, and what, if any, property must be sold to pay them and the expense of the administration; what amount, if any, must be taken from all of the devisees and legatees in order to make up the proportionate share of the omitted heir, etc.; and that all these matters can be ascertained only by the probate court administering the estate of the deceased. It will be noticed that the statutes in force at the death of plaintiff's decedent provided that, in the case of a pretermitted child, the necessary facts being shown, "the share of such child shall be assigned as provided by law." Hitt. Gen. Laws, 7341 et seq. Assigned by whom? Can another court, in an independent action of ejectment or to quiet title, try all these questions, and by its findings and judgment "assign" to the pretermitted child the particular part of the estate which he claims in his complaint, while these matters are still undetermined in the probate court, where the estate is being administered? Will such a judgment bind the probate court, when it comes to construe the will, to assign the share, and to distribute the estate? We allude to these questions because they are interesting and important; but, as before remarked, we do not deem it necessary here to definitely determine them.

The main defendant in this case is the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a railroad corporation. Section 23 of the general railroad act of this state, approved May 20, 1861, and slightly amended April 27, 1863, (St. 1861, 607; St. 1863, 613,) is as follows: "Sec. 23. If it shall become necessary, for any of the purposes aforesaid, for such company to acquire any real estate, or any right, title, or interest therein, which is the property of any infant, idiot, or insane person, the guardian, executor, or administrator, as the case may be, may sell and convey the same to said company; but neither such sale nor conveyance shall be valid, for any purpose until the same shall have been approved by the judge of the proper probate court; and said judge is hereby authorized to examine such deeds and conveyances, and, if he shall deem the same just and proper, he shall approve the same, and thereupon such conveyances shall have the same force and effect, for the purposes in this section mentioned, as if the same had been executed by persons competent to convey lands in their own names. Such company may acquire any real estate or any right, title, interest, estate, or claim therein or thereto, necessary for the purposes of said company, as hereinbefore provided, by means of the special proceedings prescribed in this act."

For the purpose of showing that, under this provision of the law, the said railroad company, defendant here, had acquired the title of plaintiff to the property in suit, the defendants, after plaintiff had closed his case in chief, and motion for nonsuit had been denied, proved by the proper record evidence that in January, 1872, Joseph S. Paxson was duly appointed guardian of the person and estate of Alexander Lewis Hodgdon, a minor, (plaintiff herein,) by the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, Cal.; that letters of guardianship were issued to said Paxson from said court; and that he qualified and filed his bond, as required. The judgment of the court appointing said Paxson guardian was regular on its face, and the court had full jurisdiction to render it. Defendants then introduced a deed from said Alexander Lewis Hodgdon, (plaintiff herein,) by his said guardian, Joseph S. Paxson, executed immediately after his appointment as guardian, by which, for the consideration of $10,200, the property sued for in this action was conveyed to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, defendant herein, and proved that said $10,200 was paid at the time by said defendant to said guardian, Paxson. The deed was accompanied by the following certificate of the judge of said probate court: "This is to certify that I, MILTON H. MYRICK, judge of the probate court in and for the city and county of San Francisco and state of California, have examined the within deed, and the sale therein made of the lands described, and I do find that the said land is necessary for the purposes of said railroad company; that the consideration paid is fair and equivalent for said land; and that said sale is just and proper; and, as such probate judge, I do hereby approve the said sale and deed, and confirm the same in as full and ample manner and form as I may or could do under the law of the said state of California in relation to the premises. M. H. MYRICK, Probate Judge of the City and County of San Francisco, Cal." The deed was duly acknowledged by Paxson as guardian, and was recorded January 27, 1872.

After close of defendant's evidence the court allowed the plaintiff, in rebuttal, against the objections and exceptions of defendants properly made and taken, to introduce evidence tending to prove that the said judgment of said probate court appointing said Paxson guardian as aforesaid was procured by fraud, collusion, etc.; and upon said evidence the court found certain facts which it held to be fraudulent, and to vitiate and render invalid the said proceedings in the said probate court. The evidence and findings on this point were, mainly, that Paxson's statements in the petition to be appointed guardian that he was a friend of and was befriending the minor, and that he made the application at the request of his mother and step-father, were not true; that he did not account to plaintiff for the money which he received for the deed; that he procured himself to be appointed at the request of agents of said railroad company; that the acts of the agents of the railroad company in inducing him to be appointed operated as a fraud on plaintiff; that the probate court did not have proof of the value of the land, or its necessity for railroad purposes; that there was collusion between Paxson and the agents of the railroad company, and that for these and other similar reasons "the said petition and application for guardianship, and the proceedings connected therewith, were fraudulent from their inception, and that, by reason of said fraud, the said probate court did not acquire jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of the estate of said minor;" and "that Joseph S. Paxson never was the legal guardian of said minor, and that the deed aforesaid was absolutely void."

(In respect to this matter it may be fair to parties to remark that there appears in the evidence a written agreement made in 1871, between the mother and step-father of plaintiff, and one Howard, an agent of the railroad company, defendant, in which, after a recitation that the mother had conveyed to said Howard all her title to certain land in San Francisco, and that it was claimed that the plaintiff herein, then a minor, was seized of the residue of the title to said land, it was agreed by the said mother and step-father that the value of the interest of said plaintiff should be determined by two persons therein named, and that their valuation should be final and conclusive, and that certain proceedings should then be taken to convey the said interest of said plaintiff to said Howard, upon his payment of the sum fixed by said two persons, and that said persons did fix said valuation at $10,200, the sum afterwards paid by said defendant to said guardian of plaintiff.)

Whether or not the said evidence objected to, and the said findings of the court below, would constitute a sufficient ground for relief in an action brought directly for the purpose of setting aside the judgment of the probate court, with proper averments in the complaint and proper parties before the court, is a question not necessary to be here examined; for it is well settled that a judgment, regular on its face, and rendered by a court having full jurisdiction to render it, cannot be attacked collaterally on the ground of fraud, collusion, or other matter aliunde. The opposite rule would subject to the uncertain and insecure test of parol evidence those things to which the law attaches the utmost conclusiveness and stability,—judgments and judicial records. Joyce v. McAvoy, 31 Cal. 274; Breeze v. Ayres, 49 Cal. 208; Carpentier v. City of Oakland, 30 Cal. 439; Robb v. Robb, 6 Cal. 21; Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 177; Chase v. Christianson, 41 Cal. 253. And authorities other than those of this state to the point are numerous. And the appointment of a guardian by a probate court is a judgment to which the rule applies. Warner v. Wilson, 4 Cal. 313; In re Guardianship of Fegan, 45 Cal. 176; Herron v. Dater, 120 U. S. 464, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 620; Fitts v. Fitts, 21 Tex. 511. The rule applies to infants as well as to adults. Joyce v. McAvoy, supra. The admission of the evidence above-mentioned was therefore erroneous, and the said findings of what the court held to be fraud, and upon which the judgment was based, were immaterial, and insufficient to warrant the court in practically vacating the judgment of the probate court upon a collateral attack. Upon such a principle, any judgment could be disregarded upon a showing that the court which rendered it committed an error either of law or fact.

We think that the deed from Paxson to the said defendant, and its approval and confirmation by the probate judge, was a sufficient compliance with the statutory provision under which it was executed. That provision is distinct from the provision of another statute by which a guardian, in a certain prescribed way may sell property of his ward for his maintenance or education. The law under which this sale was made contemplated an entirely different purpose, namely, the furtherance of a public use. No particular form of conveyance or procedure was prescribed. The only limitation upon the sale is that it shall be approved and confirmed by the probate judge. The deed was in proper form to convey the estate, and the probate judge found that it was a case within the statute, and approved the sale. This we think was sufficient. Exendine v. Morris, 76 Mo. 416. And we have no doubt of the constitutionality of the statute.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: SEARLS, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; THORNTON, J.; MCKINSTRY, J.

HEILBRON et al. v. CENTERVILLE & K. I. D. Co. (No. 12,093.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 23, 1888.)

1. APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—FAILURE TO SPECIFY PARTICULARS.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 659, subd. 3, provides that, when the notice of motion for new trial designates as the ground the insufficiency of evidence, the statement shall specify the particulars in which it is alleged to be insufficient; and, when errors in law are designated, the statement shall specify the particular errors; and, if no such specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded. Held, that specifications that the court erred in finding that the diversion of water by defendant from K. river had not been made continuously, uninterruptedly or peaceably for five years prior to the filing of the complaint, and in not finding to the contrary thereof, and that the court erred in its findings of law that the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations, were insufficient, and must be disregarded.

2. SAME—RULING ON DEMURRER—NOT REVIEWABLE, WHEN.

A ruling on a demurrer will be reviewed only on an appeal from the judgment, and not on appeal from an order denying a new trial, especially when the statement in an appeal from such order does not specify the alleged error in such ruling, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 659, subd. 3.

3. SAME—NOT TAKEN WITHIN A YEAR—DISMISSAL.

An appeal from a judgment taken more than a year after entry thereof, will be dismissed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by August Heilbron, Adolph Heilbron, Simon Clayburgh, and S. C. Lillis, against the Centerville & Kingsbury Irrigation Ditch Company, to restrain defendant from diverting the waters of Kings river, and to recover damages for past diversions. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appealed.

W. D. Tupper, for appellants. Brown & Daggett, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The plaintiffs commenced this action to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from diverting the waters of Kings river, and to recover damages for past diversions. The defendant demurred to the complaint, and its demurrer was overruled. It then answered, and, among other things, set up the statute of limitations. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant moved for a new trial, and has appealed from the judgment and order denying its motion.

The judgment was entered on the 12th day of September, 1885, and the appeal was taken on the 1st day of March, 1887. As more than a year elapsed between the entry and the appeal, the appeal from the judgment cannot be considered, and must be dismissed.

It is claimed for the appellant that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The point is not well taken. The ruling on a demurrer is a matter to be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, and not on an appeal from an order denying a new trial. Besides, on an appeal from an order refusing to grant a new trial, only such errors can be considered as are specified in the statement, and this alleged error is not specified or referred to in the statement presented here. Section 659, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc.

It is further claimed that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, and that the findings of the court to the contrary were not justified by the evidence. This point cannot be maintained. At the conclusion of the evidence and rulings set out in the statement on motion for a new trial, the statement proceeds as follows: "And the defendant assigns and specifies the following as errors occurring at the trial," and then follows a statement of 21 instances in which it is alleged the court erred; and among them are these: "The court erred in finding in its findings of facts that the diversion of water by the defendant from Kings river had not been made continuously, uninterruptedly, or peaceably for a period of five years prior to the filing of plaintiff's complaint, and in not finding to the contrary thereof." "The court erred in its findings of law that the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations." The Code provides that "when the notice of the motion designates, as the ground of the motion, the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, the statement shall specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient. When the notice designates, as the ground of the motion, errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the moving party, the statement shall specify the particular errors upon which the party will rely. If no such specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded on the hearing of the motion." Section 659, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc. It is evident that the specifications above noted are quite insufficient to meet the requirements of the Code, and they must therefore be disregarded. Smith v. Christian, 47 Cal. 18; Shepherd v. Jones, 71 Cal. 223, 16 Pac. Rep. 711.

The other points in the case are fully met and answered by the decision, lately rendered, in Heilbron v. Canal Co., ante, 535, opinion filed March 29, 1888. The appeal from the judgment should be dismissed, and, on the authority of the last-named case, the order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

I concur: FOOTE, C.

HAYNE, C., took no part in this decision.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

HEILBRON et al. v. KINGS RIVER & F. C. Co. (No. 11,963.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 28, 1888.)

1. WATERS AND WATER-COURSES—DIVERSION—RIGHT TO MAINTAIN ACTION.

In an action for damages for diversion of the water of a stream, where the complaint alleges that plaintiffs are owners of the land from which the water has been diverted, and the findings are that they are not owners, but tenants in possession under a lease, the findings are not outside of the issue raised, as plaintiffs' possession gives to them the right to maintain the action.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—DIVERSION BY THIRD PARTIES.

In an action for diverting water from a stream running through plaintiffs' land, evidence is properly excluded of diversions by others besides defendant; it not appearing whether such diversions were lawful or with plaintiffs' consent.

3. SAME—ISSUES AND FINDINGS.

Where the complaint alleges that defendant diverted water from a stream, and a branch thereof flowing through plaintiffs' ranch, thereby causing the loss of their stock; and the answer alleges that the stream is navigable; that the water diverted was furnished them by another company, which had appropriated the same for more than five years before this action; that such appropriation reclaimed plaintiffs' land, which had been waste; that others besides defendant diverted the water, so that, had defendant not, the plaintiffs would still have been deprived of it; that defendant's rights are vested, and its use of the water reclaims a large area that would be otherwise desert, the material issues are covered by findings that plaintiffs are tenants in possession using the range for stock purposes, that the river flows through their land, and the branch is a natural water-course, and that plaintiffs have been damaged by defendant's diversion of water, and that the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitation.

4. SAME—ADVERSE USER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the issues of adverse and continuous diversion and use by defendant of water in a stream, relied upon by him as giving prescriptive title and right to the same, a finding that there was not such adverse or continuous use and diversion will not be disturbed.

5. SAME—DAMAGES.

Evidence that from 250 to 300 cattle, worth $30 per head, died by reason of diversion of water from a stream running through plaintiffs' land supports a finding of the amount of damages at $1,000.

6. BOUNDARIES—CALL FOR RIVER.

Under a description in a patent as follows: "Thence meandering down the right bank of Kings river,"—the river is properly considered one of the boundaries of the land.¹

7. PLEADING—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

A so-called cross-complaint containing nothing which is not already set out in the answer is demurrable, especially in an action of tort, where no affirmative relief can be granted.

8. SAME—AMENDMENT.

A refusal to allow an amendment on the ground that the matters of amendment are sufficiently pleaded in the original answer, the affidavit in support of the motion stating that the matters in the amendment are substantially the same as those in the original answer, being discretionary with the court below, will not be disturbed.

9. APPEAL—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The insufficiency of evidence to support a finding not being specified on the motion for a new trial, the facts stated therein cannot be controverted on appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

This was an action begun on the 4th day of October, 1882, by plaintiffs, August Heilbron, Adolph Heilbron, S. Clayburg, and S. C. Lillis, riparian owners, for injunction and damages for diversion of water from Kings river, in Fresno county, by the defendant corporation, the Kings River & Fresno Canal Company. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals.

The complaint in substance alleged that plaintiffs are, and their grantors for more than five years prior to the filing of the complaint had been, the owners and in possession of the Rancho Laguna de Tache, containing 48,000 acres of land, and that the plaintiffs are owners of a large amount of stock, and that said lands are used as a stock range, and are of great value for that purpose; that Kings river, from time immemorial, has flowed, and but for the wrongful acts of defendant would still continue to flow, through said lands; that there is a certain natural branch of said Kings river called "Cole Slough," which receives its supply of water from said Kings river; that the channel of Cole slough is located wholly within the boundaries of said lands, and from time immemorial has flowed through said lands; that defendant is a corporation, and that it constructed a ditch or canal leading out of the channel of Kings river at a point about 27 miles above the point at which said Cole slough receives its supply of water, and in September, 1881, without the consent of plaintiffs, constructed a large dam in the channel of said Kings river, and diverted and still diverts from the channel of said Kings river a large quantity of water, which, but for the wrongful acts of said defendant, would have flowed through plaintiffs' said lands and would have overflowed said lands, and increased their fertility, and furnished water for plaintiffs' stock; that the diversion has caused plaintiffs' lands to fail to produce their usual and accustomed crops of grass, and now deprives plaintiffs' cattle and live-stock of water to drink, and has caused plaintiffs loss and damage in the sum of $25,000; that the defendant threatens to continue to divert the water, and, unless restrained by a decree of the court, defendant will continue to divert the same to such an extent as to completely drain said channel, and finally change the course of said stream, and that compensation therefor cannot be adequately obtained in an action at law for damages, etc. The prayer is for a permanent injunction.

The answer in substance alleged that Kings river was a navigable stream; that the Centreville channel, from which defendant diverted water, was not a channel of the river except at flood times; that certain persons, having incorporated as the Centreville Canal & Irrigation Company, in 1868, and before that date, diverted the water from said stream, and their successor, the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company, continued so to do, and the latter company, by agreement, being granted full control and right of way in the said channel, in return furnished water to defendant through said channel; that all the water conducted into defendant's canals has been furnished by the said Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company; that in 1869 the incorporators of the defendant appropriated water, in 1870 posted notice of appropriation, and in 1871 incorporated, and continued to enlarge its ditch, and used and appropriated said water for more than five years before the commencement of this action under claim of title continuously and adversely. And the answer further alleged that said waters were unappropriated when so appropriated by defendant; that the water was devoted to useful purposes; that for 10 years prior to said appropriations, plaintiffs' lands were waste, and defendant and its grantors believed plaintiffs and their grantors claimed none of said waters. That divers persons and corporations besides defendant divert water from said river above plaintiffs' lands; that said Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company and defendant have so appropriated said waters, under the laws and customs of California and the United States, for irrigation, and, after supplying said canals, except at flood times, there is not enough to flow down to plaintiffs' lands; so, had defendant not diverted water, it would have flowed into said other canals; that plaintiffs' lands are swamp, and can be reclaimed by diverting said waters, and said diversions have prevented the overflow of parts of said lands. That the lands irrigated by said Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company and defendant are 24,000 acres, which without irrigation would be desert, but which, by irrigation, are worth $2,000,000, and are populous; that the existence of the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company and defendant, and of $1,500,000 of property, depend on the use of said water; that the defendant's rights to said water are vested and accrued under the act of congress of the 24th of July, 1866, and the local customs, laws, and decisions of the courts of said state, and that plaintiffs ought not to maintain their action. That plaintiffs and their grantors well knew of said diversions and outlays by defendant and its grantors, and their ignoring of plaintiffs' claims, and that defendant and its grantors believed their claims valid, yet made no objection thereto, whereby they acquiesced therein and are estopped, and, having so failed, plaintiffs' conduct is a fraud on defendant. That plaintiffs' pretended cause of action did not accrue within five years next before this action, and is barred by statute; nor within three years, and is barred by statute; that divers persons and canals have, at all the times, etc., diverted large quantities of the waters of said river below defendant's ditch, and above plaintiffs', in which plaintiffs have been interested; and, if defendant only had diverted, there would have been no appreciable diminution of the water except at low stages. The defendant filed, further, a cross-complaint, a demurrer to which was sustained; and the defendant thereupon moved for leave to file an amended answer, to support which motion an affidavit of defendant was produced, to the effect "that said amendments in nowise alter the lines of defense herein, nor can they in any manner surprise plaintiffs or work disadvantage to them, being almost, if not wholly, merely, as believed, better pleading of the same defenses already pleaded in the original answer." The motion for leave to amend the answer was denied.

Regarding the amount of the damages sustained by plaintiffs there was evidence to the effect that, through defendant's diverting water from Kings river, the plaintiffs' cattle were deprived of water, and from 250 to 300 died because of such diversion, and it was testified that they were worth $30 per head. The court found that plaintiffs sustained damages to the amount of $1,000. Regarding the ownership of the land it was found that in 1866 a patent had been issued to Manuel Castro, which, in the course of its description of the land, uses the following language: "Thence according to the true meridian, the variation of the magnetic needle being fifteen degrees forty-five minutes east, east at fifty links enters bottom land of the Kings river, twenty-six chains and thirty-eight links, to a post marked 'L. T.' and 'Sec. 36' station; thence meandering down the right bank of the Kings river, south, forty-five degrees, west, eighty-seven chains and sixty-eight links, to station." That the said Castro conveyed to one Jeremiah Clarke on the 10th day of August, 1866. That Clarke on the 1st day of May, 1889, leased the land to the plaintiffs, who have remained in possession ever since as tenants. The cause was tried by the court, a jury having been waived, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs. A new trial was denied, and defendant appeals, specifying a large number of errors.

H. S. Dixon, (Flournoy, Mhoon & Flournoy, of counsel,) for appellant.
Brown & Daggett, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Many of the questions involved in this appeal have recently been determined adversely to the contentions of appellant herein. It is therefore unnecessary to notice them further. Heilbron v. Canal Co., ante, 535, (filed March 29, 1888; Heilbron v. Last Chance W. Ditch Co., ante, 68; Heilbron v. Centreville & K. I. Ditch Co., ante, 932, (filed April 28, 1888.)

1. The defendant's motion for leave to file an amended answer was addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and it appears from the affidavit filed in support of the motion that the matters set out in the amended answer were not substantially different from those which had already been pleaded in the answer on file. The court denied the motion on the ground "that said matters of amendment are sufficiently pleaded in the original answer to the amended complaint." We think, therefore, that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow it to be filed. The defendant seems to have been given the benefit of all the matters alleged in his original answer and proposed amendments.

2. The demurrer to the cross-complaint, so called, was properly sustained. The cross-complaint contained nothing which had not already been set out in the answer filed. Furthermore, the action is one for tort, and no affirmative relief could be granted. MacDougall v. Maguire, 35 Cal. 274.

3. No specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, or sixth finding of fact are made in the statement on motion for a new trial. The facts therein stated, therefore, cannot be controverted.

4. The findings of the court upon the question of adverse use are against the defendant on every element necessary to a title by prescription, and are, we think, supported by the evidence. The question is not whether this court would, upon the same evidence, find the facts as they are found by the court below. It is sufficient to say that there is a substantial conflict. There is nothing to show that Clark or his tenants had knowledge or notice of the diversion of water through defendant's ditch. The most that can be said is that the evidence, taking into consideration all presumptions, is conflicting upon that question. Diversion of water by the defendants took place at a point nearly 30 miles above the lands of plaintiff's ranch, on the land of a riparian proprietor. It was not incumbent upon Clarke or his tenants to take notice of what was going on at that distance above their property to ascertain whether any one was diverting water from the channel of the river. There is evidence in the record tending to show that the diversion of water from Kings river was a matter of notoriety in the vicinity of plaintiffs' ranch prior to August, 1877, but it is confined to diversions made by other ditches than that of the defendant. There was also evidence tending to show that the diversion of water by the defendant had not been continuous and uninterrupted for five years before the commencement of this action. The court found such to be the fact. Upon this topic there was also a substantial conflict in the evidence.

5. The findings of the court are not outside of the issue upon the question of ownership. The plaintiffs are tenants, and not owners in fee; but they have the right to the exclusive possession and use of the property and all its appurtenances, and have the right to maintain an action for any injury which interferes with their possession, or the use and enjoyment of the property. In Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 436, 10 Pac. Rep. 674, it was said: "When water is diverted from land, an injury is done to the possession. Ordinarily, it is sufficient if the plaintiff shows that he has possession against a mere wrongdoer. * * * The plaintiff in such cases is not bound to prove the same title as he alleges, for the disturbance is the gist of the action."

6. We see no error in the construction given to the patent by the court below with respect to the boundary lines of the ranch. We think, under the description given in the patent, Kings river is one of the boundaries of the lands described in the complaint.

7. There was evidence to sustain the findings of the court with respect to the amount of damages sustained by plaintiffs. The court evidently believed, from the evidence before it, that the amount of water diverted by the defendant, if it had been permitted to flow in the channel of the river, would have furnished the plaintiffs' cattle with sufficient water to drink, and that plaintiffs' stock died by reason of the diversion of the water by defendant.

The court excluded evidence offered on behalf of defendant to show that other parties were diverting water at different points on the river above the ranch of the plaintiffs. In this we think the defendant was not prejudiced. It does not appear whether the diversions referred to were lawful or unlawful,—with or without the consent of the plaintiff. If the acts of the owners of other ditches were joined with the acts of the defendant, the defendant cannot shield itself with evidence of such other diversions.

8. We think that the findings cover all the material issues raised by the pleadings. The court found upon the questions of ownership of plaintiffs and their predecessors, their possession, and the use of the range for stock purposes; that Kings river flows through the lands; that Cole slough is a natural water-course, and a branch of Kings river; that plaintiffs have been damaged by the defendant's diversion of the waters therefrom; and that the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations. These are all the material matters in issue.

9. We see no errors in the rulings of the court in admitting or excluding evidence, which operate to the prejudice of defendant's substantial rights. Some of the rulings respecting the notoriety of the diversions, and the means of knowledge possessed by the plaintiffs, appear at first sight to have been erroneous; but an examination of all the testimony shows that they were made upon the ground that the evidence of notoriety and knowledge was incompetent because it did not relate to diversions made by the defendant, but to diversions of water from Kings river generally, and at a point many miles above the lands of the plaintiffs. The only purpose which could have been subserved by the evidence was to show that the defendant's diversion of water by means of its ditch was not clandestine. Judgment and order affirmed.

LEEKE v. HANCOCK. (No. 11,086.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1888.)

1. NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—ACCOMMODATION INDORSER—LIABILITY OF.

Where plaintiff, having received a note indorsed by defendant, indorsed it over, and subsequently paid it off, defendant is liable to him for the amount paid, though plaintiff had collateral security of the maker in his hands for money previously advanced, and knew, when he received the note, that defendant was an accommodation indorser for the maker.

2. ASSUMPSIT—COMMON COUNTS—WHEN FINDING ON FIRST COUNT IS SUFFICIENT.

In an action, under the Code, against an indorser of a note by a subsequent indorser, who has paid it off, he may declare against defendant in the common counts for money paid out and expended, etc., with a prayer indicating that they are in the alternative; and a finding and judgment for plaintiff upon the first count is a finding against him on the others, and must be affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by C. Leeke against C. H. Hancock for an amount paid by him upon two notes made by one Buckman, which had been previously indorsed by defendant. Buckman, who was a street contractor, had previously borrowed money of Leeke, for which he had assigned a street contract as collateral security. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

O'Brien & Morrison, for appellant. Nagle & Nagle, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. If the moneys paid by the plaintiff on taking up the notes made by Buckman were paid out of funds of the maker in the hands of plaintiff, the payments were in effect payments by the maker of the note. But there is at least a substantial conflict in the evidence with respect to the issue as to whether the plaintiff did pay the notes out of funds of the maker in his hands, or whether he promised to pay them out of funds of the maker dedicated to that purpose. As between themselves, the defendant was an accommodation indorser for Buckman, the maker. But there is nothing on the face of the notes to indicate that relation, and there is evidence that, as to plaintiff, it was understood that the defendant should be bound in the character in which he assumed to act. Even if the plaintiff, indorsee and subsequent indorser, knew that, as between themselves, the defendant indorsed the note for the accommodation of Buckman, he could still hold him as indorser if he consented to receive them only in case the defendant should bind himself to plaintiff as indorser. One of the two joint makers of a note may be a surety only, as between himself and his co-promisor, and yet, as to the payee, his apparent and real character be that of principal. Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340; Chase v. Evoy, 58 Cal. 353; People v. Marshall, 59 Cal. 387. Section 2832 of the Civil Code does not prohibit the apparent maker in such case from agreeing that he shall be bound as maker, and there is no principle which will render nugatory the actual and apparent contract of an indorser.

The complaint was upon the "common counts" for money paid, laid out, and expended, for money lent, and for money had and received; each count being separately stated. The prayer was for the sum alleged in each count to be due upon the cause of action therein stated, to-wit, $1,027.50. The court found that the plaintiff paid, laid out, and expended for the use and benefit of the defendant $1,027.50. The court failed to find upon the issues made by the averments of the other counts of the complaint, and the denials thereof. The finding and judgment upon the first count must be held to be a finding and judgment against the plaintiff upon the other counts. Clearly, in ordinary cases, there must be a distinct finding upon each material issue. But in a case like the present the prayer may be referred to as illustrating the scope of the action, and here the prayer clearly indicates that the counts are in the alternative; the same cause of action being stated in different forms. If such practice seems not to accord with the methods prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure, the apparent anomaly arises from the fact that the common counts have been allowed. But the right to rely upon them has been settled by the earlier decisions in this state, which, even if we were inclined to do so, we are not authorized to disregard. Freeborn v. Glazer, 10 Cal. 337; De Witt v. Porter, 13 Cal. 171; Buckingham v. Waters, 14 Cal. 146. Where a subsequent indorser has paid the whole note, or a part of it, he may recover from a prior indorser the amount paid as so much money paid, laid out, and expended. Butler v. Wright, 20 Johns. 367; Baker v. Martin, 3 Barb. 634; Pom. Smith, Merc. Law, § 327, note 3. Judgment and order affirmed.

BURNHAM v. SAN FRANCISCO FUSE MANUF'G CO. (No. 11,356.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1888.)

INJUNCTION—TO RESTRAIN SALE OF DELINQUENT STOCK—OFFER TO DO EQUITY.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain the sale of stock for delinquent assessments because notice has not been published 15 days before the day appointed for the sale, as required by Civil Code Cal. § 339, and is therefore irregular, unless the complaint contains an offer to pay the assessments.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Suit for an injunction. Charles F. Burnham, the plaintiff, was a stockholder in the San Francisco Fuse Manufacturing Company. On April 6, 1885, the company made an assessment on its capital stock, which assessment plaintiff failed to pay, and the company, on June 2d, ordered his stock to be sold on June 15th, and notice was first published on June 2d. 13 days prior to the day of sale. Civil Code Cal. § 339, requires the first publication of delinquent sales of stock to be at least 15 days prior to the day of sale. Section 346 reads: "No assessment is invalidated by a failure to make publication of the notice hereinbefore provided for, nor by the non-performance of any act required in order to enforce the payment of the same; but in case of any substantial error or omission in the course of proceedings for collection, all previous proceedings except the levying of the assessment are void, and publication must be begun anew." Plaintiff brought action against the company, praying an injunction to enjoin the sale because less than 15 days intervened between the first publication of notice and the day appointed for the sale; but the complaint contained no offer to pay the assessments. The court issued a restraining order, which was afterwards vacated and the action dismissed. Plaintiff appeals.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Jas. A. Waymire and W. T. Baggett, for respondent.

McKINSTRY, J. The order of the 2d of June, directing a sale of the delinquent stock of plaintiff, was irregular, and any sale upon 13 days' notice would have given to the purchaser no title which he could assert against the plaintiff, should the latter tender him the amount of the assessment, and bring his action to recover the stock within 6 months. Civil Code, § 347. But the assessment was valid, (Id. § 346,) and it was the duty of the plaintiff to pay it. A court of equity properly refused to entertain his application for an injunction to prohibit the sale in the absence of an allegation that he had done, or offered to do, equity. True, if he paid, there would be no sale, and he would not need the extraordinary writ; but the jurisdiction of equity does not depend upon the convenience of a party. The statutory remedy is plain, and it was intended by the legislature that this shall be the only remedy in case a valid assessment is not paid. It may be said the rule thus laid down will encourage sales without the notice which the statute declares to be necessary, and proceedings of the character which are declared to be void by section 346. But the context shows the sense in which the word "void" is employed. It is intended thereby to declare that the irregular proceedings shall be inoperative to confer an indefeasible title to the stock as against the owner, who shall make tender of the assessment, and bring suit for its recovery within the time prescribed in section 347. As the complaint did not state a cause of action, the suit was properly dismissed. Judgment and order affirmed.

BURNHAM v. SAN FRANCISCO FUSE MANUF'G CO. (No. 11,238.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1888.)

CORPORATIONS—MEMBERS AND STOCKHOLDERS—REMEDIES.

Where a stockholder of a company fails to pay an assessment lawfully made, and his stock is advertised for sale, a complaint setting forth that the company refused to show plaintiff its bills and vouchers, as required to do by Civil Code Cal. § 377, enacting that a corporation for profit shall keep a record of its transactions, which shall be open to inspection by stockholders, that it was a worthless concern, and desired to get plaintiff's stock for the assessment, shows no ground for the appointment of a receiver to wind up its affairs, or for the granting of an injunction to restrain the sale.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Charles F. Burnham, the plaintiff, was a stockholder of the San Francisco Fuse Manufacturing Company. An assessment on the capital stock of the company having been made, and plaintiff not having paid the assessment, his stock was advertised for sale, whereupon he brought suit for an injunction to restrain the sale, and for the appointment of a receiver. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Civil Code Cal. § 377, enacts that corporations for profit shall keep a record of all their transactions, which shall be open to the inspection of any director, member, stockholder, or creditor of the corporation.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Jas. A. Waymire and W. T. Baggett, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. The complaint avers that on the 6th day of April, 1885, the board of directors of the defendant passed an order whereby they levied an assessment, No. 10, of two dollars a share, on the capital stock of said corporation, payable, etc.; that the order contained a notice that "any stock upon which this (said) assessment shall remain unpaid on the 11th day of May, 1885, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, (and,) unless payment be made before, will be sold on Friday, the 29th day of May, 1885, to pay said delinquent assessment, together with the cost of advertising and the expenses of sale;" that on the 12th day of May, 1885, a delinquent list or notice was published by defendant in the Daily Examiner, a daily newspaper, etc., a copy whereof is annexed to the complaint; that, unless restrained, the defendant will, at the time and place mentioned in notice, sell the 100 shares alleged to belong to the plaintiff. So far as appears from the complaint, the order levying the assessment and the publication comply with the provisions of the Civil Code. In addition, however, to the prayer for a decree enjoining the sale, the plaintiff prays "that a receiver be appointed to take charge of and wind up the affairs of the said corporation defendant." This last decree seems to be sought upon the averments that the defendant's secretary, on a certain day, refused to show plaintiff "the vouchers and bills paid or payable, so that he might learn and know the financial condition of defendant;" that the secretary, on a certain day, testified in an action between these parties that the corporation had no reputation or good-will of any value, "but that it was a worthless concern as it stands;" and that, according to plaintiff's information and belief, the defendant is not making gain, but is running behindhand, and will continue to do so "the way it is now managed," owing to the low price of fuse, etc. The further allegation that the real object of the defendant and its directors is to get the plaintiff's stock for the assessment is hardly a cause of complaint, if the concern is worthless. If, in this state, a corporation may be dissolved at the suit of a stockholder, the court below was justified in refusing such decree upon the facts alleged in the present complaint. Civil Code, 377; Tayl. Priv. Corp. 610, 611.

The demurrer was properly sustained. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CURTIS. (No. 20,370.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 1, 1888.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER ACQUITTAL—INDICTMENT FOR BURGLARY—CONVICTION FOR LARCENY.

Upon indictment for burglary a verdict of guilty of an attempt to commit petit larceny is a nullity, and does not operate as an acquittal of the charge of burglary, since larceny is not included in burglary.¹

2. SAME—VERDICT NOT RESPONSIVE TO INDICTMENT—DISCHARGE OF JURY—FORMER JEOPARDY.

Upon rendering a verdict of guilty of a crime not included in the one charged in the indictment, the jury should not be discharged, but be sent back for further deliberation, but, if discharged with defendant's consent, he is not thereby put in jeopardy.

3. SAME—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where, upon an appeal in a criminal case, the discharge of the jury in a former trial upon the same indictment is relied upon in defense, and the minutes of the court regarding such former trial are not brought up, and the bill of exceptions is silent as to any consent to such discharge, it will be presumed that the jury was discharged with defendant's consent.

4. SAME—TRIAL—ORAL CHARGE.

Under Pen. Code Cal. § 1093, subd. 6, a charge to the jury, in a criminal case, may be given orally if taken down by the phonographic reporter.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; H. M. WILLIS, Judge.

Baker & Blair, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

THORNTON, J. The defendant was accused by information of burglary, and convicted of an attempt to commit petit larceny. He then moved for a new trial, which was granted. On the second trial he was convicted of burglary in the second degree. The defendant asked on the new trial to be allowed to plead once in jeopardy and former acquittal. This was refused, and an exception was reserved. The defendant, on the new trial, asked the court to direct the jury as follows: "That the defendant having been previously tried on this same information for the crime of burglary, and found guilty by the jury on said trial of the offense of an attempt to commit petit larceny, he cannot now be convicted of the higher crime of burglary." This was refused, and defendant excepted. The defendant could not have been convicted on the information for burglary of an attempt to commit larceny. Larceny is not included in the crime of burglary. This was so held in People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 628, and we think correctly. If larceny is not included in burglary, we cannot see that the defendant could be convicted under the statute (Pen. Code, § 1159) of an attempt to commit it.

The verdict of the jury was then a nullity, but on returning it the jury was discharged. As the verdict was a nullity, and of no effect, the jury should have been sent out for further deliberation. The verdict constituted no legal reason for the discharge of the jury, and in our judgment, if they were discharged without consent of the defendant, (except in the cases specially provided for,) it operated as an acquittal of the defendant. Bell v. State, 48 Ala. 696, 697. Under our statute, in a case like this, the consent must appear on the minutes of the court. Pen. Code, § 1140. The minutes of the court as regards the former trial are not before us. The only information we have as to this trial is set forth in the bill of exceptions, and that is silent as to any consent by either party. The bill of exceptions not showing a discharge of the jury without the consent of the defendant, a case is presented where error of the court is not made to appear, and we must presume that the jury was discharged with defendant's consent. As the jury was discharged with the consent of the defendant, without rendering a verdict, it must be held that there was no jeopardy and no acquittal. People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 480. Therefore the court did not err in refusing to allow defendant to plead former jeopardy and former acquittal, nor did it err in refusing the instruction above set forth asked by the defendant. The charge of the court, though given orally, was taken down by the phonographic reporter. This is allowed by statute, (Pen. Code, § 1093, subd. 6,) and therefore there is no error in the court not charging the jury in writing. Judgment and order affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. HOLLADAY et al.

(Supreme Court of California. April 28, 1888.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC PARKS—DEDICATION—RES ADJUDICATA—TITLE AFTERWARDS ACQUIRED FROM UNITED STATES.

In an action of ejectment brought to recover certain parcels of land in plaintiff city, claimed to have been dedicated as a public park, defendants set up in bar of the action a judgment rendered in an action commenced November 16, 1863, brought by the people against defendants, by which it was adjudged that the land in question never had been dedicated to public use. At the time issue was joined in that action, the legal title to the land was in the government of the United States, and did not pass from it until the passage of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, by which act the land was granted in trust for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinances of plaintiff city. Held, that the title which passed to plaintiff by the act of July 1, 1864, was unaffected by the judgment rendered in the action commenced November 16, 1863, being acquired after issue joined in such action, and because the attorney general of the state had no power to submit the title of the government of the United States for adjudication; and it was therefore error for the court to hold that the judgment in that action barred plaintiff from questioning defendant's title to the land in controversy. People v. Holladay, 9 Pac. Rep. 655, followed.

2. SAME.

But plaintiff was estopped from questioning defendant's title to such land by a judgment in favor of defendants in an action against plaintiff commenced December 17, 1864, several months after the passage of the said act of congress, in which action the same acts claimed as acts of dedication were relied upon by plaintiff.

3. SAME—RIGHT TO BE SUED—QUIETING TITLE.

Under the provisions of the consolidation act, (St. Cal. 1850, p. 223,) authorizing the city and county of San Francisco to "sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended, in all courts of law, and in all actions of law, and in all actions whatsoever," an action to quiet title may be maintained against said city and county.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Wm. Matthews, for appellant. S. W. & E. B. Holladay, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an action of ejectment brought by plaintiff to recover of the defendants two parcels of land in the city and county of San Francisco, forming a part of what is known as "Lafayette Park." The plaintiff claims that it is seized in fee of the lands in trust for the people of the state; that the lands were dedicated to the public; that the defendants are trespassers and intruders thereon. Plaintiff claims title under section 5 of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, (13 St. at Large, 333,) and an act of the legislature of California, passed March 11, 1858, (St. 1858, p. 52.) A digest of the provisions of the Van Ness ordinance and other ordinances of the city, mentioned in the act of the legislature referred to, is given in the report of Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 266, and shows the basis of plaintiff's claim to the lands in controversy in this case. In defense of the action the defendants made a general denial, and pleaded in bar three final judgments entered before the commencement of the present action. The court below found that all the matters and issues in this action, and all the questions of title and of dedication involved herein, had been, prior to the commencement of this action; heard, tried, and finally adjudicated and determined in favor of S. W. Holladay, one of the defendants herein, and against the plaintiff herein, in an action commenced November 16, 1863, in the Fourth district court, wherein the people of the state were plaintiffs and S. W. Holladay was defendant; that the same land was the subject-matter of controversy in that action as in this, and that the same title and the same question of dedication to public use and acceptance by the public were litigated and adjudicated in that action as in this action; that said former action was commenced at the instance of plaintiff herein, and the trial thereof was managed and conducted in the interests of the plaintiff by its attorneys and officers acting on its behalf. The court further found that all the matters in issue in this action, including the title and question of dedication, were finally adjudged and determined in favor of Holladay, one of the defendants herein, and against the plaintiff herein, in an action commenced December 17, 1864, in said Fourth district court, wherein Holladay was plaintiff, and the city and county of San Francisco was defendant; that the same land was the subject-matter of that action as in the present action. And upon these findings the court rendered judgment for the defendants.

The third action referred to was an action commenced by the people of the state, on the relation of Mayor Bryant, against the present defendants, wherein it was alleged by plaintiff that the land in controversy was a portion of a public square dedicated to public uses. In the lower court said action was decided in favor of these defendants. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied, an appeal was taken to this court, and the appeal was pending at the time the case at bar was decided. The decision of this court in that case is reported in 68 Cal. 439, 9 Pac. Rep. 655, and it was there held that the title which passed to the city and county of San Francisco by the act of July 1, 1864, was unaffected by the judgment in the case of People v. Holladay, commenced November 16, 1863, because it was acquired long after issue was joined in the action in which the judgment pleaded in bar was rendered, and because the attorney general of the state had no power to submit the title of the government of the United States for adjudication. The court below therefore erred in holding that said judgment, the first judgment pleaded in bar of this action, estopped the plaintiff from questioning the defendant's title to the lands in controversy.

The third judgment pleaded as an estoppel by the defendants in this action was reversed by this court in People v. Holladay, supra, and, of course, is no defense to this action. In that case this court said: "If the particular piece of land in controversy had been, prior to the passage of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, dedicated by the city as a public square, congress, by granting and relinquishing the title of the United States to the city, * * * ratified and confirmed the dedication, * * * and this virtually perfected the dedication." 68 Cal. 444, 9 Pac. Rep. 657. It was not decided in that case whether there had been a dedication. That question, we think, was determined in favor of the defendant herein by the judgment in the second action.

The objection to the validity of the judgment in the first case, which was made in People v. Holladay, supra, cannot be urged against the judgment in the case of Holladay v. City and County of San Francisco, the second judgment pleaded in bar in this case, because Holladay v. City and County of San Francisco was commenced December 17, 1864, several months after the passage of the act of congress referred to. If the land has ever been dedicated to the public use, such dedication must have been before the passage of that act,—at least before the commencement of the action, December 17, 1864. In the second action referred to, the same acts which are here claimed as acts of dedication were relied upon by the defendant therein, (plaintiff herein.) The court there necessarily held, in view of its judgment, that no dedication had ever been made. It would seem, therefore, that the matter is res adjudicata, and that the city is barred from further litigation of the question, and estopped from denying the fact. Issue therein was not joined until December 30, 1864, and final judgment was not rendered until December 25, 1867. It is claimed by appellant that the record in that case is not binding upon the city or the people, for the reason that, at the date of the institution of the suit, all the title that the city had was the bare right to the possession of this land in trust for the people of the state. But the particular matter litigated in that suit was whether the city held the fee in trust for the people or at all, and it was adjudged therein that the city had no right, title, or interest in the land. The judgment in that case was not appealed from, and is final, so far as the city is concerned. It quieted the title of the plaintiff as against any and all claims of the defendant therein. Upon the strength of that title, so quieted, it appears that some of these defendants have purchased portions of the property in good faith. "It is for the public good that there be an end to litigation. If it were otherwise, there would be no security for any other person, and great oppression might be done under color and pretense of law." Miles v. Caldwell, 2 Wall. 39; Broom, Leg. Max. 243.

2. The provisions of the consolidation act authorized the city and county of San Francisco to "sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended, in all courts of law, and in all actions of law, and in all actions whatsoever." Act 1850, § 2; Stat. 1850, p. 223. Under this provision we think that the plaintiff in Holladay v. City and County of San Francisco, supra, could maintain an action against said city and county. Order affirmed.

WRISTEN v. CURTIS. (No. 12,319.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 28, 1888.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—RELEASE OF ONE OF SEVERAL CO-SURETIES—EFFECT.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 1543, providing that a release of one joint debtor does not extinguish the obligation of any of the others unless they are mere guarantors, nor affect their right of contribution from him, a release of one of the makers of a joint and several promissory note does not release the others; and an instruction that a release of one of two or more sureties without the consent of the co-sureties is a release of all the sureties, is error.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

George P. Harding, (W. C. Belcher, of counsel,) for appellant. Ball & Craig and W. D. Grady, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. On the 24th of January, 1879, W. C. Harris, W. R. Forman, and the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant their two certain promissory notes of that date, each of which notes was joint and several in form, for the sum of $2,000 each, payable one year after date, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month from date until paid, payable monthly or compounded. Thereafter the defendant commenced an action against said Harris, Forman, and plaintiff herein to recover the amount due on said notes. The case was tried, and by the court taken under advisement; and, while the court had the same under advisement, the defendant herein received of said Forman the sum of $2,200, and executed and delivered to him a release in writing, of which the court and plaintiff herein were ignorant, and about two weeks thereafter the court rendered its decision and judgment in favor of defendant herein, and against said Harris, Forman, and the plaintiff herein, for the sum of $6,223.41, together with the costs, being the full amount sued for in said action. Thereafter an execution was issued upon said judgment for the amount thereof, less said sum of $2,200; and certain real and personal property of the plaintiff herein were levied upon and advertised for sale under and by virtue of said execution. For the purpose of preventing the sale of said property, and obtaining its release from said levy, plaintiff paid to the sheriff making the levy the sum of $4,315.99, the full amount due upon said execution, with all costs, which was paid to the defendant herein. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant herein for the amount so paid in satisfaction of said execution, and from that judgment, and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted.

The main question presented here is whether the release of Forman relinquished the obligation of plaintiff. The Code provides that "a release of one of two or more joint debtors does not extinguish the obligation of any of the others unless they are mere guarantors; nor does it affect their right to contribution from him." Civil Code, § 1543. That the plaintiff, Harris, and Forman, were, upon the face of the notes which they executed to the defendant, joint debtors, is too clear to admit of doubt, and unless the plaintiff was a mere guarantor his obligation was not extinguished by the release of Forman. But the court, by request of plaintiff, instructed the jury that "a release of one of two or more sureties without the consent of the other co-sureties is a release of all the sureties." This is clearly contrary to the provision of the Code relating to the same subject, and "the Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates."

The instruction being clearly erroneous, the judgment and order must be reversed.

RAYNOR v. MINTZER et al. (No. 11,779.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1837.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RUNNING OF THE STATUTE—ACTIONS FOR TORT.

Defendants fraudulently acquired from plaintiff an interest in lands, and incited plaintiff's creditors to levy on his interest, and convey it to them to secure their title, and otherwise embarrassed plaintiff, so that he was obliged to resort to expensive litigation to save his interest in the lands. Held, that the statute of limitations against an action for damages for these fraudulent acts began to run at least as early as the entering of the judgment in plaintiff's suit to save his title, although defendants appealed from such judgment, it not appearing that such appeal was malicious or without probable cause.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by P. A. Raynor against W. H. Mintzer and others for damages for alleged fraudulent acts of defendants. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals.

Paris & Goodcell, Harris & Allen, and H. M. Willis, for appellant. A. B. Hotchkiss, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment rendered against him on demurrer to his complaint. The action was brought to recover damages which the plaintiff claimed to have suffered on account of the wrongful and fraudulent acts of the defendants in attempting to deprive him of certain valuable real property which he owned in the county of San Bernardino. It is alleged that the defendants, in 1875, agreed and conspired together to cheat and defraud plaintiff out of his property, and that all their subsequent acts were in pursuance of that conspiracy; that they thereby caused him to suffer great loss and damage, and forced him to resort to expensive and vexatious litigation to protect his rights. The complaint covers 35 pages, without the exhibits of the printed transcript, and tells at great length the story of the wrongs suffered by plaintiff, and of the litigation consequent thereupon. The facts may be briefly stated as follows: In 1875 the plaintiff was the owner of an undivided four-sevenths interest in certain real property, and the defendants were the owners of the other three-sevenths. The defendants fraudulently acquired from the plaintiff his interest, and, after acquiring it, organized themselves into a corporation by the name of the Colton Land & Water Company, of which they were the only members and stockholders. They then transferred the whole property to the corporation and divided the stock among themselves according to their respective interests in the property. Thereafter, on June 7, 1887, they caused the corporation to commence an action against the plaintiff to quiet its title to the property, and to enjoin him from asserting that he owned any interest therein. The plaintiff answered, and by way of cross-complaint set up that he owned four-sevenths of the property, and prayed for affirmative relief. The case was tried, and on October 27, 1879, it was adjudged and determined that the plaintiff owned the interest claimed by him, and that the corporation and other parties to the suit reconvey the same to him. A motion for new trial was then made and denied, and an appeal from the judgment and order was taken to this court. This appeal was heard, and the judgment was slightly modified and affirmed in January, 1881. Water Co. v. Raynor, 57 Cal. 588. While that appeal was pending, the defendants, in pursuance of their fraudulent scheme to get the plaintiff's property, and in order to evade the judgment, if a decision should be in his favor, sought out various creditors of the plaintiff, and, among others, one Clyde, and incited and urged them to bring suits and obtain judgments on their claims, and to have the plaintiff's interest in the property levied on and sold. To induce the creditors to do this, and to proceed at once and buy in the property before the determination of the appeal, the defendants promised the creditors to take from them whatever title they might acquire, and to pay them therefor the full amount of their respective claims, with all costs incurred, themselves taking the chances as to the title being good. In pursuance of this arrangement, Clyde commenced an action upon his claim for nearly $1,800, and obtained a judgment by default. He then had an execution issued and levied on the plaintiff's interest in the property, and at the sale bought the property in his own name. He obtained a certificate of sale, and on December 7, 1880, transferred the same, and all his interest in the lands described therein, to the defendants. Several distinct tracts of land were sold in one parcel, and, the plaintiff being without means to redeem from the sale, the sheriff, on the 25th of May, 1881, executed to the defendants, as the assignees of Clyde, a deed purporting to convey all the plaintiff's interest in the lands so sold. On the 8th of October, 1881, the plaintiff commenced a new action against the defendants and Clyde and the Colton Land & Water Company, to have the defendants adjudged his trustees as to all property transferred to them by the sheriff's deed of May 25, 1881, and to compel them to reconvey the same to him upon such terms as might be just. That action was tried, and on the 6th of November, 1883, judgment was duly rendered and entered therein in favor of the plaintiff, and it was thereby adjudged and determined that the defendants held the property as trustees for plaintiff; that the title acquired by them under the sheriff's deed was acquired by means of actual fraud, and in violation of their duties as trustees; and that they reconvey to the plaintiff all property and interest conveyed to them by the sheriff's deed, upon payment by him to them of the sum of money paid to Clyde for the assignment of his certificate, with interest thereon. The defendants then moved for a new trial; and, their motion being denied, appealed to this court, where the judgment and order were affirmed on the 23d of June, 1885. Raynor v. Mintzer, 67 Cal. 159, 7 Pac. Rep. 431. To show the special damages sustained by the plaintiff, it is then alleged that on the 12th of October, 1875, plaintiff was the owner of two tracts of land in San Bernardino county, which were mortgaged to secure the payment of debts owing by him; that the mortgages were thereafter foreclosed, and the tracts sold under the decrees of foreclosure; that, by reason of the aforesaid fraudulent acts of the defendants, the plaintiff was unable to pay the debts, or redeem from the sales; that one tract was sold for $20,000 less than its actual value, and he was thereby damaged in that sum, and the other tract was sold for $5,000 less than its actual value, and he was thereby damaged in that sum; that, on the same 12th of October, plaintiff was the owner of two other tracts of land in San Bernardino county, which were thereafter levied upon and sold under executions, by his creditors; that the sales were instigated by the defendants in order that he might be hindered and embarrassed in resisting their fraudulent claims, and that, by reason of their fraudulent acts, he was unable to pay the debts or redeem the property; that each tract was sold for $10,000 less than its actual value, and he was thereby damaged in the sum of $20,000; that, in resisting the action brought against him by the Colton Land & Water Company, and in prosecuting the action against the defendants and Clyde, he necessarily incurred and expended for attorney's fees, and other expenses not included in the costs awarded him, the sum of $5,000 in the one case, and $10,000 in the other, and that he was thereby damaged in those sums; and "that, by reason of the aforesaid fraudulent acts of the defendants, the plaintiff has suffered great hardship and privation, often being destitute of the necessities of life for himself and family, and has for years been precluded from engaging in any business, and been shut out from society and friendly and social intercourse, and been greatly annoyed, embarrassed, and worried, and endured great mental suffering, and been injured in his health, and otherwise greatly injured, to his damage in the further sum of fifty thousand dollars." The prayer then is for judgment in the sum of $110,000 and costs.

This action was commenced on the 23d day of November, 1885, and the demurrer was upon the grounds, among others, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civil Proc. It does not appear upon what ground the demurrer was sustained; but, if it might properly have been sustained on any one of the grounds presented, the judgment cannot now be reversed. It is clear that the action was one to recover damages for tort, and was based upon a liability not founded upon an instrument of writing. The limitation was therefore two years. Piller v. Railroad Co., 52 Cal. 42; Wood v. Currey, 57 Cal. 208. The question, then, is, when did the statute begin to run? It is urged for the appellant that all the acts of the defendants, including the appeals to this court, were parts of one continuous scheme, having in view the one ultimate fraudulent purpose of depriving him wrongfully of his property, and that his cause of action did not fully accrue until the decision of this court made upon the last appeal, on June 23, 1885. We do not think this position can be maintained. All of the wrongful acts of defendants were committed prior to and pending the appeal in the Colton Land & Water Co.'s Case. The plaintiff's action against the defendants and Clyde was also commenced and tried more than two years before the commencement of this action, and by the judgment entered therein he was fully restored to all the rights in the disputed property. It is true, the defendants moved for a new trial, and appealed from that judgment, but it is not alleged that they did this maliciously or without probable cause; nor did this court hold the appeal frivolous, and award damages therefor. It would seem, too, that all the proximate and recoverable damages which plaintiff has sustained had accrued when that action was commenced, or, at least, when it was tried. But, however this may be, the general rule is that a cause of action for tort arises when the wrongful act, causing damage, is done, and the statute of limitations then begins to run against it. The damages occasioned by the act may not all have been sustained at that time, but that fact does not postpone the running of the statute. See cases above cited; and Taylor v. Bidwell, 65 Cal. 489, 4 Pac. Rep. 491; Northrop v. Hill, 57 N. Y. 351; Ang. Lim. § 298. It follows, in our opinion, that the plaintiff's cause of action was complete as early, at least, as November 6, 1883, and was barred by the statute. The demurrer was therefore properly sustained, and the judgment should be affirmed.

FOOTE and HAYNE, CC., concurred.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL v. STANFORD et al. (No. 9,733.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1888.)

1. CORPORATIONS—FRANCHISES—FORFEITURE—QUO WARRANTO.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 803, providing that an action may be brought by the attorney general for the usurpation of a franchise, and Civil Code Cal. § 358 authorizing an inquiry as to the right of a corporation to exercise corporate power at suit of the state, on information of the attorney general, the people may maintain an action, at the relation of that officer, to forfeit the franchises of a railroad corporation, and restrain the exercise of the same.

2. SAME—PLEADING—EXISTENCE OF INCORPORATION.

Where a count in a petition prays for the forfeiture of franchises then being exercised by a company of persons acting as a corporation, having alleged that if it ever had, as a corporation, any legal existence, privilege, or franchise, the same had become forfeited, the previous existence of the corporation is not alleged, and no cause of action is stated.

3. SAME—DENIAL OF RIGHT TO FRANCHISE.

In a proceeding to forfeit the franchise of a corporation, and restrain its members from exercising the same, an allegation that defendants never had such franchise is sufficient, without specifying in what respects their right thereto is defective.

4. SAME—LIMITATION OF ACTION.

The exercise of a franchise, without authority, by a company acting as a corporation, is a continuous usurpation, and the statute of limitations will not run.

5. SAME—ASSIGNMENT OF FRANCHISES.

Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31, provides that corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act. The act of 1861 providing for the incorporation of railroad companies, as amended by the act of May 6, 1862, requires a two-thirds vote of the supervisors or common council of the city and county or city to entitle such companies to the use of streets, etc. Held, that an assignment of a right, granted to certain persons by private act, to maintain a railroad, collect fares, etc., to a corporation, without such grant from the supervisors, conveys to it no right to exercise such franchise.

6. SAME—ESTOPPEL—BY PLEADINGS.

An action brought by the people against a railroad company as a corporation, in which they obtained judgment that the company had built a bridge over a navigable stream, which constituted a nuisance, and an order of abatement thereof, does not estop them from bringing another action against the persons constituting such company, denying that it ever acquired the franchise to build its road or operate cars thereon.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by the people of California, at the relation of the attorney general, against Leland Stanford and others, exercising franchises as a railroad corporation, to forfeit the same, and restrain defendants from further operation of the road. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

McAllister & Bergin, for appellants. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and J. P. Meux, for respondents.

McKINSTRY, J. Defendants' demurrer to the complaint, and to each count thereof, was overruled. It is contended by appellants (defendants) that the attorney general had no power to institute or prosecute the action. It is unnecessary here to decide whether the attorney general has power to institute an action on behalf of the state, or people of the state, in the absence of a statute authorizing it. An action may be brought by the attorney general for the usurpation of an office or franchise. Code Civil Proc. § 803. An inquiry as to the right of a corporation, doing business as such, to exercise corporate powers, may be made at the suit of the state on the information of the attorney general. Civil Code, § 358.

As to the demurrer to the second count of the complaint, which avers that if the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company "ever had any legal existence" as a corporation, the same became forfeited and ceased to exist by reason of acts and omissions of the said "pretended corporation." Scire facias, which would seem to have been the more usual proceeding where a legally existing body had abused the powers and franchises intrusted to it, is abolished. Code Civil Proc. § 802. "It would seem, however, that an information in the nature of quo warranto would lie against a legally existing corporation for an abuse of its franchises." Ang. & A. Corp. 778; 1 Bl. Comm. 485; Kyd, Corp. 474-486. A private corporation created by the legislature may lose its franchises by a misuser or non-user of them; and they may be resumed by the government under a judgment upon a quo warranto to ascertain and enforce the forfeiture. Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, 51. A corporation may be dissolved by a forfeiture of its charter, judicially ascertained and declared; its being as a corporation may be declared to be ended; because it is a tacit condition of a grant of incorporation that the grantees shall act up to the end and design for which they were incorporated. The sovereign power has at all times the right to inquire into the matter of the user of a franchise, or the title by which it is held. Ang. & A. Corp. 774; High, Extr. Rem. 472. In the second count of the complaint herein it is alleged that by reason of the acts and omissions of the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company, if the said company ever had, as a corporation, "any legal existence, right, privilege or franchise," etc., "the same became forfeited," etc. The plaintiffs pray, among other things, that it be adjudged the said pretended corporation has no legal existence; and, if the second count alleges a cause of action, such a judgment would operate as well a forfeiture of corporate rights by reason of the misusers and non-users averred, as a judgment that the corporation never had a legal existence.

The defendants did not demur on the ground of a misjoinder of causes of action. But each count of a complaint must contain a distinct statement of the facts constituting a cause of action. Unless the second count alleges that the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company once had a legal existence as a corporation, the second count fails to state a cause of action. There could be no resumption by the state or forfeiture of franchises never granted. It is manifest that, if the plaintiffs failed to allege that the company referred to had a legal existence as a corporation, there could be no necessity or basis for nor any propriety in a judgment of forfeiture. When facts alleged depend for their materiality as a basis for relief upon another fact, the fact upon which the others depend must be stated. To state it hypothetically is not to state it at all for any purpose of a pleading. Where a corporation may be chartered by special act of the legislature, it has been held in one state to be necessary that the information (a forfeiture by reason of misuser or non-user being claimed) shall refer to the act by which the corporation was chartered, in order that the court may determine what things it was authorized to do or omit.

Danville v. State, 16 Ind. 456. In California it is certainly enough to aver the existence and due organization of the corporation under the general laws. But the second count does not even aver that the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company is or was a corporation. It may be the acts and omissions set forth in the second count might be proved under the averments of the first count; that, under the averments of the first count, the plaintiffs would have been authorized to prove that the defendants had no legal right to the franchises described when the action was commenced. See People v. Bank, 6 Cow. 216. However this may be, the second count of the complaint herein does not state a cause of action. It is alleged in the second count that "the acts and doings of said corporation, and the said defendants acting for said corporation as said pretended officers," were the acts and doings subjecting the franchises of the corporation to forfeiture. There is no statement that the defendants were not real officers or agents, if there was a real corporation. They are called "pretended" officers because they could not be real officers of a corporation which had no legal existence. This is evidently the scope and effect of the allegation in that regard. Yet, in order to make the facts averred as constituting a ground for a judgment of forfeiture, of any avail, it would have to be taken for granted, although not alleged, that the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company was, previous to the acts and doings alleged, a legally existing corporation; and, if the individual defendants were the officers and agents of a legally existing corporation, their acts and doings were those of such corporation. The demurrer to the second count of the complaint should have been sustained.

It is insisted on the part of the appellants that the demurrer to the first count of the complaint should have been sustained by the court below; that the rules of pleading applicable to other civil actions, under the Code of Civil Procedure, obtain with respect to this action, and that the complaint should therefore have specified what the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company failed to do which was necessary to create a legal corporation; wherein it omitted any requirements of the laws. This because, in every case, the plaintiff is required to state the facts constituting his cause of action "in ordinary and concise language." It is obvious that the facts which it is necessary to state depend upon the character of the action. In an action to quiet title, under the Code, it has been held not to be necessary to aver the nature and particulars of the claim asserted by the defendant; nor is it always necessary, in a bill to foreclose a mortgage, to aver the precise nature of a claim to a lien or incumbrance averred to be subsequent and subject to the mortgage. The constitution of 1849, in force when the Code of Civil Procedure was adopted, did not give the district courts express power to issue writs of quo warranto. Section 802, Code Civil Proc., as the same read originally, provided: "The writ of scire facias, the writ of quo warranto, and informations in the nature of quo warranto are abolished," etc. Section 5, art. 6, Const. 1879, declares that the superior courts shall have power to issue writs of quo warranto, and that the constitution does not prohibit the legislature from providing for actions or informations or proceedings in the nature of quo warranto. Informations in the nature of quo warranto existed at the common law. In England informations in the nature of quo warranto were filed by the attorney general, or by the "king's coroner," of his own authority; afterwards by the king's coroner under the direction of the court of king's bench,—the last under St. 4 & 5, Wm. & M. c. 18. Still later, in certain cases, by leave of the court, in pursuance of St. Anne, (c. 20.) The statute of Anne introduced a more convenient mode of proceedings to inquire into a usurpation of or intrusion into certain enumerated offices and franchises. Ang. & A. Corp. §§ 731-735.

The chapter of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to actions for usurpation of an office or franchise provides, in effect, for an information in the nature of quo warranto, the remedy or proceeding being extended to usurpations or intrusions into any office or franchise. We think the statute constitutional. In the first place, it may be considered as a mode of procedure for the exercise of the jurisdiction in quo warranto conferred by the constitution. State v. Merry, 3 Mo. 278. In the next place, it is an action, and the legislature is not prohibited by the constitution from providing for such an action. We are of opinion the first count of the complaint states facts constituting a cause of action. Franchises are privileges of the sovereign in the hands of a subject. The state is the source from whence all franchises are derived. As against the state there is no presumption that citizens exercising a franchise are exercising it rightfully. Hence it is not necessary, in a proceeding of this character, for the people to allege wherein the right of a defendant is defective. Even if it were conceded that, under our law, a franchise can be acquired by prescription, it would still be for the defendant to a proceeding like the present to allege and prove the long-continued use. "While in ordinary civil actions the burden rests upon the plaintiff to allege and prove his title to the thing in controversy, the rule is reversed in cases of quo warranto informations, and the respondent is required to disclose his title to the office or franchise in controversy; and, if he fails in any particular to show a complete title, judgment must go against him." "The proper course for the respondent is either to disclaim or justify. * * * If he seeks to justify, he must set out his title specially and distinctly." High, Extr. Rem. §§ 712, 716. The defendant cannot plead non usurpavit, for the object of the proceeding is to compel him to set forth by what warranty or authority he exercises the office or franchise. Ang. & A. Corp. § 756; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) 893. The demurrer to the first count of the complaint was properly overruled.

The court below sustained a demurrer to the defendants' answer. The defendants pleaded as a defense that the cause of action set up in the first count of the complaint was barred by sections 338, 343, Code Civil Proc. If the proceeding were simply one in which a forfeiture were sought by reason of the misuse or non-use of its powers by a corporation, the statute of limitations might be pleaded in bar, (Code Civil Proc. § 345;) but the continued exercise of a franchise without right is a continuously renewed usurpation on which a new cause of action arises each day.

The answer avers that the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company was and is a corporation, with the franchises mentioned, under the laws of California. This is sufficient reference to the general laws under which such corporations may be formed. The courts take judicial notice of such general laws; and the cases in other states which seem to require that, in an action like the present, the defendant, claiming to be a corporation, shall allege the special act creating it as such, have no application here. The answer must show, however, that the corporation was organized in the manner required by the general laws. Here the defendants set forth in the answer the articles of association, which seem to comply with the statute. But did the corporation, thus formed, possess, when the suit was commenced, the franchises claimed by it herein? May 6, 1862, the act of 1861, to provide for the incorporation of railroad companies, was amended by providing that no railroad company thereafter organized should have the right to use any of the streets, lands, or waters within a city or city and county, unless the right to use the same should be granted to said company by a vote of two-thirds of all the members of the board of supervisors or common council of the city and county or city. The answer does not allege any such grant from the supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco. The defendant the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company claims the right to maintain a railroad, and to run cars thereon, upon the streets described in the answer, to collect fare, etc., under and by virtue of the act of April 2, 1866, purporting to grant to certain persons (alleged to be assignors of the Potrero & Bay View Company) the right to lay down and maintain an iron railroad along and upon certain streets; and upon acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto. The act of 1866 was not a grant of a mere proprietary interest in lands, but was, if valid, a grant of a franchise. The constitution of 1849 provided: "Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act," etc. Article 4, § 31. The true construction of that constitutional provision is that private corporations must derive their powers from general laws, and not from special statutes. San Francisco v. Water-Works, 48 Cal. 513. It follows that, if the grant of the franchise of laying down and maintaining a railroad, within the limits of San Francisco, to certain persons therein named, was a valid and operative grant, yet the defendant corporation acquired no right to the franchise by assignment from such persons. To uphold such assignment would be to give to the particular corporation, through it, a franchise which other corporations of the same class could acquire only by grant from the supervisors, as provided in the general laws. San Francisco v. Water-Works, supra. The answer fails to aver facts showing a right to exercise the franchise mentioned in the pleadings.

In a separate and distinct answer to "the supposed cause of action secondly alleged," in the complaint, the defendants aver, in effect, that on January 14, 1882, the people of the state did institute an action in this honorable (the superior) court against the defendant the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company, praying that the piles and bridge placed by said defendant at the point of intersection of Kentucky with Tulare streets be adjudged and declared to be a nuisance, and, as such, be abated, etc.; that the defendant appeared, and answered to the complaint in said action, and such proceedings were therein afterwards had that on January 30, 1882, the court did adjudge, among other things, that the wooden piles, timbers, and bridge, built under the control and use of the defendant the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company, at the junction aforesaid, are and constitute, "as now built," a public nuisance, and did further adjudge that the defendant, without delay, take away and remove said bridge, etc. The answer further alleges that the removal of the bridge, piles, etc., in obedience to the judgment aforesaid, constitutes the tearing up, destroying, and removing of portions of the track or roadway charged in the second count of the complaint. If the answer had averred that the bridge at the intersection of Kentucky and Tulare streets could not be erected in such manner as that it would not constitute a public nuisance, the answer would have constituted a good answer to the portion of the second count of the complaint charging the tearing up of the track, etc., at the junction aforesaid, and the abandoning of the use thereof by the company. The people could not first prevent the employment of its franchise by the corporation, and then forfeit the corporate existence because of non-employment of that franchise. As we have seen, however, the second count of the complaint states no cause of action, and the answer last above referred to is addressed only to the second count.

The first count of the complaint alleged that the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company never had the right or franchise to build and maintain tracks or run cars upon streets within the city and county of San Francisco, and the answer fails to aver facts showing that the company had such rights or franchise. The argument of appellants goes further than a claim that plaintiffs herein are estopped from demanding a forfeiture of the franchises of the Potrero & Bay View Company because of its failure to do that which a court, on application of plaintiffs, has prohibited the company from doing. It will be observed that in the former action the bridge was declared to be a nuisance "as it was built." It is asserted that the plaintiffs are estopped from prosecuting the present action by the mere fact that they had succeeded in another action, brought against the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company, as a corporation, in obtaining a judgment that the company had placed obstacles in a navigable stream which constituted a public nuisance. There are cases in which a party to an action, having pleaded or relied upon the existence of a fact, and having secured to himself some substantial benefit by reason of an adjudication involving the existence of the fact pleaded or proved, cannot in a subsequent suit be permitted to assert that the same fact did not exist. To permit him to do so would be to encourage frauds upon the courts of justice. Lilley v. Adams, 108 Mass. 50; Hooker v. Hubbard, 102 Mass. 239; Railroad Co. v. Howard, 13 How. 307; Reese v. U. S., 9 Wall. 13. And so a state may be estopped from asserting a claim in her courts by reason of some prior action of the legislature. Com. v. Heirs of André, 3 Pick. 224. In State v. Taylor, 28 La. Ann. 460, the plaintiff alleged that by the act No. 12, 1866, the governor, on the 6th of March of that year, leased to the defendant "the new canal and shell road" for 15 years for an annual rent,—Taylor to put the leased property in good condition, etc.; that the lessee had not paid rent nor complied with the terms of his lease, etc., and had thereby forfeited his rights. The defendant alleged he had been released from the payment of rent by the act No. 118 of 1867, and a contract thereunder, and in lieu thereof was to widen the canal, etc. The plaintiff responded that the act of 1867 was unconstitutional and void. It appeared that in a previous action—Case v. Taylor (defendant in State v. Taylor)—the state intervened and alleged that the rights of said Taylor, under the act of 1866, and the contract thereunder, had been materially modified and altered by the act No. 118 of 1867, asserted the binding force and operation of said act No. 118 of 1867 to protect the rights of the state in relation to said canal, etc., "and succeeded in her demand." The supreme court of Louisiana held the state, by reason of her conduct in the former action, was estopped from demanding that the act No. 118 of 1867 be declared invalid. In the former action the state had obtained a judgment fixing the contract rights of the state and Taylor, and deciding that the contract and its terms were determined by reference to the act of 1867, the contract under it, and a subsequent act of 1870. Whether the court was right in saying that the plea was not res adjudicata, but estoppel, it is not necessary to decide. The question here presented is not like that in State v. Taylor.

In the action brought by the people to abate the alleged nuisance, the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company was named as a corporation. The company or persons interested did not deny that it was a corporation, and the plaintiffs took judgment against the defendant. So far as appears, the company was a corporation de facto and de jure. But it was a corporation which never acquired the right to erect bridges, or lay down tracks, or maintain a railroad within the limits of San Francisco. If, without having authority to erect a bridge at all, it built a bridge in such manner as to constitute a public nuisance, upon what principle does the prosecution of an action to abate the nuisance estop the plaintiffs from claiming that the corporation never acquired the franchise to build a road, including bridges, or operate cars thereon, within the limits of the city and county? In the former action the present plaintiffs did not declare, or obtain any advantage by having the court adjudge, that the defendant the Potrero & Bay View Railroad Company was lawfully exercising the franchises described. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CENTRAL PAC. R. CO. (No. 9,791.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1888.)

1. COVENANTS—ACTION FOR BREACH—DAMAGES—PENALTY.

In an action to recover a certain sum paid by plaintiff as interest on bonds on breach by defendant of covenants contained in an agreement made in pursuance of an act of the legislature of April 4, 1864, entitled "An act to aid the construction of the Central Pacific Railway Company, and to secure the use of the same for military and other purposes," it appeared that defendants agreed to transport and convey certain persons and goods free of charge, and, on receipt of a patent, to convey certain lands in fee to plaintiffs; that plaintiff paid interest on defendant's bonds to the amount aforesaid; that section 4 of the act recited that the said grant made to defendant was made upon the express condition and on consideration that defendant should transport and convey, etc., and also that defendant should be liable to repay plaintiff the amount which should be paid by them, under the agreement, on breach of any of the covenants. Held, that the amount so paid was a grant, and not a loan, notwithstanding the use of the word "repay;" that as the sum for which the defendants were liable on breach of covenant was made payable for one breach or many, for a breach attended with small loss or great loss, and the actual damage could be easily computed, the same must be considered in the light of a penalty, and not as liquidated damages; and that the contract could not be considered as being alternative on defendant's part.

2. SAME—PLEADING—ALLEGATION OF BREACH.

In an action to recover a certain sum incurred as a penalty for breaches of contract, the complaint is not sufficient where it merely recites the contract containing the penalty, alleges generally the breaches thereof, and prays for judgment for the penal sum, as it should specifically assign each individual breach relied upon, and the actual damage sustained as the result of each individual breach.

3. SAME—AMBIGUITY.

In an action to recover a certain sum as a penalty for breaches of contract, where, for certain considerations, defendant agreed, inter alia, to convey certain land to plaintiffs within 90 days of receipt of patent, it appeared that the complaint contained no averment that defendant had received the patent, but alleged that defendant was the owner of the land, and that "it had been within the ability and power of the defendant at all times to apply for, accept, and receive a patent from the United States." Held, the complaint was insufficient, on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty, there being nothing to show that the application for the patent would have been successful.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS TO PLEADINGS.

Where a certain averment in a complaint is demurred to on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty, and the demurrer is sustained, a decision in favor of the plaintiff on supposed issues made by objections other than the specific objection mentioned cannot be implied.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

The people of the state of California brought an action against the Central Pacific Railroad Company to recover money paid under an agreement made in pursuance of an act of the legislature of April 4, 1864, entitled "An act to aid the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and to secure the use of same for military and other purposes." Defendant demurs. Demurrer sustained. Plaintiff appeals.

Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and Wm. M. Pierson, for appellant. Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, plaintiffs declining to amend, final judgment was entered for the defendant, from which plaintiffs have appealed. The complaint sets out the act of the legislature of April 4, 1864, "to aid the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad Company," etc.; and avers that on the 4th day of May, 1864, the defendant made, executed, and delivered an agreement in writing, as required by said act of the legislature; which alleged agreement is also set out at length. It also alleged that the state of California "has duly performed all the conditions mentioned in said act of the legislature by it to be performed," and has paid the interest on the $1,500,000 bonds, as provided in the act; the aggregate of payments of interest being $1,942,500, and the last of such payments having been made December 31, 1882. The judgment prayed is for $1,942,500 and interest and costs. The complaint also avers that since the approval of the act and filing of the agreement aforesaid, and during each and every year since said times, "there have been necessarily transported on and over the railroad of said defendant numerous public messengers of the state of California, and of the various counties of said state; and numerous convicts, and numerous public messengers in charge thereof, going and sent on and over the railroad of said defendant to the state prison of said state; and numerous lunatics, and numerous public messengers in charge thereof, going and sent on and over the railroad of said defendant to the state insane asylum of said state from the various counties and cities and counties of said state; and various materials, and various public messengers in charge thereof, transported on and over the railroad of said defendant for the construction of the state capitol building of said state; and various articles intended for public exhibition at the fairs of the State Agricultural Society of said state, transported on and over the railroad of said defendant. That at the date of the passage of said act of the legislature, and of the execution of said agreement, and since, the said defendant was and has been the owner and in possession of the said south half of section 19, in township 11 north, of range 7 east, Mount Diablo meridian, referred to in said act of the legislature and said agreement, and it has been within the power and ability of the said defendant and its agents at all times since the passage of said act, and the execution, delivery and filing of the agreement aforesaid, to apply for, accept, and receive a patent from the United States of America for the lands and premises described in said act of the legislature and said agreement, and to execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the state of California a deed in fee-simple for the conveyance thereof. Nevertheless the plaintiff alleges that, although often requested and required so to do, the defendant has willfully and designedly, during all of the time aforesaid, refused and neglected to transport or convey over its said railroad free of charge, or without any other compensation than as provided in said act, all or any of the public messengers aforesaid, or all or any of the convicts aforesaid to the state prison of said state, or all or any of the lunatics aforesaid going to the state insane asylum aforesaid, or all or any of the materials aforesaid for the construction of the state capitol building aforesaid, or all or any of the articles aforesaid intended for public exhibition at the fairs of the State Agricultural Society aforesaid; and has, although often thereunto requested and required, refused and neglected to apply for or accept or receive a patent from the United States for the lands and premises aforesaid, or to execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the state of California a deed for the conveyance thereof, in fee-simple or otherwise."

It is contended by appellants that the questions of "compensation" or of a "penalty" are utterly foreign to the issues herein; that the statute, and its acceptance by the defendant, constitute a contract between the state and the defendant, the terms and conditions whereof fix the rights of the parties herein; that the covenants or promises on the part of the defendant, in consideration of payments by the state of interest upon the bonds, were to transport and convey, "at all times when required," all public messengers, convicts ordered to the state prison, lunatics sent to the insane asylum, materials for the construction of the state capitol, articles intended for exhibition at the fairs of the State Agricultural Society, and troops and munitions of war of the state, free of charge; and also, within 90 days after receiving a patent therefor, to convey the land described, or to repay to the state the amount by it paid as and for interest upon the bonds mentioned in the act. The proposition is that the money to be paid by the state for interest on the bonds was, in effect, a loan by the state to the defendant, to be repaid in either one of two ways,—by doing for all time the things specially agreed to be done by defendant, or by paying back the money. It is claimed the promise of the defendant was in the alternative; the defendant having the option at any time to refuse to perform any of the things promised, and to pay the money advanced by the state in lieu of such performance. But the language of the act does not bear out the suggestion that the money paid by the state for interest was a loan to the defendant. The act is entitled "An act to aid the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad Company and to secure the use of the same for military and other purposes," etc. The preamble recites that whereas war exists, and congress "has granted aid" for the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad, which is insufficient to complete the road, etc.; and "whereas it is important, in view of the present state of war, that the railroad be constructed as soon as possible," etc. Neither in the title nor in the preamble is there any hint that it was the intent to provide for lending money to the defendant, although the general language employed might be held to include "aid" in the form of a loan, did the body of the act clearly provide for it.

The first section of the act authorizes the defendant herein to issue bonds of $1,000 each, the interest on the first 1,500 to be payable at the state treasury. The second section provides for the levy of a tax to pay the interest on the 1,500 bonds. The fourth section begins: "The said grant to said company is made upon the express condition and in consideration that the said company shall and do at all times when required, from and after the passage of this act, transport and convey," etc. The fifth section appropriates the money to be paid as interest on the bonds. The fourth section also requires that the railroad company shall enter into an "agreement," promising to comply with the terms and conditions set forth in the act. At the close of the fourth section is the sentence that, in case the company shall fail or refuse to perform any of such conditions, "it shall be liable to repay to the state the amount which shall have been paid by the state under this act." The word "repay" purports a payment to the state of the moneys granted by the state, but does not of itself necessarily imply a promise to repay the moneys as moneys advanced by way of loan to the defendant. By the act the state pledged its faith to pay, and provided for taxation to pay the interest upon certain bonds; and defendant, by its acceptance and agreement filed, promised to carry public passengers free of charge, etc. The act does not provide for an agreement by defendant promising to repay the moneys advanced by the state. The liability of defendant to pay money arises entirely out of the defendant's acceptance of the benefits of the act, which fixes a penalty in case of default in the performance of these conditions which the defendant is to agree to perform by written agreement filed. True, the acceptance of the grant bound the railroad company by all the provisions of the act, including the provision for "repayment" in case of default; but the foregoing statement explains the nature of the defendant's obligations thus assumed. The state grants, by appropriation, certain moneys to aid the construction of defendant's railroad. In consideration of the grant, the defendant promises to do certain things for the state, and for the benefit of citizens of the state. The money for interest is appropriated, and the recurring payments of interest are to be made, even though the company shall fail to perform any of the conditions on its part. In case of failure to perform, however, the company is liable in damages at least up to the amount previously paid by the state. But the amount which may have been paid by the state is either an amount stipulated to be paid as damages, or it is merely a penalty. The contract on the part of the defendant is not in the alternative; it is not an agreement to perform the conditions, or, at its option, to pay the amount. The promise to carry all public messengers free of charge, etc., is an absolute promise. The distinct and separate clause of the statute that, "in case the said company shall fail and refuse," etc., does not give to the defendant the right, at its election, to pay the amount stated, instead of performing the conditions by it to be performed. If by accepting the benefits of the statute, the defendant became liable to pay a stipulated sum, it was to be paid only in case of default in the performance of conditions otherwise absolute. The defendant, like any other contracting party, had power to violate its contract and take the consequences. But it was not authorized by the term of a contract (derivable from its written agreement, or from that agreement and the statute) to pay an agreed sum, and thus discharge itself. 1 Suth. Dam. 477. Had the act provided that the defendant should have the choice to perform specific acts, or to pay to the state the amount paid for interest, or that the defendant might pay the money in lieu of performing the other acts, the case might have been different. Slosson v. Beadle, 7 Johns. 72; McNitt v. Clark, Id. 465. But we think the statute cannot be construed to give such an election to the defendant. The payment of interest is called in the statute a "grant." Although the money was not there actually paid, it was appropriated contemporaneously with the passage of the statute. In effect, the grant was in the present; the conditions were to be performed in the future. That a loan, or mere advance in the nature of a loan, was not intended, is rendered the more apparent, not only from the fact that neither of these terms is employed, but from the further circumstances that all the services were not to be performed for the state directly, and that there is no provision for credits in case of part performance, whatever the extent of such performance. Yet it must be presumed, the contrary not being alleged, that the defendant built the railroad within the times stipulated, and performed all other conditions which the complaint fails to allege it did not perform.

The state must rely upon the statute, and the defendant's "agreement" so far as it complied with the statute. They do not provide for, nor do they contemplate, that the defendant shall pay money unless it shall fail to do some of the acts by it to be done. As we have said, the act provides either that the sum stated shall be the stipulated damages, or that the sum stated is a penalty. In the latter case the plaintiffs are entitled to recover only the actual damages proved. No doubt, parties may liquidate, by stipulation in advance, the amount to be paid as damages. But, conceding a contract between the state and defendant, the intention of the parties is always material. The intention should be apparent to liquidate the damages, in the sense of just compensation. The intention to measure the damages is not satisfactorily shown when the amount stated varies materially from a just estimate of the actual loss. 1 Suth. Dam. 481. If the act of the legislature is to be interpreted as claimed by appellants herein, it was intended, in case the defendant failed or refused to transport free of charge a single public messenger, convict, or lunatic, or a single article intended for exhibition at a state fair, that it should pay all moneys paid out by the state under the act; amounting, when this suit was commenced, to nearly $2,000,000. It has been said that the real question in such cases is not so much the actual intention of the parties as whether the sum is in fact in the nature of a penalty, and that this is to be determined by the magnitude of the sum in connection with the subject-matter. Jaquith v. Hudson, 5 Mich. 123. But this is only saying that, under certain circumstances, the law will impute an intention to the parties not derivable from the ordinary sense of the words.
